Setting up what could become the first showdown between the Bush administration and the new Democratic Congress, the Justice Department has refused to turn over two secret documents, describing the CIA's detention and interrogation policies for suspected terrorists, to the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), who asked for the documents in November, said Tuesday that the department's response suggested that President Bush's promise to work with the new Congress "may have been only political lip service."

Leahy has said he might use subpoenas to get the material.

"It is disappointing that the Department of Justice and the White House have squandered another opportunity to work cooperatively with Congress," he said Tuesday in a statement. "The department's decision to brush off my request for information about the administration's troubling interrogation policies is not the constructive step toward bipartisanship that I had hoped for, given President Bush's promise to work with us."

The administration notified Leahy on Dec. 22 that it would not release a presidential directive signed by Bush authorizing the CIA to set up secret prisons overseas for suspected terrorists or a 2002 Justice Department legal memorandum outlining "aggressive interrogation techniques."

Leahy waited until the week that Democrats take control of Congress to release — and denounce — the response. The department's letter to Leahy was sent during Congress' holiday recess, when most lawmakers were out of town.

The exchange is an inauspicious start to what some lawmakers and administration officials had hoped would be a period of bipartisanship following the November election, in which Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress.

Democrats have pledged stepped-up oversight on a number of matters, including the conduct of the Iraq war, the National Security Agency's warrantless electronic surveillance of terrorist suspects in the United States, and the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina.

In a letter Tuesday to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, Leahy asked the Justice Department to reconsider its decision. He also told Gonzales he would "pursue this matter further" as part of an oversight hearing that the judiciary committee was planning for the department.

That warning indicates the depth of frustration among Democrats who believe the administration has withheld crucial information about its anti-terrorism efforts. In response to a question after a speech Dec. 13 at Georgetown University Law Center, Leahy signaled the possibility of using subpoenas to elicit information.

"I expect to get the answers. If I don't ... then I really think we should subpoena," he said. "If the president wants to claim executive authority, then let him do so, and then we can determine where we go from there."

In its Dec. 22 letter to Leahy, the Justice Department said the information he sought was classified and included confidential legal opinions that were privileged. The department also said disclosing sensitive operational information, such as interrogation techniques, would help the enemy.

"Al Qaeda seeks information on our interrogation techniques — their methods and their limits — and trains its operatives to resist them," wrote James H. Clinger, acting assistant attorney general for legislative affairs. "We must avoid assisting their effort."

Clinger said the department had already briefed members of the Senate and House intelligence panels about aspects of the anti-terrorism programs, fulfilling its obligations under the law.

He added that the department remained open to discussing many of the legal issues regarding the war on terrorism with Leahy and other lawmakers. He forwarded Leahy a document detailing how the department was currently interpreting the federal anti-torture statute under which CIA personnel could be prosecuted for mistreating prisoners.

Leahy noted in his response Tuesday that the document was already public.

The disclosure of the CIA "black sites" in late 2005 triggered a congressional furor — and a Justice Department leak investigation into a Washington Post report that broke the news. Reports of prisoner abuses in Iraq and Afghanistan have also prompted global outcry and raised questions about the moral authority of the United States worldwide.

Bush acknowledged the existence of the secret prisons in September when he transferred 14 "high-value" detainees held at the prisons — including alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed — to the military detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for possible trial.

Issuing a subpoena is considered a last resort for lawmakers looking to examine administration policies. Doing so can lead to lengthy legal battles and, in some cases, attempts by Congress to enforce the subpoena by withholding funds for administration projects or by refusing to confirm nominees to executive-branch or judicial posts.

FBI Reports Duct-Taping, 'Baptizing' At Guantanamo (WP)

By Dan Eggen

FBI agents witnessed possible mistreatment of the Koran at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, including at least one instance in which an interrogator squatted over Islam's holy text in an apparent attempt to offend a captive, according to bureau documents released yesterday.

In October 2002, a Marine captain allegedly squatted over a copy of the Koran during intensive questioning of a Muslim prisoner, who was "incensed" by the tactic, according to an FBI agent. A second agent described similar events, but it is unclear from the documents whether it was a separate case.

In another incident that month, interrogators wrapped a bearded prisoner's head in duct tape "because he would not stop quoting the Koran," according to an FBI agent, the documents show. The agent, whose account was corroborated by a colleague, said that a civilian contractor laughed about the treatment and was eager to show it off.

The reports amount to new and separate allegations of religiously oriented tactics used against Muslim prisoners at Guantanamo Bay. After an erroneous report of Koran abuse prompted deadly protests overseas in 2005, the U.S. military conducted an investigation that confirmed five incidents of intentional and unintentional mishandling the book at the detention facility. They acknowledged that soldiers and interrogators had kicked the Koran, had stood on it and, in one case, had inadvertently sprayed urine on a copy.

The reports released yesterday were the result of an internal survey conducted in 2004 by the FBI, which asked nearly 500 employees who had served at Guantanamo Bay to report possible mistreatment by law enforcement or military personnel. More than two dozen incidents were reported, including some that the government had revealed in earlier document releases.

The new documents were turned over as part of an ongoing lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union.

In them, FBI employees said they had witnessed 26 incidents of possible mistreatment of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, including previously reported cases in which prisoners were shackled to the floor for extended periods of time or subjected to sexually suggestive tactics by female interrogators.

In a previously unreported allegation, one interrogator bragged to an FBI agent that he had forced a prisoner to listen to "Satanic black metal music for hours," then dressed as a Catholic priest before "baptizing" him.

One agent reported being told that while questioning male captives, female interrogators would sometimes wet their hands and touch detainees' faces in order to interrupt their prayers. Such actions would make some Muslims consider themselves unclean and unable to continue praying.

Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter, a Pentagon spokesman, said in a statement last night that "the issues and facts raised" in the documents "are not new" and that 12 reviews have showed there were no Defense Department policies that condoned abuse.

"The Department of Defense policy is clear -- we treat detainees humanely," Carpenter said. "The United States operates safe, humane and professional detention operations for enemy combatants who are providing valuable information in the war on terror."

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said all the information from the survey has been turned over to the Defense Department's inspector general.

An FBI memorandum that accompanied the documents emphasized that none of the incidents involved agency or Justice Department employees. It said the reports concerned personnel from other government agencies or outside contractors.

Jameel Jaffer, deputy director of the ACLU's National Security Program, said the new documents highlight the need for more focused and aggressive investigation of allegations of detainee abuse at Guantanamo Bay. He questioned how aggressively the FBI pursued the allegations by its employees, because authorities conducted follow-up interviews in only nine of the 26 cases.

"More comprehensive investigation is needed, not only into the scope of abuses but into the root causes and policies that led to those incidents," Jaffer said.

Some previously reported tactics mentioned in the new documents include wrapping a prisoner in an Israeli flag, subjecting others to extreme heat and cold, and aggressively using strobe lights on others.

Such approaches were allowed under aggressive Pentagon detention policies in place at the time, and the new documents include several instances in which interrogators appear to cite such approval as justification for their actions.

But one FBI agent who visited Guantanamo Bay in the fall of 2003 described a tactic called the "frequent flyer program," in which detainees who were deemed uncooperative were placed on a list to be subjected to special sleep-deprivation tactics. The prisoners were moved frequently from cellblock to cellblock at intervals of two to four hours to interrupt their sleep, the agent said.

In September, the Pentagon adopted new interrogation rules, outlawing harsh techniques adopted at Guantanamo Bay, detention facilities in Iraq and other prisons overseas since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

FBI Details Possible Detainee Abuse (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - FBI agents documented more than two dozen incidents of possible mistreatment at the Guantanamo Bay military base, including one detainee whose head was wrapped in duct tape for chanting the Quran and another who pulled out his hair after hours in a sweltering room.

Documents released Tuesday by the FBI offered new details about the harsh interrogation practices used by military officials and contractors when questioning so-called enemy combatants.

The reports describe a female guard who detainees said handled their genitals and wiped menstrual blood on their face. Another interrogator reportedly bragged to an FBI agent about dressing as a Catholic priest and ``baptizing" a prisoner.

Some military officials and contractors told FBI agents that the interrogation techniques had been approved by the Defense Department, including directly by former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The documents were released in response to a public records request by the American Civil Liberties Union, which is suing Rumsfeld and others on behalf of former military detainees who say they were abused. Many of the incidents in the FBI documents have already been reported and are summarized in the ACLU's lawsuit.

Defense Department spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter said the issues raised in the report are not new. A dozen reviews of detention operations have found no policies that condone abuse, he said.

The treatment of detainees has long been a volatile subject, especially between the administration and the Democratic lawmakers slated to assume the majority when the 110th Congress convenes on Thursday.

One incoming chairman served notice Tuesday that the issue is a top priority. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., notified Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that his panel's first oversight hearing of the new Congress would focus on two documents Leahy is seeking about the interrogation methods of another agency, the CIA.

The Justice Department has refused to hand over the documents, saying their contents are ``extremely sensitive" and could help terrorists plot more attacks.

President Bush signed legislation in October that authorized aggressive interrogation tactics but did not define them. ACLU lawyer Jameel Jaffer said the court documents show that stricter congressional oversight is needed.

``If you just authorize in a vague way, there's no end to the abusive methods the interrogators will come up with," Jaffer said.

The records were gathered as part of an internal FBI survey in 2004 and are not part of a criminal investigation.

The agency asked 493 employees whether they witnessed aggressive treatment that was not consistent with the FBI's policies. The bureau received 26 positive responses, including some from agents who were troubled by what they saw.

``I did observe treatment that was not only aggressive but personally very upsetting," one agent wrote, describing seeing a man left in a 100-degree room with no ventilation overnight. ``The detainee was almost unconscious on the floor with a pile of hair next to him. He had apparently literally been pulling his own hair out throughout the night."

Another agent said he heard several ``thunderclaps" then saw a detainee lying on the floor with a bloody nose. Interrogators told the agent the man was upset and had thrown himself to the floor.

In one report, an agent said he saw a detainee draped in an Israeli flag in a room with loud music and strobe lights. A note on the report said the Israeli flag ``may be over the top but not abusive." The words ``may be" were then crossed out and replaced with ``is."

Carpenter, the Pentagon spokesman, said the Guantanamo detainees ``include some of the world's most vicious terrorist operatives."

``The Department of Defense policy is clear," Carpenter said. ``We treat detainees humanely. The United States operates safe, humane and professional detention operations for enemy combatants who are providing valuable information in the war on terror."

The FBI reports do not say whether any laws were broken. They said nothing employees observed rose to the level of abuse seen at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

FBI spokesman Richard J. Kolko said all the information in the reports was passed on to the Pentagon's inspector general.

FBI: Workers Saw Prisoner Abuse At Guantanamo (CNN)

CNN.com, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The FBI on Tuesday released documents showing at least 26 of the agency's employees witnessed aggressive mistreatment and harsh interrogation techniques of prisoners by other government agencies or outside contractors at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"On several occasions witnesses saw detainees in interrogation rooms chained hand and foot in fetal position to floor with no chair/food/water; most urinated or defecated on selves and were left there 18, 24 hours or more," according to one FBI account made public.

One FBI witness saw a detainee "shaking with cold," while another noted a detainee in a sweltering unventilated room was "almost unconscious on a floor with a pile of hair next to him (he had apparently been pulling it out through the night)."

Another witness saw a detainee "with a full beard whose head was wrapped in duct tape."

One FBI statement said that an interrogator squatted over the Quran and that a German shepherd dog was ordered to "growl, bark and show his teeth to the prisoner."

Another detainee was draped in an Israeli flag.

The FBI surveyed all 493 FBI personnel who had been assigned to the military prison facility in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and determined no FBI agent or support personnel had participated in any of the controversial practices.

"This thorough internal assessment shows the FBI was not involved in these activities in any way," said chief FBI spokesman Richard Kolko.

The FBI Office of General Counsel in September 2004 ordered the "special inquiry" into any FBI participation or observations of a series of alleged incidents at the prison camp for suspected terrorists and al Qaeda sympathizers, but the results were not made public.

The FBI released the documents in response to a Freedom of Information request by the American Civil Liberties Union, but stressed that most of the findings had already been reported elsewhere.

"Note these documents have been vetted by both DoD [Department of Defense] and FBI, and that FBI believes this or substantially similar information has already been released in this litigation," the FBI said.

Results of the 26 "positive responses" and several more "not purely negative responses" reported by FBI personnel in the internal inquiry were made available Tuesday on the Web site at www.FBI.gov. (Read the report)

Other actions FBI personnel reported either witnessing or being told about included:

Placing a detainee in a darkened cell with the intent of interrogating him for 24 hours straight; the witness reported being told that then-Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had approved this technique.

Keeping detainees awake for days on end with strobe lights and loud music.

Dressing as a priest and "baptizing" a detainee.

Subjecting a detainee to a lap dance by a topless female guard.

Interrupting detainees' attempts to pray by putting fluid on their faces and telling them it was menstrual blood.

Beating a detainee who said he had recently undergone abdominal surgery.

FBI Releases Internal Documents in Guantanamo Abuse Investigation

Jan. 2, 2007 — The FBI has released documents related to an internal inquiry of more than 490 FBI personnel who served at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and who may have witnessed abusive or aggressive interrogation techniques by military interrogators at the facility.

From late 2002 through mid-2003, several FBI personnel who were at the base reported several incidents of abuse, including the use of dogs, extreme cold and sleep deprivation techniques.

Following reports in July 2004, the FBI's general counsel, Valerie Caproni, began an internal inquiry to find out how many of the FBI personnel at Guantanamo had witnessed abusive or questionable interrogations.

Of the 493 FBI agents and employees who were contacted and interviewed by FBI inspectors, 26 individuals suspected mistreatment of detainees but only nine employees witnessed such methods being used by military interrogators or contractors at the base.

Internal e-mails and communications from the agents assigned to Guantanamo Bay indicate their concerns to their superiors at FBI headquarters. "I did observe treatment that was not only aggressive but personally very upsetting, although I can't say this treatment was perpetrated by bureau employees," wrote an FBI special agent in a July 12, 2004, e-mail to FBI inspectors. "It seemed to me these techniques were being employed by the military."

In his e-mail, the agent described his observations: "I entered interview rooms to find a detainee chained hand-and-foot in the fetal position to the floor, with no chair, food or water. Most times, they had urinated or defecated on themselves and had been left there for 12, 24 hours or more. … I was told the interrogators from the day prior had ordered this treatmen, and the detainee was not to be moved."

The FBI agents assigned to Guantanamo were there gathering potential leads, through interrogations, about attacks against the United States in the wake of 9/11.

In May 2004, FBI director Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee that "It is the FBI's policy to prohibit interrogation by force, threats of force or coercion. Where we have conducted interviews, we have adhered to that policy."

7th Circuit Ruling Expands Use Of FISA Wiretaps (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, January 3, 2007

Federal prosecutors may use wiretap evidence obtained under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act in spy cases for criminal prosecutions unrelated to the original espionage purpose of the wiretap, the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has held.

The ruling is the first outside the special FISA court itself to interpret the law as expanding the ability of prosecutors to use the act in a variety of criminal contexts, according to defense attorney James Geis, a Chicago solo practitioner representing Ning Wen, who was convicted of violating export-control laws.

"Unless there is a constitutional problem in domestic use of evidence seized as part of an international investigation, there is no basis for suppression," wrote Chief Judge Frank Easterbrook in U.S. v. Wen, No. 06-1385.

"I think this holding makes it virtually impossible to challenge a FISA search," said Geis. "This pretty much makes it bulletproof."

The ruling could be significant given the government's increased focus on economic espionage and international theft of U.S. technology. Last month, two men, Fei Ye and Ming Zhong, pleaded guilty in San Francisco to stealing trade secrets from Sun Microsystems Inc. and Transmeta Corp., with the intent of benefiting the People's Republic of China.

Wen and his wife, both naturalized U.S. citizens, were arrested in 2005 in Manitowoc, Wis., for sending to China $500,000 worth of computer parts that could be used to improve missile systems. The government alleged that the computer chips sent out of the United States to China without permission could be used for military radar and missiles.

The FISA court, created to oversee government requests for surveillance warrants against suspected foreign intelligence agents, has held that domestic use of intercepted evidence is permitted so long as it has a "significant" international objective. Sealed Case, 310 F.3d 717 (FIS Ct.).

Geis argued that evidence of domestic criminal conduct gathered under FISA warrants cannot be used to prosecute domestic crime when the espionage investigation dies without charges. "Violation of export laws was very different than espionage," he said. "We never got to see the [government] affidavit" that was the basis for the warrant, he said. In part, the export law violation claim against Wen may have been a matter of geography. "This was central Wisconsin. It would have been trivial in New York, Chicago, San Francisco or Los Angeles," Geis said.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the department is pleased with the outcome, but he declined to elaborate on its broader potential application.

Two Albany Mosque Leaders Request New Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 3, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. -- Two mosque leaders convicted last fall after a terrorism-related sting have asked the trial judge to set aside the verdicts or else grant them new trials.

Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner, were caught in a 2004 FBI sting involving a fictional terror strike. The government never accused the pair of actual violence, but said they participated in a money-laundering scheme that included an FBI informant posing as an illegal arms dealer.

In court papers filed Sunday, defense attorney Kevin Luibrand said the facts don't support Hossain's convictions. He argued they should be set aside because Hossain was entrapped, authorities induced the crime, the pizzeria owner had "no predisposition" to join in, and improper testimony from an unqualified prosecution expert witness made Hossain's political affiliation appear sinister.

Hossain was convicted Oct. 10 on all 27 charges against him, including three counts of conspiracy. The jury, which deliberated over four days, found Aref guilty of 10 of the 30 charges against him.

Aref, a 36-year-old Kurdish refugee from northern Iraq, was also found guilty of lying to FBI agents about having known a terrorist leader, Mullah Krekar.

The federal informant asked Hossain to launder $50,000, saying it was from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile that would be used to kill a Pakistani diplomat in New York City. Aref, spiritual leader of Hossain's mosque, acted as a witness to a series of transactions between the two men. Hossain said he had merely asked the informant for a loan.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek, who prosecuted the case, said it's unlikely the trial judge would reverse himself and he doubted the motions would succeed on a later appeal to the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. Judge Thomas McAvoy was careful about the defendants' rights, he said, instructing the jury, for example, to consider the entrapment defense.

In court papers last week, defense attorney Terence Kindlon argued that FBI surveillance tapes showed Aref repeatedly said he could not support Jaish-e-Mohammed, or JEM, the Pakistan-based Islamic terrorist group that the informant claimed to support. "We feel the verdict didn't make any sense," he said.

The FBI has acknowledged Aref was the ultimate target of the sting, not Hossain. Luibrand declined to comment on whether prosecutors had offered Hossain a plea bargain.

Hossain, 51, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Bangladesh, could face 20 years in prison, Luibrand said.

The men are in jail, scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 12.

Can Small Businesses Help Win The War? (USAT)

By Del Jones

USA Today, January 3, 2007

The U.S. military is studying small companies such as 24-employee Craigslist to see how the online bulletin board has all but terrorized the newspaper industry by siphoning classified advertising.

Such research may unearth ideas that will help the United States fight the war on terror.

It may seem a stretch that within the chaos of capitalism are the secrets to fighting al-Qaeda. But the military and business have long borrowed leadership lessons and competitive tactics from each other.

In the past, sharing between military and business has been largely a one-way street. The Art of War by the ancient Chinese general Sun-Tzu remains a must-read for corporate CEOs, and most great lessons have been learned the hard way on the battleground before migrating into commerce. For example, CEOs have come to embrace the idea that it's better to act quickly on an imperfect plan than to introduce a perfect plan too late, a lesson first learned the hard way in the fog of war.

But now the military is paying closer attention to business than business is paying to the military, because the world of geopolitics has discovered itself to be on the same road that business has been on for some time. That road is flatter, more networked and more decentralized than ever.

Large companies are groping for strategies to fend off disruptive competitors, including YouTube, Kazaa, Skype and Wikipedia, companies that are giving away video, music, long-distance and information while eroding the revenue stream of companies that charge for it. YouTube is a website where users swap millions of free videos. With fewer than 100 employees, it has created anxiety throughout the giant industries of film and TV.

The Wikimedia Foundation has no plans to bring Western civilization to its knees, but the organization that provides a free Web-based encyclopedia has done as much to Encyclopaedia Britannica. Some 100,000 readers comb Wikipedia entries for errors. Two of those volunteer editors wouldn't recognize each other if they passed on the street. But they are joined at the hip by an ideology and can inflict pain upon a company that has been around since 18th-century Scotland.

How large, traditional companies fare in this fight may prove invaluable in developing a strategy against al-Qaeda. That's why the military is going to school. A book making the rounds at the Pentagon is The Starfish and the Spider: The Unstoppable Power of Leaderless Organizations. It was written for a business audience, but military strategists are saying, "This is the best thing I've read that applies to counterterrorism," says Lt. Col. Rudolph Atallah, a Defense Department director in international affairs.

The premise of The Starfish and the Spider is that centralized organizations are like spiders and can be destroyed with an attack to the head. Decentralized organizations transfer decision-making to leaders in the field. They are like starfish. No single blow will kill them, and parts that are destroyed will grow back.

When Starfish co-author Rod Beckstrom arrived at USA TODAY's suburban Washington, D.C., headquarters for an interview in November, he said he had just come from meetings with representatives at the Pentagon and elsewhere in the "intelligence community." He said he was contacted "out of the blue" in September by one of the highest-ranking officers in special operations, and more recently by a high-ranking special operations officer at Fort Bragg, N.C.

Next week, Beckstrom will present a "high-level briefing set up for a dozen members of different intelligence groups in D.C.," he said.

It's no coincidence that Osama bin Laden is the first leader of terrorism to have studied economics and public administration, nor that he cut his teeth on the family business in Saudi Arabia, says Bruce Hoffman, a professor of security studies at Georgetown University.

As disruptive as the Irish Republican Army once was, it had but "450 trigger pullers and bomb throwers, because (the leadership) couldn't control a larger number," Hoffman says.

But long before he became a household name, bin Laden was creating an organization so flat and decentralized that it can plot destruction from cells in about 65 countries no matter how deep its leader is pushed into the caves of Pakistan or Afghanistan.

He created a "terrorist sausage factory," in Afghanistan and then, like any good Silicon Valley CEO-geek, he attracted employees with an ideology and secured their dedication with vacations, airline tickets home to see the family, and death benefits, Hoffman says.

"Decentralized organizations can be more effective and resilient," says Craigslist founder Craig Newmark, who says he has come to the same conclusion that companies such as his have something in common with al-Qaeda.

Craigslist might be little more than an online bulletin board, but it gets 5 billion page views a month.

"People who are passionate and can work independently can get more done than a centralized organization," Newmark says.

Others have reached the same conclusion, although most companies declined interviews because they didn't want any part of the al-Qaeda analogy.

Many experts have identified terrorism as being hard to defeat because it is decentralized. But Beckstrom and Starfish co-author Ori Brafman, both with Stanford MBAs, hold out hope for victory. Beckstrom recommends three strategies against terrorism:

1 Change the ideology that fuels it. For example, he says the West should help fund public schools in terrorist hotbeds where parents now send their children to radical madrasahs because they feed and educate their children. For now, parents have no alternative.

School choice and other strategies aimed at the ideology take a generation or more, but Atallah says he, too, has decided that blunt military weaponry is not enough, and success depends on winning hearts and minds.

When Sandy Weill was CEO of Citigroup he took steps to decentralize a company that today has 300,000 employees in 100 countries by letting divisions compete freely against each other. To defeat terrorism, young people must believe they have opportunity in the world, or they will blow themselves up to get to the next, says Weill, who helped raise $100 million for victims of the 2005 Kashmir earthquake in Pakistan, a country known as a breeding ground for terrorism.

2 Centralize the decentralized opponent. An example of this would be to let Hezbollah go ahead and govern in Lebanon. Hezbollah is defined as a terrorist organization by the United States, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Israel. But it is more centralized than al-Qaeda and is funded by the centralized government of Iran. Centralized governments are easier to persuade and/or defeat than independent cells, Beckstrom said.

Google's decision in October to buy YouTube for $1.65 billion is the business equivalent. The move has already tamed YouTube into respecting intellectual property rights, because Google, with a $140 billion market value, has deep pockets and must worry about lawsuits. YouTube has purged copyrighted programs such as The Daily Show With Jon Stewart.

3 Decentralize yourself. The obvious military example here is to expand special operations and give small units the freedom to complete missions without oversight and second-guessing from command and control.

Of course, that has its downside as it does in business, says Robert Shillman, CEO of Cognex, maker of vision sensors that gauge, guide, inspect and count on the production lines of companies, including Ford Motor. When you give others freedom to succeed, you also give them more freedom to make costly mistakes, he says.

Were the military to become more decentralized with few orders other than to win, it would lead to greater success, Shillman says. But it also could cause a special-ops unit to destroy religious buildings if they were being used as havens by terrorists. Such tactics are necessary if the U.S. wants to win, Shillman says, because if bin Laden is decentralized, the U.S. military must decentralize to defeat him.

Bin Laden tells his fighters: "I want you to kill people and wreak havoc. Don't check with me, or they'll find me. We'll send money," Shillman says. "It's the same way Cognex runs our acquisitions. We hire smart people, give them cost guidelines and a reward if they succeed."

Even in business there has long been a love-hate relationship with decentralization. Sara Lee was little more than a group of independent, decentralized companies when Brenda Barnes became CEO in 2005. But with everyone acting independently,

Sara Lee was unwieldy, losing volume discounts, and its computer systems were such a patchwork that employees couldn't communicate across the street.

Robert Nardelli reached a similar conclusion when he became CEO of Home Depot six years ago. Both he and Barnes have moved to centralize some aspects of their companies. Home Depot's stock was flat last year, and the jury is still out on whether Nardelli gained purchasing efficiency at the price of entrepreneurial spirit. Sara Lee's stock was down 16% last year while the S&P 500 index gained 14%.

"If you take decentralization to an extreme, you get chaos," Beckstrom said. But decentralization is winning, and he has yet to find an industry that isn't moving at least gradually toward decentralization.

Oversee.net, an online ad firm, has 150 employees. Companies that small have traditionally been managed top down. But CEO Lawrence Ng says he has already decentralized his employees into what he describes as SWAT teams and battalions.

"They know their goals. They don't have much intervention from myself or my senior management." Knowing what his teams are capable of accomplishing on their own, Ng imagines that it would be incredibly difficult for a centralized government to fight decentralized terror.

"How many cells are out there? All want to be successful and are coming up with their own strategy," Ng says.

Hoffman says no decentralized company thrives without strong leadership in the field, and the U.S. has probably avoided another attack after 9/11 by effectively taking out the second and third tier of al-Qaeda's leadership, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Abu Zubaydah. The "decapitation approach" of killing bin Laden would have been less effective, he says.

On the other hand, the U.S. government has been unable to take advantage of one of its greatest areas of business expertise: marketing. Any first-year business school student learns that the first rule is to know the customer. Know the audience.

The U.S. marketing message has focused on freedom and democracy. A little research might show that "stability and justice are what people seek," Hoffman said.

Don Tapscott, whose book Wikinomics: How Mass Collaboration Changes Everything went on sale Dec. 28, says we've entered a time when people with no relationship other than a passion can come together to invent an encyclopedia or a computer operating system. California is thinking about using such collaboration to "wiki all school books," he says, which means using software that allows users scattered throughout the world to collaborate to create and edit.

There are 90,000 chemists online, 90,000 problem solvers, Tapscott says. Groups of strangers with an ideology — a passion — can "create a school book, a mutual fund, a motorcycle. They can also create terror."

It's unfortunate that the bad guys use the same tools as the good guys, says Craigslist founder Newmark. But the good guys have an advantage, he says.

"You can build a network around hatred that works in the short run. The way to disrupt a culture of hatred is to be noisy about a culture of trust. Until recently, the United States has stopped hatred from developing by standing up for our ideals," he says.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

6 Of 75 Cities Get Top Disaster Rating (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

The AP, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Only six of 75 U.S. metropolitan areas won the highest grades for their emergency agencies' ability to communicate during a disaster, five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, according to a federal report obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press.

A draft portion of the report, to be released Wednesday, gives the best ratings to Washington, D.C; San Diego; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Columbus, Ohio; Sioux Falls, S.D.; and Laramie County, Wyo.

The lowest scores went to Chicago; Cleveland; Baton Rouge, La.; Mandan, N.D.; and American Samoa. The report included large and small cities and their suburbs, along with U.S. territories.

In an overview, the report said all 75 areas surveyed have policies in place for helping their emergency workers communicate. But it cautioned that regular testing and exercises are needed "to effectively link disparate systems."

It also said while cooperation among emergency workers is strong, "formalized governance (leadership and planning) across regions has lagged."

The study, conducted by the Homeland Security Department, was likely to add fuel to what looms as a battle in Congress this year. Democrats who take over the majority this week have promised to try fixing the problem emergency agencies have communicating with each other but have not said specifically what they will do, how much it will cost or how they will pay for it.

"Five years after 9/11, we continue to turn a deaf ear to gaps in interoperable communications," _ the term used for emergency agencies' abilities to talk to each other, said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "If it didn't have such potentially devastating consequences, it would be laughable."

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke would not comment on the report, saying only that in releasing it on Wednesday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff will "talk about nationwide assessments for interoperable communications."

The attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, revealed major problems in how well emergency agencies were able to talk to each other during a catastrophe. Many firefighters climbing the World Trade Center towers died when they were unable to hear police radio warnings to leave the crumbling buildings.

In New York now, the report said, first responders were found to have well-established systems to communicate among each other _ but not the best possible. Thirteen U.S. cities scored better than New York.

Just over a year ago, Hurricane Katrina underscored communication problems when radio transmissions were hindered because the storm's winds toppled towers.

A separate report the Homeland Security Department released last month found that emergency workers from different agencies are capable of talking to each other in two-thirds of 6,800 U.S. communities surveyed.

But David Boyd, who heads the Homeland Security office that conducted the study, said in an interview that only about 10 percent of them have systems so fully developed that they can communicate with them routinely. That survey did not name the cities that provided data.

In the study to be released on Wednesday, communities were judged in three categories: operating procedures in place, use of communications systems and how effectively local governments have coordinated in preparation for a disaster.

Overall, 16 percent of the communities were given the highest score for the communications procedures they have in place and 1 percent got the lowest rating.

Nineteen percent got the top grade for their plans for coordinating during a disaster and 8 percent received the worst; and 21 percent got the best mark for how well they use their communications equipment while 4 percent got the bottom rating.

Most of the areas surveyed included cities and their surrounding communities, based on the assumption that in a major crisis emergency personnel from all local jurisdictions would respond.

Los Angeles got advanced grades in procedures and use of emergency communications systems and a well-developed grade in coordination of governance.

San Francisco, by comparison, received intermediate grades in governance and procedures, and a well-developed grade in use of systems.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, $2.9 billion in federal grant money has been distributed to state and local first responders for the improvement of their emergency communications systems.

Congress has ordered that the television broadcast industry vacate a portion of the radio spectrum to make it available for public safety communications. Lawmakers have also created a new office at the Homeland Security Department to oversee the issue, though they have yet to provide money for it.

The areas with the six best scores were judged advanced in all three categories. The cities with the lowest grades had reached the early implementation stage for only one category, and intermediate levels for the other two categories.

Chicago, Cleveland and Baton Rouge, for example, were judged to have accomplished the early stage of government coordination. Mandan, N.D., and the territory of American Samoa were both found to have gotten to the early stage of their actual usage of interoperable emergency communications and rated intermediate in governance and procedures.

The Chicago Office of Emergency Management and Communications took issue with the report's methodology and findings.

"We strongly disagree with the results of this study, and feel that the parameters of the study were inconsistent and limited," the statement said." In some instances, the scorecard evaluated urban areas or regions that contain a small number of independent jurisdictions and compared them with urban areas or regions containing significantly higher numbers of independent jurisdictions _ an apples to oranges comparison across the board."

The statement said that in 2006, Chertoff described the city's Operations Center, which is responsible for communications among various agencies and jurisdictions, "as a great model for the country."

Tammy Lapp, the emergency coordinator for Mandan and Morton County, N.D., said she was not surprised by the low ranking.

"We knew with our limited funds, we were going to fall short," she said.

Report: Cities' Communications Still Lacking (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — Emergency responders in most cities don't have the equipment and skills needed to communicate with each other during a crisis, according to a report to be released today by the Homeland Security Department.

Only six of the 75 cities and regions surveyed received top scores for "interoperability," or the ability to reliably communicate by radio. They were Washington, D.C., and its suburbs; San Diego; Columbus, Ohio; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Sioux Falls, S.D.; and Laramie, Wyo.

The report comes more than five years after the 9/11 attacks highlighted communications problems among fire, police and other emergency responders in New York City, at the Pentagon and at the crash site in Somerset County, Pa. The problems were especially acute at the World Trade Center, where firefighters couldn't hear police warnings to get out of the towers before they collapsed.

"One of the dramatic lessons of 9/11 was the cost in human life when we do not have at least command-level interoperability in cities and in regions," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said last month.

Chertoff said the country has made "a significant amount of progress" toward better communication systems. But in regions where there are still gaps, he said, leaders of cities and towns with incompatible systems need to work to develop a better system that would help communication during a disaster.

Since 2003, Homeland Security has handed out $2.9 billion in grants for interoperable communications systems, and Chertoff said his department's grant programs will be heavily focused on communications improvements over the next two years.

The survey, he said, was designed to identify the gaps so they can be closed "as quickly as possible."

The lowest scores on the report went to Chicago; Cleveland; Baton Rouge; Mandan, N.D.; and American Samoa. New York City scored in the middle.

Outgoing House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Pete King, R-N.Y., said communities immediately outside New York City have numerous communications systems that are incompatible with each other. That's also true in several other major urban areas, he said. "A lot of progress has been made," King said. But the report shows "how difficult an issue this is."

Congressional Democrats, who assume leadership of Congress on Thursday, are expected to address the issue as part of a campaign promise to pass all the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The commission in 2004 cited the urgent need for "compatible and adequate communications among public safety organizations."

German Muslim Held, Denied U.S. Entry (NSDY/AP)

By Garance Burke, Associated Press Writer

A German businessman of Syrian descent who wanted to surprise his daughter with a holiday visit was detained for four days in a Las Vegas holding cell before being sent back home without explanation. A civil rights group called authorities' treatment of Majed Shehadeh a case of anti-Muslim discrimination.

Shehadeh, 62, flew from Frankfurt to Las Vegas last Thursday, hoping to meet with his wife and drive to Bakersfield, Calif., where his American-born daughter had just gotten news she'd passed the California bar exam. Instead, he wound up shivering in a holding cell without ever being told why he couldn't enter the country, he said.

Roxanne Hercules, a spokeswoman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection, confirmed Tuesday that Shehadeh was denied entry, but would not discuss specifics of his case. She said Shehadeh's visa waiver could have been denied because "he could have a criminal record, or it could be a terrorism issue."

The detention follows a series of similar incidents involving Muslim passengers, according to the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

In October, an Islamic scholar from South Africa was denied entry at San Francisco International Airport. A month later, six imams were taken off a US Airways flight from Minneapolis to Phoenix after a passenger reported overhearing them criticize the U.S. war in Iraq.

"Overall these cases send a message that Muslims are second-class citizens who can be detained and kept from their families," said Affad Shaikh, a civil rights coordinator for CAIR.

Shehadeh touched down Thursday afternoon on a direct Condor Airlines flight to McCarran International Airport, where his American wife was waiting to pick him up. The couple had planned to visit family in the Las Vegas area, before surprising their daughter for the New Year and celebrating her wedding anniversary in Central California.

"I gave them my German passport, and he looked to see which countries I visited. He found I had stamps that looked like Arabic and asked if they were fake," Shehadeh said Tuesday in a phone interview from his home in Alzenau, a small Bavarian village.

"Nobody ever informed me why I was being questioned," he said. "All that was ever told to me was this had to do with Washington."

After being interrogated by Border Protection and FBI agents for more than 12 hours at the airport, Shehadeh said he was handcuffed and transported in the back of police car to a North Las Vegas jail. Officials told family members they had denied Shehadeh's visa waiver, which grants German citizens the right to enter the U.S. with no additional paperwork, said his wife Joanne Mulligan.

Officials with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement said they could not comment on why he was denied entry. FBI and airport officials in Las Vegas also declined comment.

An aide to Sen. Dianne Feinstein later told the family that Shehadeh was on a "look-out list," Mulligan said. Feinstein's office confirmed Tuesday that the family contacted her, but wouldn't comment further.

"I said you've got to be joking me, he's never even had a speeding ticket," said Mulligan, a retired math teacher for the U.S. military. "I mean, we're Muslims, and we travel a lot. Maybe the countries we travel to are not the countries they want you to visit."

Once in the holding facility, Shehadeh said he was stripped of his shoes, jacket and prescribed heart medicine and locked in a cell with about 25 other detainees. There was one toilet in the middle of the room, and access to a telephone was extremely limited, he said.

On Sunday, he was released and sent back to Frankfurt on the same charter airline.

Shehadeh's daughter Majida Shehadeh said she was glad her father made it home, but feared he wouldn't be able to return to visit.

"I used to be happy I moved here," she said. "But now I can't wait for when I leave here. The mentality is not what it was like beforehand."

Man Held In Pit Injuries May Enter Plea (DURHS)

By Beth Velliquette, The Herald-Sun

Durham Herald-Sun, January 3, 2007

HILLSBOROUGH -- If the FBI turns over the evidence it collected after Mohammed Taheri-Azar allegedly attempted to kill people on the UNC campus by running over them in an SUV, Taheri-Azar will enter a plea at his next court hearing on Jan. 24.

Taheri-Azar is facing nine counts of attempted first-degree murder and nine counts of felony assault for allegedly driving a Jeep Grand Cherokee through the Pit on the UNC campus and hitting people on March 3, 2006.

During a short court appearance here Tuesday, Taheri-Azar appeared to want the case to move along faster and said he wished there weren't so many short pretrial hearings he had to attend. Hearings, such as Tuesday's and a previous one in December, caused too much trouble for too many people, he told Superior Court Judge Carl Fox.

"It would be best to have as few of these hearings as possible," Taheri-Azar said. "If January 24 is the earliest possible date for this trial, then I think it's very reasonable."

Fox then asked Taheri-Azar if he had had a chance to meet with his family, and Taheri-Azar said he had met with them over the weekend. When asked if he wanted to speak to his family after the hearing, Taheri-Azar replied, "I think that it would not be a good day for that. We have our arrangements. Thank you."

After the hearing, when asked whether he planned to plead guilty, Taheri-Azar did not answer.

During the short hearing Tuesday in Orange County Criminal Superior Court, Taheri-Azar's attorney, Orange-Chatham Public Defender James Williams, told Fox he wants to see the interviews that FBI agents conducted in Charlotte with Taheri-Azar's family and others and to see any evidence, including computer files, that the agents may have collected in the case.

Orange-Chatham District Attorney Jim Woodall said he has been attempting to get that evidence without a court order, but so far has not been successful. Woodall said he believed the interviews did not have much evidentiary value, but Williams said he can't say whether the interviews have evidentiary value or not because he hasn't seen them.

"The statute clearly supports our right to have this information," Williams said.

Fox said he would give Woodall 14 days to try to get the evidence for Williams. If he doesn't get the information from the FBI, Fox said he would sign a court order to obtain it.

Williams also has written a letter saying he wants information from computer files and e-mails that UNC police collected from Taheri-Azar's e-mail account. Woodall said he believes he could get copies of the e-mails almost immediately.

UNC Hit-And-Run Suspect Wants Case Over 'As Early As Possible' (WRAL)

WRAL-TV, January 3, 2007

Hillsborough — A man accused of plowing a sport utility vehicle into a crowd of people at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill told a judge Tuesday that he wants to speed up the judicial process.

"Personally, Your Honor, I'd like to get this whole court-trial over with as early as possible," Mohammed Taheri-azar said.

The judge scheduled Taheri-azar's next court appearance for Jan. 24, when Taheri-azar is expected to enter a plea in the March 3 attack in which nine people were injured.

"And if Jan. 24 is the earliest possible next date to continue this trial, I think that's fair and reasonable," Taheri-azar said.

Taheri-azar's lawyer also requested copies of FBI interviews with Taheri-azar's family after the incident.

Taheri-azar, a UNC-Chapel Hill graduate, is charged with nine counts of attempted murder and nine counts of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill.

In letters to UNC-Chapel Hill's student newspaper, The Daily Tar Heel, Taheri-azar wrote that he carried out the attack to get back at "American taxpayers and their government" for the United States' role in the killing Muslims around the world. He also wrote that he felt "no remorse" for steering the SUV through the Pit.

Taheri-azar was expected to enter a plea last month in connection with the attacks, but that court appearance was continued.

From Monitoring Teens To Minding Terrorists (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

DOJ_NMG_0110426

The job of a shopping mall security guard normally involves controlling rowdy teenagers, finding lost children and patrolling parking lots. But starting this month, malls across the country will begin training guards for another task: fighting terrorism.

The 14-hour program is being developed by the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group, and the Homeland Security Policy Institute at George Washington University at a cost of $2 million. It is the first standardized anti-terrorism curriculum written for the nation's estimated 20,000 mall security guards.

Developers of the program say it is crucial to safeguarding shopping centers, which have significant economic import -- as evidenced by the billions of dollars spent at malls during the holiday season -- and have emerged as modern-day town centers, with movie theaters, restaurants, and now grocery stores and gyms.

"Many different facets of our society since September 11 have had to take the stark realization that bad people might try to do bad things," said Paul M. Maniscalco, a senior research scientist at GW who helped create the program. "Security is really paramount in large enclosed malls. . . . . These events, when you respond to them, you make or break it in the first 20 minutes."

Not everyone agrees, however, that America's malls face a serious threat of terrorism. And some critics question the effectiveness of the training when the private security industry suffers from high turnover -- most guards leave the job within a year and some in as little as four months, according to estimates from the Service Employees International Union.

"There is no justification for this," said Ian S. Lustick, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania and author of "Trapped in the War on Terror." "It's too diffuse a problem. There's a security problem in any public place. . . . The retail industry and shopping malls is just one little part of that."

The training focuses on making guards more aware of the effects of terrorist attacks and helping them recognize potential attackers. It ranges from the understanding the characteristics of the nerve agent sarin (especially dangerous in enclosed spaces because it vaporizes quickly) to spotting suicide bombers (look for unusual dress, like a heavy coat in the middle of summer). The program is being tested at a handful of shopping centers, including the Mall in Columbia, and is planned to be rolled out over the next six months.

The Department of Homeland Security categorizes shopping centers, along with other easily accessible public places, as "soft targets." Since the 2001 attacks, the Smithsonian museums and national monuments have been among those increasing security, and the Washington Convention Center recently said it was beefing up emergency preparedness training for some workers.

Yet the retail industry has treaded warily. Customers expect shopping centers to be free and open, and malls are loath to introduce stringent security measures, as airports have done, that might limit shoppers' access -- or scare them off altogether. Though security officers are usually uniformed, they are not intended to appear threatening.

"Their job is to be welcoming," said Robert Rowe, director of development for the American Society for Industrial Security, an advocacy group for private security officers. "The shopping mall doesn't survive unless people come."

General Growth Properties Inc., which owns Tysons Galleria and the Mall in Columbia, has already restricted access to the roofs of its buildings, said David Levenberg, vice president of security and risk management. The Columbia shopping center recently installed a video surveillance system, a wall of 16 monitors and eight video recorders filling a tiny security office.

"You want to see the sales slip?" said Bill Burley IV, director of public safety and security at the mall, as he directed one of the more than 100 cameras to zoom in on a shopper looking at jewelry.

But a report released early in 2006 under leadership of the Police Foundation, a District think tank, found that although some malls have made changes, they have not been enough. The study, funded by the Justice Department, cited lack of coordination with local law and emergency forces and financing for new technology. It highlighted poor training of mall officers in terrorism awareness and response as one of the industry's main challenges.

That thinking broadens the responsibility of security guards: Mall security directors surveyed in the report put loitering kids as their top concern, with terrorism second. Only 2.5 percent required guards to have some college education. Less than 1 percent mandated a degree in criminal justice.

Robert C. Davis, lead author of the study who now is senior research analyst at Rand Corp., said it is not feasible to teach mall guards the complex skills needed to identify potential terrorists, who are tracked through highly developed intelligence networks. He contends there is little malls can do to prevent an attack -- they can only react to one.

"The biggest things malls can do is have really well-developed, detailed emergency response plans and rehearse them," Davis said. "The best thing they can do is respond effectively."

Maniscalco said the curriculum focuses on awareness and response and was developed with the same materials used in training courses for emergency responders and law enforcement, tailored for mall security officers.

The instructional DVD was shot at the Boulevard Mall in Las Vegas. One lesson shows a man dressed as a janitor with a hose who seems to be watering plants in the food court. But there is no badge on his uniform and his eyes are scanning the crowd rather than looking at the plants.

Actually, he is spraying dangerous chemicals into the air, Maniscalco said. And instead of following an instinct to rush to the scene -- and possibly exposing themselves to the chemical -- guards should block off the area and call police, he said. The DVD also has live footage of terrorist attacks from New York to Russia, including the carnage following a suicide bombing in Israel.

"This is all real-world, everyday stuff that the security officer will encounter," Maniscalco said.

In fact, a man was arrested in December for plotting to use hand grenades and a pistol to disrupt Christmas shopping at a Rockford, Ill., mall. Two years ago in Columbus, Ohio, a man with alleged ties to al-Qaeda was indicted for wanting to shoot up a local mall. He is awaiting trial.

Still, there has been never been a terrorist attack against a U.S. shopping center. William Flynn, director of risk management for Homeland Security, said there was no intelligence to suggest shopping centers were in danger. The handful of reported threats seem to have come from lone wolves rather than organized cells, skeptics say.

"I wouldn't say let's classify every shopping mall in the country as critical infrastructure and start handing out federal grants" said James Carafano, a homeland security expert with the Heritage Foundation. "Putting a lot of money in this doesn't make much sense."

The initial rollout of the curriculum is being funded by the International Council of Shopping Centers, and companies that provide the private security for the country's shopping centers have agreed to participate, council spokesman Malachy Kavanagh said. Financing for the future has yet to be determined, but Kavanagh said the group plans to apply for federal grants. Flynn said he supports the program and that Homeland Security has conducted risk assessments at several shopping centers across the country.

One of the first guards to go through the new training program was Lt. Al Pineiro, who has worked at the Mall in Columbia for the past 10 years, starting part-time and recently going full-time. A former Army recruiter, he was at the National Guard facility in Silver Spring on Sept. 11, 2001. He recalled watching one of the World Trade Center towers crumble on a big-screen television with his fellow soldiers.

"I was shocked that it happened so close to home," he said.

Pineiro said the anti-terrorism training recalled the lessons he learned in the months following the attacks. It took him several days to complete the course, and he aced the final exam.

"It just reminds us that we have to stay alert," he said. "We can't afford to get complacent."

DHS Tracking System Will Keep Eye On IT Workers (GCN)

By Alice Lipowicz, Contributing Writer

Government Computer News, January 3, 2007

A new records system is being designed to allow the Homeland Security Department to monitor the names, passwords, citizenship information and other data on thousands of IT workers with access to the department's systems.

In a notice posted Dec. 29, DHS announced it is creating a new sensitive, but unclassified, database as part of its General Information Technology Access Account Records System. The department made the notice to comply with the Privacy Act of 1974, which regulates how the government collects and uses personal information.

The new database will collect personal information from IT employees, contractors, grantees and others, including people who serve on DHS advisory committees or are listed as points of contact for facilities.

The system will include names, user names, citizenship, business affiliation, contact information and passwords. It also will include home addresses, e-mail addresses, and names and phone numbers of people listed as contacts.

The information will be routinely used by DHS contractors and consultants, facility operators, congressional offices, National Archives, Justice Department or other federal agencies conducting litigations or proceedings involving DHS.

The National Archives will access the database pursuant to records management inspections and there will be no disclosure to consumer reporting agencies, the notice stated. DHS plans to destroy the records six years after the user account becomes inactive, or when no longer needed for investigative or security purposes.

WAR NEWS:

Troop-surge Proposal Fodder For '08 Presidential Hopefuls (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 3, 2007

Few Republicans sprinted to Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) side when he first came out in support of a troop surge in Iraq several months ago, and some of those who did wound up backing off amid campaign-season criticism.

The proposal still isn't popular among Republicans, even as the Bush administration mulls putting it into action. Among Democrats, there is a similar brand of hesitance, despite varying degrees of support expressed by leaders including incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), incoming Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.) and incoming House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas).

None of those three is facing a tough campaign this cycle, however.

About two months after voters delivered what many Democrats interpreted as a strong message of discontent with the war in Iraq in the 2006 election, Democratic presidential candidates and lawmakers who are likely to face some of the most competitive races in 2008 are largely joining with Republicans in resistance to the idea of adding troops, citing the need for a political solution instead.

Democratic presidential contenders Sens. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) became the latest to come out forcefully against a surge in Iraq. They and other presidential candidates appear ready to make "The McCain Doctrine," as Edwards dubbed it Sunday, one of the first big issues of the 2008 campaign.

Polls have shown support for adding troops in Iraq to be below 20 percent, with a clear majority against it.

Biden, who has repeatedly said he is a candidate, and Obama, who has said he will decide soon, sent e-mails to supporters last week detailing their anti-surge positions.

Obama reinforced that he "strongly opposed" the war from the start and called for a phased withdrawal: "We must not multiply the mistakes of yesterday," he said, "we must end them today."

Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, vowed to fight the surge, saying it wouldn't work without a political settlement between the Sunnis, Shi'a and Kurds. Biden said he intends to hold a series of hearings this month to produce a better option.

Edwards weighed in after officially declaring his candidacy last week. Appearing on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday, he called the proposal "The McCain Doctrine" and said that, though McCain is his friend, "I think he's dead wrong about this."

Appearing on Fox News Sunday, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) echoed Biden by calling for a "political settlement" and said the responsibility should belong to the Iraqis. Vilsack is asking supporters to sign a petition on his website urging McCain to find an alternative plan.

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) came out against the idea after a Middle East trip two weeks ago. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) has left open the possibility if it's part of a "larger plan" for ending the war.

The proposal is also unpopular among incoming House Democrats, many of whom could draw strong challenges in two years. Veteran Rep.-elect Tim Walz (D-Minn.), who defeated Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R) in November, is opposed to ramping up troops, as are Reps.-elect Peter Welch (D-Vt.) and Paul Hodes (D-N.H.).

Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), who is up for a fifth term in 2008, believes the solution in Iraq is a political one, not a military one, said spokesman Tom Reynolds. "More troops doesn't get us to that goal."

Rep. Jim Marshall (D-Ga.), who was one of the few Democratic incumbents to face a close reelection battle after redistricting tilted his district in Republicans' favor, "generally speaking" does not support an increase, said spokesman Doug Moore, who added, "There would have to be a very specific plan with very specific goals."

Three months ago, Sen. Jon Kyl (R) expressed support for his Arizona colleague's position, and Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) said during a campaign visit from McCain that he would consider the idea. Chafee's campaign manager said later on a local radio show that the senator was looking at everything.

Both of their opponents pounced. Kyl's campaign scaled back its statements, saying the senator would support an increase only if the commanders on the ground requested it, and Chafee's campaign manager told The Hill that the idea was "off the table." Kyl won reelection; Chafee lost.

In similar fashion, Reid was quick to back off his statements, originally made Dec. 17 on "This Week." Two days later, in a post on the Huffington Post blog, Reid said, "Frankly, I don't believe that more troops is the answer for Iraq. … We obviously want to support what commanders in the field say they need, but apparently even the Joint Chiefs do not support increased combat forces for Baghdad."

On the Republican side, among those running in 2008, Sens. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) have denounced the idea of adding troops, while Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) have expressed support.

After visiting Iraq in mid-December, Coleman returned and issued a statement saying he doesn't believe a troop surge "is the answer at this time." Last week, after an Iraq trip with McCain, Collins wrote in a journal on her website that adding troops would be "a mistake" and suggested repositioning the ones already on the ground instead.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) who is unlikely to face a tough reelection contest in 2008 but could run for president, has emerged as a chief critic of the idea and penned an op-ed in The Washington Post in late November calling for a phased withdrawal.

Cornyn has been calling for the surge for more than a month, and Graham has also recently emerged as an important backer. Both serve on the Armed Services Committee.

Iraq Orders Investigation Into Hussein Execution (NYT)

By John F. Burns And James Glanz

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 2 — Iraq's Shiite-led government said Tuesday that it had ordered an investigation into the abusive behavior at the execution of Saddam Hussein, who was subjected to a battery of taunts by official Shiite witnesses and guards as he awaited his hanging.

Officials said a three-man Interior Ministry committee would look into the scenes that have caused outrage and public demonstrations among Mr. Hussein's Sunni Arab loyalists in Iraq, and widespread dismay elsewhere, especially in the Middle East. In an unofficial cellphone video recording that was broadcast around the world and posted on countless Web sites, Mr. Hussein is shown standing on the gallows platform with the noose around his neck at dawn on Saturday, facing a barrage of mockery and derision from unseen tormentors below the gallows.

As the shock of those scenes reached a new crescendo in Iraq, American officials said that they had worked until the last hours of Mr. Hussein's life to persuade Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to delay the execution. The officials, who spoke on condition that they not be identified, said they appealed to Mr. Maliki not to execute Mr. Hussein at dawn on Saturday because of the onset of a major Islamic festival, and because of constitutional and legal questions that the Americans believed threw the legitimacy of the execution into doubt.

But when Mr. Maliki decided to go ahead with the hanging, the Americans said they made no further attempts to stop it, having concluded that they could advise the Iraqis against the execution, but not prevent it if the Iraqis persisted, out of respect for Iraqi sovereignty.

When asked if that decision had been made in the White House, the Americans refused to say, noting only that it came some time before the final exchanges on Friday night. Mr. Hussein was hanged at 6:10 a.m. on Saturday, about seven hours after what the officials said was their final attempt to postpone the hanging.

"We told the prime minister that going forward on the first day of Id would have a negative reaction in the Islamic world, and among the Iraqi people," a senior American official said, recounting a telephone conversation with Mr. Maliki that began at 10:30 p.m. Baghdad time on Friday. The reference was to the Id al-Adha holiday, which began for Sunnis on Saturday, marking the end of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. "Therefore," the official said, "we said we thought it would be better if they delayed until after Id, and use the delay to resolve the legal issues."

The American official said that Mr. Maliki had never fully explained his urgency in carrying out the death sentence, which was upheld last Tuesday in an appeals court ruling that set off a 30-day countdown for executions to be carried out after a final appeal has been turned down. But the prime minister gave one explanation that appeared to weigh heavily on his mind, the American said, and that was his fear that Mr. Hussein might be the subject of an insurgent attempt to free him if the procedural wrangling over the execution were protracted.

"His concern was security, and that there was a danger that if it continued, maybe there would be a mass kidnapping to bargain for Saddam Hussein's release," the official said. "He was concerned that he might somehow get free."

The American decision to confirm that they had opposed the quick execution came after days of silence from the American Embassy and the United States military command in Baghdad, which appeared to have been shocked, like so many others, by the unofficial video recording that showed the bedlam at the gallows.

With some Iraqi politicians raising fresh demands for Mr. Maliki's dismissal, the Americans, in offering to have a senior official discuss the matter in a telephone interview with The New York Times, appeared eager to protect the Bush administration from a fresh surge of criticism for its handling of events in Iraq.

The official said that among American officials in Iraq who had tried to stop Mr. Maliki from rushing Mr. Hussein to the gallows, the reaction to the scenes of abuse had been one of dismay.

"Well, yes, when I think of the behavior of the people who were there, I'm disappointed and distressed, that's true," the official who spoke in the telephone interview said. He said he had been one of the Americans who intervened with Mr. Maliki on Friday night and earlier last week to try to delay the hanging.

Mr. Maliki seemed equally eager to ward off the opprobrium stirred by the execution. As his aides announced that the events at the hanging would be the subject of an inquiry, one of the officials who attended the hanging, a prosecutor at the trial that condemned Mr. Hussein to death, said that one of two men he had seen holding a cellphone camera aloft to make a video of Mr. Hussein's last moments — up to and past the point where he fell through the trapdoor — was Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Mr. Maliki's national security adviser. Attempts to reach Mr. Rubaie were unsuccessful. The prosecutor, Munkith al-Faroun, said the other man holding a cellphone above his head was also an official, but he could not recall his name.

The government inquiry was ordered as a groundswell of protest grew at Sunni population centers across Iraq. The protests, sporadic in the first 72 hours after the hanging, appeared to be building in intensity as Iraqi and American troops relaxed security cordons that had been thrown around centers of diehard support for Mr. Hussein, including his hometown, Tikrit, 100 miles north of Baghdad, and Awja, the village where he was born, a few miles away. The protesters carried portraits of Mr. Hussein, chanted his name, and fired weapons in the air.

Thousands of mourners flocked to Awja, where Mr. Hussein's body has lain in a reception hall. The body, in a plain wood coffin draped in an Iraqi flag, has become a point of pilgrimage for loyalists. Many of those reaching Awja have wept as they filed past the coffin, shouting slogans of fealty of the kind that were universal in Iraq when Mr. Hussein was the country's dictator.

"Maliki, you coward, you are an American agent," cried one demonstrator in Tikrit, referring to the prime minister. "Iran, out, out!" another man shouted, echoing anger among Sunnis at the rise to power in Baghdad of Shiite religious groups backed by Iran, including Mr. Maliki's Dawa Party.

After Mr. Maliki made it clear to the Americans in Baghdad that his decision was final, the official who discussed the events on Friday night said, American commanders were told to deliver Mr. Hussein to an execution bloc in the Kadhimiya district of northern Baghdad that Mr. Hussein's military intelligence agency used to execute countless opponents of his government. At 4 a.m., Mr. Hussein was flown by an American military helicopter from an American detention center and handed over to the Iraqis. He was hanged with only Iraqis present, in a group of about 25, including executioners and guards, according to accounts by American and Iraqi officials.

A postponement of the execution until after the holiday would have delayed it at least until Thursday of this week. But the American officials said they had made no stipulation as to how long the delay should be, since their concern, beyond respecting the sanctity of the Id al-Adha holiday, had been that Mr. Maliki should await a formal judicial ruling resolving the legal issues before going ahead with the hanging.

The Americans said Mr. Maliki had agreed, as the Americans had urged, to ask the chief judge of Iraq's Supreme Judicial Council, Midhat al-Mahmoud, to issue a formal written judgment saying that the uncompleted legal procedures that concerned the Americans were not necessary to the lawfulness of the hanging. But Judge Mahmoud refused, the Americans said, and around midnight on Friday the Iraqi leader decided to go ahead with the execution, signing a decree ordering that Mr. Hussein be "hanged by the neck until dead."

The legal issues the Americans said they urged Mr. Maliki to resolve before the hanging centered on a constitutional provision requiring Iraq's three-man presidency council to affirm all executions before they are carried out. That posed a potential obstacle to the hanging because Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, is opposed to the death penalty. One of the other members of the council, Tariq al-Hashemi, is a Sunni from a moderate party that has disavowed Mr. Hussein, but has been careful not to endorse his trial and execution.

Mr. Maliki, in pushing ahead with the hanging, relied on a provision in the statute that established the Iraqi High Tribunal, which convicted Mr. Hussein, which said that the tribunal's verdicts, once upheld by its own appeal bench, were final and not subject to presidential review. It was that conflict the Americans said they wanted resolved by a written ruling from Judge Mahmoud. "Mr. Maliki said that Judge Mahmoud had given that opinion orally, but we said it would be better for everybody if he said it in writing," the American official who discussed the standoff said.

Sami al-Askari, a political adviser to Mr. Maliki who attended the hanging, said in a telephone interview that the committee would question everyone present at the execution. He said those who used their cellphones to record the event would be one focus of the inquiry. He said his own observation was that the worst sectarian taunts had come from a guard he described as a poorly educated Shiite man with a thick Arabic accent. "It was horrible, it was terrible, it was a mistake," he said. "We were supposed to sit there quietly, just looking at what's going on."

The first images of the execution that were released were in the form of an official video recording without sound. The unofficial cellphone images showed Mr. Hussein, with the noose around his neck, facing shouts of "Go to hell!" and taunts of "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" in reference to an unruly Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, who has become a populist hero among Shiites.

Speaking of those protesting the abuse of Mr. Hussein, Mr. Faroun, the prosecutor, asked, "Where were these critics when Saddam's people were executing whole prisons full of innocent people?" He said he had been deeply offended by the taunting of Mr. Hussein, and had tried to stop it. "You heard my voice on the cellphone recording," he said. "I was the one shouting, 'Please, no. The man is about to be executed.' "

Iraq To Probe Disorder At Hussein's Execution (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Nancy Trejos

BAGHDAD, Jan. 2 -- As thousands of Saddam Hussein's supporters protested in Sunni Arab enclaves across Iraq, the Shiite-led government said it had launched an investigation into the chaotic scene at his execution, captured on video, which has deepened the nation's sectarian rift and sparked condemnation around the world.

Iraqi officials said a committee from the Interior Ministry would likely question everyone, including senior Iraqi officials, who was present at the hanging, where witnesses mocked and jeered the ousted president as he stood at the gallows. Hours later, grainy video of the event, taken with a cellphone camera, was broadcast around the world, bringing more pressure on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take action.

The video triggered outrage, in Iraq and abroad, at Hussein's undignified and disorderly end. Iraq's Sunnis declared the execution an act of Shiite revenge. The Vatican, in its official newspaper, called the images from the hanging "a spectacle" that violated human rights and could harm Iraq's process of reconciliation. The Italian government, which like all members of the European Union opposes the death penalty, said after the appearance of the video that it would push at the United Nations for a worldwide moratorium on capital punishment.

U.S. officials have declined to comment publicly, but have privately expressed concern at the hastiness of the execution, which came just four days after an appeals court upheld Hussein's death sentence.

The video was the latest example of how amateurs using modern technology are exposing abuses and holding the powerful to account. The investigation, officials said, would focus not only on who hurled the taunts but also on how the video was leaked, damaging the government's credibility. Maliki's political adviser, Sadiq al-Rikabi, said the prime minister was "disappointed about that film."

"He took the subject very seriously," Rikabi said. "The prime minister tried his best to implement the execution very respectfully."

In the video, one person yells, "Go to hell," at Hussein while another voice is heard chanting, "Moqtada, Moqtada, Moqtada," referring to Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric whose father and two brothers were assassinated by Hussein's regime. The taunts provoked Hussein to hurl insults. Later, images of Hussein's swinging body were plastered on dozens of Web sites. On the video-sharing site Youtube.com, a search using the terms "Saddam Hussein hanging" generated 1,559 results as of Tuesday night.

The probe could implicate senior Iraqi officials. Munqith al-Faroun, the deputy prosecutor in Hussein's trial, said in a telephone interview Tuesday that he saw two official observers using their cellphones to record Hussein's last moments. The two men, he said, were "recording through their mobiles openly." He said he did not recognize them, but could do so if he saw them again.

Maliki aides said they did not think any officials were behind the video.

"I think [it was] one of the guards, but let us leave everything to the inquiry," Rikabi said.

"I am confident that they were not the guards, for I checked the guards. I kept them under my eye," Faroun said. "They were not people who came off the street." Iraqi officials had been flown in by two U.S. helicopters from the Green Zone an hour before the execution.

Faroun, who could be heard in the video appealing for calm, said he had considered walking out during the disorderly moments, which would have halted the execution because his presence was required by law. But soon the room quieted.

"If there were other violations, I would have stepped out," he said. "I did not make a threat. But it was in my mind. If I noticed another violation, I would have stopped the execution and taken other measures," he added, without being specific.

Faroun said he did not know how the video cellphones were taken into the execution room at the former military intelligence headquarters, where Hussein's government had tortured and killed his opponents. Everyone at the hanging, Faroun said, was searched and had their phones taken. "Even my cellphone, which had no camera, was taken," he said.

[A] news agency, meanwhile, reported that U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad had urged Maliki to postpone the execution for two weeks until after the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha, but that he relented after Maliki produced documents legally authorizing the execution. U.S. officials declined to comment on the report.

Meanwhile, in Hussein's home town of Tikrit, peaceful protests continued for the third straight day. On Tuesday morning, several thousand demonstrators marched to the nearby village of Auja, where Hussein is buried. Firing guns into the air, they chanted, "Revenge, revenge," and, "We shall always remain Baathists," referring to Hussein's outlawed Baath Party. The protesters carried portraits of the former leader depicting him as the hero of the Arab Nation.

Thousands more Sunnis protested in the northern city of Mosul, while in Baghdad, similar but smaller demonstrations have taken place in several mainly Sunni neighborhoods.

"This action really put a great difficulty in front of us," said Alaa Maki, an influential Sunni politician, referring to the execution and video. "So many people now are having strong reactions against the Shiites, and they're doing shouts here and there and saying Saddam is a hero. This will not benefit the building of the political process."

He added that Maliki needed to take decisive action against Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia. "Now he's in a very critical state," Maki said of the prime minister. "My advice to him is he has to sign -- as he signed the execution of Saddam -- he has to sign the pulling out of weapons of the Mahdi Army and the militias. Otherwise, he's a prime minister for Shiites. Not only for Shiites but for al-Sadr and the people of all the militias."

Rikabi scoffed at the criticism from Sunnis that the execution showed Maliki's inability to control militias. "This is not related to the militias," he said. "You can't judge the ability of the prime minister by this."

"To be honest with you, many people try to defend Saddam," he said. "They can't say, 'Oh, Saddam was a very good president. Why did you kill him?' So they try to find some small mistakes here or there."

On Tuesday, the U.S. military reported that an American soldier was killed and three others were wounded when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol southwest of Baghdad on Monday. The soldiers were in a village talking to residents about sectarian violence in the area. An interpreter was among the three injured.

Iraq PM Orders Probe Of Saddam Execution (AP)

By Christopher Torchia

AP, January 3, 2007

Iraq's prime minister ordered an investigation Tuesday into Saddam Hussein's execution to try to uncover who taunted the former dictator in the last minutes of his life, and who leaked inflammatory footage taken by camera phone of the hanging.

The unofficial video, on which at least one person is heard shouting "To hell!" at the deposed president and Saddam is heard exchanging insults with his executioners, dealt a blow to Iraq's efforts to prove it was a neutral enforcer of the law. Instead, the emotional, politicized spectacle raised tensions between the Shiite majority and Sunni Arabs who ran the country until their benefactor, Saddam, was ousted in the U.S.-led invasion of 2003.

A prosecutor who saw the hanging said some of the taunting came from guards outside the execution chamber, not the masked ones who put the noose around Saddam's neck.

The Iraqi government did not say what, if any, punishment would await anyone uncovered in its probe of guards and 14 selected witnesses who attended the execution at a Baghdad prison before dawn Saturday. Some were high-ranking officials or people affiliated with radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a political ally of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who had wanted to speed up the timing of the execution after an appeals court upheld the death sentence.

The grainy video appeared on the Internet late Saturday. Al-Jazeera television also showed the footage at that time, saying it was exclusive.

The footage contained audio of people taunting Saddam with chants of "Muqtada," a reference to al-Sadr. Also on the video, Saddam accuses his tormentors of being unmanly in scenes that stop just short of pandemonium.

The video was inflammatory not only because the chanting was clearly audible, but also for showing the ghastly spectacle of Saddam plummeting through the gallows trapdoor and dangling in death, his vacant eyes open and his snapped neck almost at a right angle to the line of his shoulders.

In contrast, the official video showed masked executioners placing a heavy noose around Saddam's neck, without a soundtrack. Another official video shows Saddam wrapped in a burial shroud after his death, though his head and neck are exposed as proof of his identity.

Munqith al-Faroon, an Iraqi prosecutor who helped convict and sentence Saddam to death for the killings of 148 people in the town of Dujail in 1982, said he was a witness to the hanging. He said two top officials had their mobile phones with them — even though the government-approved witnesses had been searched before boarding U.S. helicopter that carried them from the Green Zone to the site of the execution, their cell phones placed in a box for safekeeping.

Al-Faroon did not name the officials who had their phones and said he did not know whether the Iraqi government had approved the mobile phone video.

"It might be for money. Maybe he decided from the start to film it and to sell it to the satellite TV channels," al-Faroon said in an interview with TV2, a Danish television network. "I do not think that an investigation is necessary if they only filmed it for money. The execution was not a secret. The filming was not against the law."

Still, the prime minister "ordered the formation of an investigative committee in the Interior Ministry to identify who chanted slogans inside the execution chamber and who filmed the execution and sent it to the media," said Sami al-Askari, a political adviser to the Iraqi leader.

Al-Faroon said he vigorously protested when people began to shout just before Saddam was executed, and that shouts of "Muqtada" came from guards outside the execution chamber.

"I am certain that the chanting at the moment of the execution was not organized, and that those chanting were not being ordered to do so," al-Faroon told TV2. "The guards made a decision to do so by themselves. This is the truth. I shouted at them and ordered them to keep silent. My voice is very clear in the recording."

In the leaked video, one voice called: "Allah, bless those who pray for Muhammad and his descendants. Allah, pray for Muhammad and his descendants and may they bring us their help soon and curse their enemies and back their son Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada."

At that point Saddam asked, "Is this manly?"

A voice responded, "To hell."

Another voice called out, "Long live Mohammed Baqir al-Sadr" — a reference to the Dawa Party founder and Shiite cleric who was executed along with his sister by Saddam in 1980.

Then, a voice purportedly belonging to al-Faroon said: "Please no, this man is being executed, please no, I beg you no."

After Saddam was dropped through the trapdoor, a voice is heard shouting, "Don't rush, come back!" That suggests people were moving toward the body. However, the leader of Saddam's clan has said the body showed no signs of mistreatment after it was returned to Saddam's hometown Sunday.

It was unclear how many guards attended the execution. On the official video, seven people were on the gallows platform with Saddam. They included five guards in masks, a man without a mask whose face was blurred over, and a photographer.

Sadiq al-Rikabi, an adviser to the prime minister, told the U.S.-financed Al-Hurra television that he does not know who leaked the video and that such an act "is wrong and should be investigated, and I agree that cellular telephones were taken from witnesses before they boarded the helicopter" that headed to the execution site.

"I am full of hope that the results of the investigation will be announced, and the person who did this act should pay a price," al-Rikabi said. Still, the results of some Iraqi government probes in the past have not been released.

The Vatican's official newspaper on Tuesday decried media images of the hanging as a "spectacle" violating human rights and harming efforts to promote reconciliation in Iraq.

Within the country, Saddam's execution and the way it was conducted have provoked anger among Sunni Muslims, who have taken to the streets in mainly peaceful demonstrations across the country.

On Monday, a crowd of Sunni mourners in Samarra marched to a bomb-damaged Shiite shrine and were allowed by guards and police to enter the holy place carrying a mock coffin and photos of the former dictator.

The protest took place at the Golden Dome, a Shiite shrine bombed by Sunni extremists 10 months ago. That attack triggered the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiites.

On Tuesday, police in Baghdad said they had found 45 bodies scattered around the city. Many had been blindfolded, handcuffed and shot, apparent victims of sectarian violence.

Iraqi Government To Investigate Saddam Execution (USAT)

USA Today, January 3, 2007

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government moved Tuesday to deal with allegations that the execution of Saddam Hussein turned into an unruly scene where the former dictator was cursed in his final moments of life.

The government plans an investigation to try to uncover who taunted Saddam and who leaked inflammatory footage of the hanging taken by a camera phone, said Sami al-Askari, a political adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Sadiq al-Rikabi, another adviser to the prime minister, told Al-Hurra television that he does not know who leaked the video and that such an act "is wrong and should be investigated."

Saddam's execution has prompted mainly peaceful demonstrations by Sunni Muslims in Iraq.

Blair's Deputy Calls Taunting Of Hussein At Execution 'Deplorable' (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 2 — Britain's deputy prime minister said Tuesday that the taunting and baiting that accompanied Saddam Hussein's execution was unacceptable and that the people responsible should be condemned for taking part.

"I think the manner was quite deplorable, really," said the deputy prime minister, John Prescott. "I don't think one can endorse in any way that, whatever your views about capital punishment."

Responding to the murky scenes that emerged after the execution showing witnesses and guards chanting and telling Saddam to "go to hell" as his executioners prepared to hang him, Mr. Prescott added: "Frankly, to get that kind of recorded messages coming out is totally unacceptable, and I think whoever is involved and responsible for it should be ashamed of themselves."

But in a terse exchange with an interviewer on BBC radio, Mr. Prescott refused to be drawn into criticizing the Iraqi government, which had custody of Mr. Hussein and which arranged his execution. “If they are responsible, I pass my comment and that’s where I stand,” he said.

Images of Mr. Hussein with a noose around his neck have been plastered across newspapers and shown on television all weekend here. In a country implacably opposed to the death penalty, the sight has been shocking, as was the speed with which it was carried out.

Prime Minister Tony Blair, on vacation in Florida, has not spoken publicly about Mr. Hussein’s death, an omission that has been seized on by antiwar members of his Labor Party as another misstep in a long succession of them on Iraq. But the foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, released a statement last week saying that while she welcomed the fact that Saddam had been tried and “held to account,” the British government had made it clear that it opposed the death penalty.

“We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation,” she said. Asked if the government had also complained to the Iraqis about how the execution was carried out, Mr. Prescott repeated what Ms. Beckett had said.

Saddam Execution Video Draws Criticism (AP)

By Anita Chang

AP, January 3, 2007

Grainy cell phone video of Saddam Hussein's execution triggered international criticism Tuesday, with Britain's deputy prime minister calling the leaked images "unacceptable" and the Vatican decrying the footage as a "spectacle" violating human rights.

Meanwhile, the Italian government pushed for a U.N. moratorium on the death penalty, Cuba called the execution "an illegal act," and Sunnis in Iraq took to the streets in mainly peaceful demonstrations across the country.

The unofficial video showed a scene that stopped just short of pandemonium, during which one person is heard shouting "To hell!" at the deposed president and Saddam is heard exchanging insults with his executioners. The inflammatory footage also showed Saddam plummeting through the gallows trapdoor and dangling in death.

The grainy video appeared on the Internet and Al-Jazeera television late Saturday. On Tuesday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki ordered an investigation into the execution to try to uncover who taunted the former dictator, and who leaked the cell phone footage.

At the United Nations, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon ran into trouble on his first day of work when he failed to state the U.N.'s official stance opposing capital punishment and said it should be a decision of individual countries.

"Saddam Hussein was responsible for committing heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against Iraqi people and we should never forget victims of his crime," Ban said in response to a reporter's question about Saddam's execution Saturday for crimes against humanity. "The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide."

His ambiguous answer put a question mark over the U.N.'s stance on the death penalty, although Ban's spokeswoman said there was no change in policy.

British Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott said those who leaked the footage should be condemned.

"I think the manner was quite deplorable really. I don't think one can endorse in any way that, whatever your views about capital punishment," Prescott said in an interview with British Broadcasting Corp. radio.

"Frankly, to get the kind of recorded messages coming out is totally unacceptable and I think whoever is involved and responsible for it should be ashamed of themselves."

The Holy See's daily, L'Osservatore Romano, lamented that "making a spectacle" of the execution had turned capital punishment into "an expression of political hubris."

The execution "represented, for the ways in which it happened and for the media attention it received, another example of the violation of the most basic rights of man," L'Osservatore wrote.

The office of Italian Premier Romano Prodi said Italy would seek the support of other countries that oppose capital punishment to put the issue of a moratorium to the U.N. General Assembly. Italy and all other European Union countries ban capital punishment.

Italy, which is one of the rotating members of the U.N. Security Council, has lobbied unsuccessfully for U.N. action against the death penalty.

On Monday, a crowd of Sunni mourners in Samarra marched to a bomb-damaged Shiite shrine, the Golden Dome, and were allowed by guards and police to enter the holy place carrying a mock coffin and photos of the former dictator.

The shrine was bombed by Sunni extremists 10 months ago, an attack that triggered the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiites.

Communist Cuba, which allows capital punishment, called Saddam's execution "an illegal act in a country that has been driven toward an internal conflict in which millions of citizens have been exiled or lost their lives."

The Foreign Ministry statement Monday said the island nation "has a moral duty to express its point of view about the assassination committed by the occupying power."

The U.S. military had held Saddam since capturing him in December 2003 but turned him over to the Iraqi government for his execution.

New U.N. Secretary Begins By Addressing Capital Punishment (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — On his first official day on the job, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon stepped back from the United Nations' long-standing opposition to the death penalty, saying capital punishment is an issue for each country to decide.

Ban's statement contrasted sharply with his predecessors' public rejection of the death penalty, and with the condemnation by the United Nations' special envoy to Iraq of Saddam Hussein's execution last weekend.

Responding to a question about the execution, Ban said the former Iraqi leader "was responsible for committing heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against the Iraqi people. We should never forget the victims of his crimes."

But, he added, "The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide."

"At the same time," he said, "I would hope that the international member states would pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian laws"

It was Ban's first official statement as secretary-general. His aides spent the rest of the day trying to further explain his comments.

Michele Montas, his new spokeswoman, insisted that there was no change in U.N. policy, and that what Ban had said "was his own nuance" on the death penalty. South Korea has capital punishment, as do the United States, China and Russia, three permanent members of the Security Council.

"The U.N. policy still remains that the organization is not for capital punishment," she said.

Human-rights groups said that the death penalty was not a clear-cut issue under international law but that an optional protocol to the legally binding International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights said that the abolition of the death penalty would contribute to human dignity and rights.

"We feel strongly that he missed an opportunity to make an unequivocal statement about the death penalty, which we believe is a human-rights abuse, and we look forward to stronger positions in the future," said Peggy Hicks, global advocacy director for Human Rights Watch.

At his informal news conference in front of the Security Council chamber, Ban also said that the crisis in Sudan's Darfur region was "very high on my agenda" and that his first trip would be to an African Union summit at the end of the month in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, where he planned to talk to Sudanese President Omar Al-Bashir.

North Korea's nuclear ambition is another top priority, Ban said. He told reporters he would do whatever he could to help along six-party talks. As the former foreign minister of South Korea, he was directly involved in the talks and has pledged to be personally engaged in the issue.

He said that he was starting his duties at a daunting time but that the world's crises needed to be addressed as a common effort. "Not a single person, including the secretary-general of the United Nations, not a single country, however strong," can deal with the challenges alone, he said.

Ban has begun to name his new Cabinet, a process that tries to balance merit with geographical representation. His first appointment was his chief of staff, Vijay Nambiar, a former undersecretary general and ambassador from India to the United Nations. His new spokeswoman, Montas, is a broadcaster from Haiti who joined the United Nations after her journalist husband was murdered in 2002.

New U.N. Chief Invites Controversy By Declining To Oppose Hussein Execution (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 2 — On his first day of work as secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, the mild-spoken South Korean diplomat who had suggested he would bring new caution to the post, invited controversy by declining to criticize the death penalty applied to Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Ban commented on the execution of Mr. Hussein just after entering United Nations headquarters on Tuesday morning to start his job.

“Saddam Hussein was responsible for committing heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against the Iraqi people,” Mr. Ban said in response to questions from a crush of reporters outside the Security Council’s chambers. “We should never forget the victims of his crimes, “ he said.

“The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide,” he added.

“While I am firmly against impunity, I also hope the members of the international community should pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian laws.”

Mr. Ban’s remarks appeared to contradict bedrock United Nations policy opposing the death penalty on human rights grounds.

He seemed to have tripped in his effort to tread lightly on the political views of the many United Nations members.

The remarks also seemed to show that Mr. Ban, who was South Korea’s foreign minister when he was chosen in October as secretary general, had not completed the transition from representing his country to leading the United Nations.

Michèle Montas, Mr. Ban’s spokeswoman, said the death penalty was legal in South Korea.

On Dec. 30, hours after Mr. Hussein was hanged, the United Nations special representative for Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, said in Baghdad that although the United Nations “understands the desire for justice felt by many Iraqis,” it could not support the execution.

“Based on the principle of respect for the right to life,” Mr. Qazi said, “the United Nations remains opposed to capital punishment, even in the case of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.”

Ms. Montas, whose first day on the job also was Tuesday, said Mr. Ban had not intended to change United Nations policy, but had added his own “nuance.” Mr. Hussein was hanged in a hasty execution at dawn on Dec. 30, in a chamber where many Iraqis had been killed under his brutal rule.

In public comments before his first meeting with United Nations staff, Mr. Ban said, “We have to show the international community that we are ready and eager to change.” He said the organization had faced “harsh and sometimes unfair criticism,” and acknowledged that “staff morale has plummeted.” But he said United Nations workers must be ready to “multitask” and to move frequently from armchair jobs at headquarters in New York into the field.

“My watchword will be meritocracy,” he said, in words that should be well received by the Bush administration, which backed Mr. Ban to succeed Kofi Annan, who served two five-year terms, in part because of Mr. Ban’s pledges to streamline the United Nations bureaucracy.

In veiled words, Mr. Ban seemed to hint that he would not overreach his power, but that he expected cooperation from the United States. Speaking of the many crises facing the organization, he said, “Not a single person, including the secretary general of the United Nations; not a single country, however strong, powerful, resourceful, maybe, can address this.”

New U.N. Chief Defends Death Penalty For Hussein (WP)

By Colum Lynch

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 2 -- U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon said Tuesday that Iraq and other countries have the right to impose the death penalty, adding that the world should never forget Saddam Hussein's "heinous crimes."

Ban's first public reaction to Hussein's execution signaled a sharp break from his predecessor, Kofi Annan, an ardent death-penalty critic who opposed U.N. participation in the Iraqi war crimes tribunal that sentenced Hussein to die. Human rights advocates expressed concern that Ban's comments lend credibility to what they see as a flawed trial of the former Iraqi leader, and complained that he could set back efforts to abolish the death penalty.

The remarks suggest that the former South Korean foreign minister, who began a five-year term on Monday, would defer to the United Nations' 192 member states on some of the day's most controversial and unsettled issues. Nearly 70 countries, including the United States and South Korea, retain the death penalty.

"Saddam Hussein was responsible for committing heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against the Iraqi people," Ban said in his first news conference as secretary general. "The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide."

Ban said that while he is "firmly against impunity" for the world's despots, he would also urge states to "pay due regard" to international humanitarian law in meting out justice to a deposed leader. "The Iraqi people and government have taken steps to address their past, and I hope that the international community should also understand the stakes and try to build the rule of law nationally and internationally," he said.

Ban's remarks come just one day after the top U.N. representative in Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, said that the world body "remains opposed to capital punishment, even in the case of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide." But Ban and his spokeswoman, Michele Montas, repeatedly declined to say Tuesday whether the U.N. chief agrees with that view.

"The U.N. policy still remains that the organization is not for capital punishment," Montas said. Ban thinks "there are some countries that do recognize the death penalty. He would like to just leave it open to the countries." She characterized Ban's comments as "a nuance on the situation, stating that we should think first of the victims and the need for justice."

The death penalty debate unfolded as Ban began his first day as secretary general by paying homage to U.N. officials who lost their lives in the service of the world body, and by dining with employees in the U.N. cafeteria.

"My watchword will be meritocracy, with due regard for gender balance and geographical representation," he said in his first meeting with U.N. staff.

Behind the scenes, the United States, Britain, France and other U.N. governments pressed Ban to appoint their nationals to key senior posts in the organization.

Ban will announce on Wednesday the appointment of Britain's former ambassador to France, Sir John Holmes, to head the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, an emergency relief organization, according to two Security Council diplomats.

Alicia Barcena Ibarra, a former Mexican official who served as Annan's chief of staff, will be named undersecretary for management and administration, a position that has been traditionally held by an American national, according to senior U.N. officials and diplomats.

A U.S. candidate is being considered for other senior posts, possibly as the head of the U.N. Department of Political Affairs or as a senior official in the U.N. peacekeeping department, U.S. and French diplomats said. The French, who currently hold the top peacekeeping job, are also expected to hold a senior position in the peacekeeping department.

Ban also plans to appoint a woman from the developing world to serve as his deputy. Montas is from Haiti, and his new chief of staff, Vijay Nambiar, is a former Indian deputy national security adviser who served as special adviser to Annan.

Ban Cool On Envoy's Words (WT)

New United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon yesterday backed away from comments by the world body's top representative in Iraq criticizing the execution of former dictator Saddam Hussein.

Meeting reporters in New York on his first full day on the job, Mr. Ban said Saddam was guilty of "heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against the Iraqi people, and we should never forget the victims of these crimes."

"The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide," said the South Korean diplomat. " While I am firmly against impunity, I also hope that the members of the international community should pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian law."

On Saturday, the day Saddam was hanged in a north Baghdad prison, Ashraf Qazi, the U.N. point man in Baghdad, issued a statement saying the United Nations flatly opposed the death penalty, regardless of the crimes for which it is imposed.

The United Nations "understands the desire for justice felt by the many Iraqis," said Mr. Qazi, a Pakistani diplomat.

"Based on the principle of respect for the right to life, however, the United Nations remains opposed to capital punishment, even in the cases of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide."

Aftershocks from the execution of Saddam, 69, continued to roil the Iraqi political scene after images from a leaked cell-phone video recording showed some of the witnesses taunting the former dictator in the moments before he was hanged.

Many fear the raucous scene at the dingy prison room execution on the first day of a major Sunni Muslim holiday will only inflame sectarian violence in the country.

"This man destroyed 35 years of my life, for many years I dreamed about his death. But when I saw it, I was angry," said a Shi'ite Muslim doctor who watched the televised execution.

"When you take a man's life, it should be with respect," he said, speaking on the condition of anonymity out of fear for his safety.

A Sunni former military officer jailed twice by Saddam's regime said Saddam, unlike his executioners, behaved like a "real man" in his final minutes.

"Killing him with this funny trial and in this way, and on this date, made Saddam an Islamic and Arab hero," said the officer, who also declined to speak on the record.

Sami al-Askari, a close political adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, told the Associated Press that the prime minister had ordered an investigation to identify who chanted slogans and leaked the video of the execution to the press. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, an ethnic Kurd who has long opposed the death penalty, said in a statement he had not been aware the date for the execution had even been scheduled.

But Mr. al-Askari defended the decision to execute Saddam.

"This is an artificial uproar," he told Iraqi state television. " cannot say this court has been unjust, and so they take this mistake and forget that Saddam deserved to be executed."

Few foreign governments or war-crimes analysts supported the court case against Saddam and several aides, in large part because of the possibility of capital punishment.

The United Nations and the body's human rights agency have traditionally opposed capital punishment. But the world body also has long deferred to national laws on internal matters such as the death penalty, abortion and other difficult issues.

Michele Montas, Mr. Ban's spokeswoman, said Mr. Qazi was "tacitly referring" to the human rights agency's stand in questioning the decision to put Saddam to death. She denied that either Mr. Qazi or Mr. Ban was trying to alter long-standing U.N. policies on the death penalty.

Mr. al-Maliki, a Shi'ite who pushed strongly for Saddam's prompt execution last week, said in an interview published in the Wall Street Journal that he was ready to hand over the job of prime minister.

"I wish I could be done with it even before the end of this term," said Mr. al-Maliki, whose seven months in office have seen escalating violence and brutal sectarian reprisal killings.

A Hanging And A Funeral (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

DOJ_NMG_0110441

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Last Saturday was a strange day. It started with the hanging of Saddam Hussein. The more I read about the hasty, quasi-legal maneuvers used by Iraq's Shiite leaders to rush Saddam to the gallows on a Muslim holiday, Id al-Adha, and the more I watched the grainy cellphone video of the event, in which a guard is heard taunting Saddam with chants of "Moktada! Moktada!" — the Shiite cleric whose death squads have killed hundreds of Sunnis — and the more I read of the insults Saddam spat back, the more it resembled a tribal revenge ritual rather than the culmination of a constitutional process in which America should be proud to have participated.

Bassam al-Husseini, an aide to Iraq's Shiite prime minister, was quoted by the BBC as saying Saddam's execution was "an Id gift to the Iraqi people." Many Sunnis would not share that view. For his part, Saddam, a Sunni, used his last breaths to spew vitriol against "the traitors, the Americans, the spies and the Persians." For Persians, read Shiites.

No wonder the BBC's world affairs editor, John Simpson, reported from Baghdad: "Altogether, the execution as we now see it is shown to be an ugly, degrading business, which is more reminiscent of a public hanging in the 18th century than a considered act of 21st-century official justice. Under Saddam Hussein, prisoners were regularly taunted and mistreated in their last hours. The most disturbing thing about the new video of Saddam's execution for crimes precisely like this is that it is all much too reminiscent of what used to happen here."

But as I said, Saturday was a strange day. After watching Saddam's hanging in the morning, I was sitting at my computer late in the afternoon and suddenly heard the strains of "My country 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty" being played on the TV in the next room. When I checked what was going on, I saw President Ford's coffin being unloaded from Air Force One.

I have to admit I got a lump in my throat watching that scene and listening to that stirring melody. Saddam's execution was a snapshot of a country divided. Gerald Ford's funeral was a snapshot of a country united — political supporters and opponents alike paying tribute to a president, who was surrounded by an honor guard representing every color of the American rainbow and whose place in history was secured by an act of pardon and national healing.

How fortunate to live in a country where this is the political norm, built up over generations.

"Because of our basic unity, we can afford to be divided on specific issues," said Michael Mandelbaum, author of "The Case for Goliath." "Democracy is about differences and contesting them in the public sphere, and it only works when there is basic agreement about the fundamentals. We should feel fortunate that we have a democratic history and set of beliefs. Those beliefs can be imported by those who want them and don't have them, but they can't be exported. We can only create a context where others would want to import them."

The raw tribal theatrics of Saddam's hanging highlight just how few of these values Iraq has imported. We are to blame for not creating the security needed for those values to take hold. But not enough of our Iraqi allies have risen to the occasion, either. It was our closest Iraqi partners who oversaw Saddam's tribal hanging. We have to look that in the eye.

Saddam deserved to die 100 deaths. But imagine if Iraq's Shiite leaders had surprised everyone, declared that there had been enough killing in Iraq and commuted Saddam's sentence to life in prison — sparing his life in hopes of uniting the country rather than executing him and dividing it further. I don't know if it would have helped, but I do know Iraqis have rarely surprised us with gestures of reconciliation — only with new ways to kill each other.

Now President Bush wants a "surge" of more U.S. troops to Baghdad, in one last attempt to bring order. Whenever I hear this surge idea, I think of a couple who recently got married but the marriage was never very solid. Then one day they say to each other, "Hey, let's have a baby, that will bring us together." It never works.

If the underlying union is not there, adding a baby won't help. And if the underlying willingness to share power and resources is not present among the major communities in Iraq, adding more U.S. troops won't help either. Adding more troops makes sense only if it's to buy more time for positive trends that have already begun to appear on the horizon. I don't see them.

As Saddam's hanging underscored, Iraqis are doing things their way. So maybe it's time to get out of their way.

'He Was His Own Accuser' (WSJ)

By Marty Peretz

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110442

This is not the case of Oliver David Cruz, who was executed on Aug. 9, 2000. Cruz, whose I.Q. ranged from 63 to 83, had raped and murdered a 24-year-old woman stationed at Kelly Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas. If Cruz had lived until 2002, when the Supreme Court ruled the death sentence could not be imposed on mentally retarded people, he would have spent his life in prison. He was what we used to call, unsentimentally but truthfully, "an idiot." To me it was axiomatic that killing him was unjust. I do not ever really feel that the state is righteous when it snuffs out even a hardened criminal's breath. * * *

Saddam Hussein's execution was another matter entirely. Those who do not see that are blind to the implicit social compact of any polity, and to its always precarious situation. What this tyrant did in murdering hundreds of thousands and terrorizing millions more, within Iraq and outside it, was to normalize brutality, establish falsity and hysteria as the common language, and routinely invade the boundaries of private life. Saddam's crimes unraveled whatever authenticity and spontaneity was possible in the artificial confines of a post-Versailles state.

He also brought dread to this state's neighbors. Men and women trembled at his name. And for what purpose did Saddam put the people of Iraq and the region through these horrors? For the nihilistic purpose of sustaining his rule and that of his clan. And yet, as no one has reminded us in recent times, he also murdered kith and kin.

Seen from this perspective, the attacks on Saddam's death sentence, self-righteous and oh, so elementally moral, are petty and falsely framed. I am afraid it is the Vatican that has failed humankind most glaringly in this regard. True, it is not the Vicar of Christ who has spoken, but his designate, Cardinal Renato Martino, head of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace. Rome tends to speak portentously, urbi et orbi. Yet such speech is also often simple-minded.

"Capital punishment is not natural death," said Cardinal Martino. OK. That's obvious. So what? "Life is a gift that the Lord has given us," the cardinal continued, "and we must protect it from conception until natural death." In this rendering, are we supposed to imagine that Saddam is an innocent unborn fetus in his mother's womb? Is this a debate over abortion? Does Cardinal Martino have no conception of the dimensions of the tyrant's crimes? (Cardinal Martino does not always speak in such pabulum. He is often aggressive, as when he condemned the allied intervention in Iraq as a "war of aggression." The Vatican then told journalists that the cardinal was speaking for himself, not for John Paul II. Martino picked up many anti-American tropes during the 16 years he represented the Church at the U.N. Sixteen years, poor man, no wonder, he's a little overwrought and also disingenuous.)

Of course, many of the other critics of the death sentence do not speak of life as a benefaction from God. The folks who echo Amnesty International's denunciation would be horrified at the sheer thought. Ditto the European Union. The same for Romano Prodi, the socialist prime minister of Italy. And the antiterrorism officer at the U.N. Plus the governments of France, Denmark, Portugal, Spain and Germany.

Marco Pancetta, head of the Radical Party in Italy, had declared a hunger strike, was ready to go to Baghdad to petition for a "pardon." Yes, a hunger strike. Until death? Does Cardinal Martino believe a hunger strike natural? And, yes, a pardon. Was he out of his mind? Saddam's death has cheated Mr. Pancetta of his foolishness. Had the convict lived, we would have had to endure candlelight vigils throughout the soft countries. Soft power, indeed.

The burden of most of these objections to the death penalty is that the trial was not really fair. Now, these were certainly the most judicious legal proceedings ever held in modern Iraq. Is this not superior to victors' justice? The defendant had legal counsel of his own choosing, among them Ramsey Clark, not so mentally stable is my guess, but a former attorney-general of the U.S. and not an easily intimidated advocate. What's more, as Fouad Ajami has pointed out, the accused performed histrionics that were tolerated even though they made havoc of courtroom order. If Saddam were the accused in a U.S. tribunal, he would have been bound and gagged. In Saddam's own Iraq, he would have been lashed, at a minimum.

The Arab world is somewhat split about the sentence. Yemen, little Yemen, has actually announced that the country "unanimously" condemns everything about the trial: the process, the verdict and the punishment. You get some sense of what political discourse is like in a state where everything is (or is said to be) unanimous. Doubtless, Sunni Baathists were very close to unanimous in opposing it. But the Arab world and its non-Arab Muslim cousins, whatever they feel about the armed foreign presence in Iraq, could not honestly make the case against the penalty of death -- although some made the argument nonetheless. It is simply too routine, too ingrained in the fabric of their societies to be shocking. After all, you can juridically be condemned to death for having committed adultery (that is, if you are a woman), for stealing, for heresy and blasphemy. Moderate Arabs will breathe a sigh of relief now that the dictator is dead. And also those non-moderate Arabs whom he threatened.

Two surprising trends, one a great relief. The relief is that the people of Western Europe seem to be more sensible than their governments. Even the French, the Italians, the Spanish and others support the taking of Saddam's life. Like the Poles, and their prime minister, Jaroslaw Kaczynski. You have to have lived under a tyranny within your own memory to know why the tyrant should be punished, and punished decisively.

The other trend is a bit confusing. It shows itself especially in our stalwart ally, Great Britain, where the Labour government still adheres to the traditional alliance, in war and in peace. Margaret Beckett, Tony Blair's foreign secretary, spoke strongly in support of the hangman's noose.

But, ironically, there were counter-indications from the Tory right. Frustrated by its years in the political wilderness, the Conservatives much resent Labour's alliance with George Bush, even though they ridicule it. The brilliant showman-parliamentarian Boris Johnson, shadow minister for higher education, elicited from Ms. Beckett's predecessor, Jack Straw, already two years ago a statement of opposition to the ultimate penalty. Relying on Britain's longstanding opposition to capital punishment, they were working in consort against Mr. Blair's fidelity to how America sees the world. The prospect of Saddam's hanging would be their instrument.

Another, more recent sign of Conservative estrangement (not the only one) from the historically axiomatic bond with the U.S. is a querulous on-line column by the querulous Peregrine Worsthorne asserting that "Saddam was a butcher, so was Truman." Now, this is not a logical argument for anything. But his point was that Saddam's "cruel tyranny had at least provided the people with a degree of security quite unimaginable under conditions of freedom and democracy . . . a reign of fear may be the only effective system of government." This is cynicism of an especially low order. And if it gains currency in the house of Winston Churchill, where can it not become common wisdom? * * *

Saddam has already swung from the ropes. May his soul be tormented for eternity. If Saddam were a pious and literate Christian -- actually, he wasn't even a pious Muslim -- he might have recognized, as Dante did for Nimrod, that "he was his own accuser." His life is its own accusation.

The question, then, is not whether Iraq will recover from the oppressor's death. The question is whether Iraq will recover from the oppressor's rule. The execution of this monstrous man was not intended to be a deterrent to evil. There are probably no deterrents to real evil and real evildoers. But a community can punish its own pharaohs. That punishment will be the most significant sovereign act the people of Iraq have ever done. This is an act of recovery by itself.

Mr. Peretz is editor-in-chief of The New Republic.

Poor Execution (HC)

Houston Chronicle, January 3, 2007

Saddam Hussein's hanging lets condemned dictator play martyr while emphasizing sectarian blood lust

If any event in Iraq should have been completely under the control of U.S. forces and the government they defend, it was the final moments of condemned former dictator Saddam Hussein. Unfortunately, like so much else that has occurred since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, the tyrant's death turned into another fiasco and missed opportunity.

Like the legally questionable proceeding that produced his death sentence, the rush to put a noose around Saddam's head at the start of a Muslim holiday backfired, adding more fuel to the Shiite-Sunni conflagration that has engulfed Iraq while giving Saddam a last cell phone photo op breathing defiance against his enemies. His final words were "Down with the traitors, the Americans and the Persians." Rather than looking like the cowering vagrant that U.S. troops pulled out of a hole, the well-groomed fallen dictator exhibited nonchalance and sarcasm.

Like the raucous and sometimes out of control proceedings that resulted in Saddam's conviction for killing 148 Shiite villagers after a failed assassination attempt, the authorities' conduct at the execution only served notice how far the new Iraq has to go in meeting the standards of democratic justice. The elite government unit escorting Hussein to his death cursed the prisoner and broke into chants of "Muq- tada," referring to the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. According to The New York Times, two witnesses at the hanging wryly exchanged a quip that the behavior of the guards indicated the government had yet to stop the infiltration by sectarian militia.

Former NBC Evening News anchorman Tom Brokaw echoed a sentiment about the handling of the execution widely expressed in the news media. He told radio show host Don Imus that Saddam, a mass murderer with the blood of millions on his hands, was "able to stand up there with the hood off and invoke prayer and even invoke the Palestinians, and go out in the eyes of his people at least as a martyr." Brokaw described the execution scene as "something that resembled the worst kind of nightmare out of the old American West. "

The Vatican and most European heads of state denounced the execution out of a long-standing opposition to the death penalty. Apparently U.S. officials in Iraq had questioned the legality and wisdom of rushing Saddam to the gallows, but their concerns were overridden by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite. By hanging Saddam at the start of the Id al-Adha holiday, the government violated an Iraqi law followed in Saddam's time prohibiting public executions during holy periods. Sunnis reacted to the execution with nonviolent protest marches throughout Iraq, raising fears of new cycles of revenge killings by armed militias.

The execution also short-circuited Saddam's trial on charges of ordering poison gas attacks during the infamous Anfal campaign that killed thousands of his countrymen in the Kurdish city of Halabja. That proceeding would have presented a far different image of the dictator to the world than what was on display last weekend.

Without Saddam in the dock, few will hear the damning testimony that would have depicted a human monster rather than a nationalist martyr. It's unfortunate that won't be his final photo op.

Hanging Won't Bring U.S. Troops Home Sooner (VAPILOT)

The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, January 3, 2007

Celebration followed Saddam Hussein's death at the end of a hangman's noose this weekend – technically as punishment for killing 148 people nearly a quarter-century ago, but really for a reign of terror that lasted decades. Relief followed his death, too – the end of a madman's reign of terror over his own people and his own tiny corner of the planet.

In the days to follow, some might even welcome Saturday's grisly event as the beginning of the end to U.S. involvement in Iraq. That reasoning, sadly, would be false.

Saddam's crimes against humanity, and against anyone who dared to criticize his dictatorial rule, targeted Kurds and Shiites, women and children, foes and even two sons-in-law who had revealed details of Saddam's weapons programs. He engineered a disastrous eight-year war against Iran in the 1980s. He invaded Kuwait in 1990, only to be forced out by the U.S.-led coalition in the Persian Gulf War.

He was a menace to every Iraqi except for those among his Sunni base. But his death is unlikely to bring peace to the nation he left behind.

The execution early Saturday is cold comfort to the U.S. troops now stuck in Iraq, trying to impose stability on a fractured nation that seems to want none of it. Amid sectarian violence, warring militias and foreign insurgents, there's no end in sight to the mounting death toll of Americans and Iraqis alike. President Bush, who ordered the invasion of Iraq, is desperately trying to chart a new course there.

In a particularly cruel commentary, observers said the 80 Iraqis who died Saturday in bombings and other attacks were not unusually high, nor did the deaths appear be in retaliation for Saddam's execution. Eighty deaths have now become acceptable, the norm, just another day in this nation that U.S. troops invaded in 2003 to liberate.

And another grim milestone was reached Sunday. The Associated Press reported that at least 3,000 U.S. military personnel have been killed in Iraq since the war began. The news agency said Spc. Dustin R. Donica of Texas was killed Thursday by small arms fire. Thousands more U.S. troops have been wounded, maimed or worse.

This has occurred against a backdrop of an increasingly disenchanted American public; disaffection for the conduct of the war played the biggest part in the Democratic takeover of Congress two months ago. The U.S. has spent more than $350 billion for a conflict that shows no end in sight.

All of which provides a bloody, costly context in which to place Saddam's execution. When the history of this war is written in years to come, this weekend's hanging may be no more than a footnote.

A Regrettable Rush To Execution (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 3, 2007

IN HIS FINAL minutes, one of Saddam Hussein's executioners shouted, "Go to hell, Saddam." The condemned man replied dryly, "You mean the Iraq that is today." After his body dropped through the trap door, the assembled witnesses chanted Shi'ite slogans.

It was Saddam that turned Iraq into hell during his 35 years in power. He murdered as many as half a million Iraqis and plunged his country into two catastrophic wars with neighboring Iran and Kuwait.

But Saddam was not executed for any of this. Instead, he was hanged for ordering the killing of 148 Shi'ite men and boys in the village of Dujail in reprisal for an assassination attempt that took place there in July 1982. While the trial was criticized by human rights groups, the verdict was consistent with the evidence. Saddam's signature was on the order for the execution and he freely admitted that he had signed the document. His explanation -- that the killings were justified since the would-be killers were linked to the Iranian-backed Dawa Party and Iraq was then at war with Iran -- was no defense. Reprisal killings of innocent people are by definition a crime against humanity.

The manner of Saddam's execution made it clear that Iraq's Shi'ite leaders -- and in particular Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki -- were more interested in revenge than justice. Al-Maliki, a Dawa Party leader, signed the death warrant in apparent disregard of Article 70 of the Iraqi Constitution that gives Iraq's president and two vice presidents the responsibility for ratifying death sentences.

Saddam's execution meant there would be no accounting for his other crimes: the destruction of the marshes and the Marsh Arabs in the 1990s, the murder of tens of thousands of Shi'ites in the aftermath of the 1991 uprising, the killing of 8,000 members of the Barzani clan in 1983, the 1990 invasion of Kuwait, and the murder of tens of thousands in various purges over his decades in power.

Obviously, it was never practical to try Saddam Hussein for every crime he committed. But the rush to execution actually interrupted Saddam's ongoing trial on genocide charges in connection with the 1987-1988 "anfal" campaign against Iraq's Kurdish minority. That trial was scheduled to resume Jan. 8 and would have concluded in a matter of months.

The Kurdish genocide was the gravest -- and by far the best documented -- of Saddam's crimes. I stumbled across its beginning in September 1987 when, as a staff member for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I got permission to visit Kurdistan. When Haywood Rankin from the US embassy in Baghdad and I crossed from Arab to Kurdish territory, we were amazed that places shown on our maps no longer existed. Later, we came across deserted towns with bulldozers parked next to partially destroyed houses and realized what was happening. By 1990, Saddam had destroyed 4,500 of Iraq's 5,000 villages. He also used chemical weapons to attack at least 200 villages and towns. In September 1988, I led a mission with Chris Van Hollen (now a Maryland congressman) to document a series of bombings on 48 villages that took place days after the end of the Iran-Iraq war. Sixty-five-thousand survivors made it to Turkey and the ones we interviewed provided graphic -- and totally believable -- accounts of what they experienced.

The rubble of destroyed villages combined with eyewitness accounts made for a compelling case. But, Saddam's killers -- bureaucrats that they were -- kept detailed paper records of their work, along with videotapes of executions and torture sessions. The Kurds captured these records during the 1991 uprising that followed the first Gulf War, and a few months later Jalal Talabani (now Iraq's president) gave me custody of 14 tons of documents that eventually went to the National Archives. Supported by a congressional appropriation, Human Rights Watch used the documents to demonstrate that Saddam had committed genocide and thus helped lay the foundation for the case that was eventually brought.

The Kurdish trial also promised to shed light on a deeply amoral period in western diplomacy where the major powers, including the United States, chose to overlook genocide for strategic and economic reasons. According to his former foreign minister, Tariq Azziz, Saddam apparently intended to make an issue of western support in his trial. This could also have been awkward for some in the current administration. While serving in the Reagan or Bush administrations, some of the principals of the current war -- including Donald Rumsfeld and Colin Powell -- played down the significance of Iraq's use of poison gas, including, in the case of Powell, against the Kurds. And months after the 1988 gas attacks on the Kurds, the current president's father -- with the apparent support of his defense secretary, Richard Cheney -- doubled US financial assistance to Iraq.

An extension of Saddam's life for the few months would have made little difference to his eventual fate. But it would have made an enormous difference to have had an irrefutable record that Saddam was responsible for the genocide against the Kurds. As it is, the door is open to a future leader in Baghdad asserting it was never proven. Saddam's trials could have served as the basis for truth and reconciliation, as similar processes have done in so many other countries. Instead, the hanging will further divide Iraqis, and not just the Sunnis whose protests were predictable. Only President Bush, who still sees al-Maliki as a genuine national leader, could believe Saddam's execution, as it was carried out, to be a milestone on Iraq's path to democracy.

Saddam got the justice he so deserved. The rush to execution by Iraq's revenge-driven sectarian government denied the same to all but the tiniest fraction of his victims.

Just Desserts . . . (WT)

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

In a final blasphemy, Saddam Hussein, who spent most of his life as a murdering secularist, went to his justified death holding a Koran and offering his soul to God, if God would accept it. If God does, He will have to commute the sentences of Saddam's mass murdering predecessors, including Hitler, Stalin, Mao and Pol Pot.

These days, not much that makes religious sense comes out of Iraq, or anywhere else in the maniacal Middle East, but one reasonable statement did pass the lips of Sheik Sadralddin al-Qubanjib in the Shia "holy city" of Najaf. During a Friday sermon, the sheik described Saddam's execution as "God's gift to Iraqis" and prayed "Oh God, you know what Saddam has done. He killed millions of Iraqis in prisons, in wars with neighboring countries and he is responsible for mass graves. Oh God, we ask you to take revenge on Saddam."

That was a shorter summation than most prosecutors deliver in court, but in the end Saddam's execution wasn't about revenge. It was about justice. Many countries -- from Britain, which has abolished capital punishment, to Russia, where a moratorium on capital punishment now exists, have halted executions because they believe, incorrectly, that doing so makes them more humane. It does precisely the opposite and sends the message that innocent human life has less value than the life of a killer. It is more than curious that Britain and Russia, especially, have halted the death penalty for the guilty, but do nothing to restrict incredibly high abortion rates that kill the innocent. This reflects an inverted value system.

One of Saddam's lawyers, former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, appeared on the BBC shortly after Saddam's hanging was confirmed, complaining the trial was a "travesty." No, the travesty would have been in not trying and executing Saddam. Saddam mocked the innocent lives he took, showing disrespect to the relatives of the dead who had a valid claim to see justice done.

There may not be much to envy about Iraq these days, but the swiftness of Saddam's punishment is admirable. Had he been in the American legal system, lawyers might have clogged that system for years, allowing Saddam to die in prison. Instead, on Nov. 5, Saddam was convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to death. After the death order was signed, there was a 30-day window in which to carry out the execution. The Iraqis executed him within hours after the signing of the death order and just a few days after his appeal was denied.

Saddam's hanging will not quell the current violence he helped to foment in the aftermath of the U.S. invasion in 2003. This adds to the importance of the decision President Bush will announce in a few days regarding the next -- and possibly final -- effort to stabilize Iraq so the elected government might function. Part of that stabilization must include a new vision of Iraq's God, his disapproval of the sectarian killings and the deaths of so many innocents at the hands of insurgent terrorists. Since the West is regarded as the home of "infidels," a religious leader inside Iraq who has more than his own petty interests at stake will have to step forward and effectively call for an end to the turmoil. If such a person exists, he is unknown to the world.

Who will mourn Saddam's death? Probably not his family members, an estimated 40 of whom he either ordered murdered or personally dispatched. He even murdered his own son-in-law, who defected to Jordan and then returned to Iraq on Saddam's promise he would not be harmed.

In a letter addressed to "the Iraqi nation" shortly after his sentencing in November, Saddam demonstrated his self-delusion was complete: "Many of you have known the writer of this letter to be faithful, honest, caring for others, wise, of sound judgment, just, decisive, careful with the wealth of the people and of the state."

That one will bring some laughs among his fellow despots in Hades, just before the letter is consumed in the fire.

. . . Morally Justified (WT)

By Bruce Fein

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

Saddam Hussein is dead.

The moral universe is celebrating his execution by hanging.

His life was uninterrupted infamy, leaving a trail of corpses and misery wherever he stepped.

In January 1969, Saddam established his signature savagery with the hanging of 17 alleged Israeli spies in a downtown Baghdad square. All political rivals were eliminated in 1979 through firing squads and purges, inspired by one of Saddam's heroes, Joseph Stalin.

During his one-man rule, Saddam killed, brutalized and oppressed millions of his own citizens, especially Kurds and Shi'ites. The notorious Anfal campaign featuring the poison gas killings of 5,000 in the northern Kurdish village of Halabja was emblematic, a slaughter far more gruesome than Kristallnacht, Lidice or Guernica during the Third Reich. In contrast to Slobodan Milosevic, Saddam was eager to carry his malignancy abroad. He invaded Iran in 1980, inaugurating eight years of bloody clashes highlighted by rocket attacks on civilian populations. In 1990, Saddam invaded Kuwait, and during the ensuing Persian Gulf War fired Scud missiles into Tel Aviv.

He craved weapons of mass destruction to magnify his malevolence. When the Israeli Air Force destroyed Iraq's nuclear research facility at Osirik in June 1981, nations openly or silently rejoiced.

Adolph Eichmann was executed by Israel in 1962, despite his relatively junior status in the Third Reich, for complicity in the extermination of countless Jews in furtherance of Hitler's Final Solution. Neither then nor thereafter did a moral consensus emerge denouncing Eichmann's execution as disproportionate to his genocidal criminality. Saddam's hanging is an easier moral case. His crimes consisted not in following reprehensible orders, but in giving them; his victims were vastly greater in number; and, his motives were more squalid: absolute power mixed with religious and ethnic bigotry. Saddam remained impenitent to the end, confirmed by his last truculent outburst: "Down with the traitors, the Americans, the spies and the Persians."

The arguments against Saddam's execution are unconvincing. It is said that equally culpable dictators have escaped the death penalty or were never prosecuted at all, for example, Uganda's Ida Amin, Zaire's Mobutu Sese Seko, or the Soviet Union's Stalin. But simply because condign punishment is not universally achieved does not mean it should be forgone when circumstances permit, as with Saddam. By analogy, the fact that not all murderers are apprehended does not undermine the moral justice of punishing those who are caught and convicted. There might have been a case against Saddam's hanging if his prosecution or punishment had been substantially motivated by racial, religious or ethnic animus as opposed to the criminality of his conduct, which predominately targeted Kurds and Shi'ites. But such evidence of invidious motivation was lacking.

Occasional shortcomings marred Saddam's trial. Some defense lawyers were killed. The presiding judge's removal for alleged pro-Saddam bias was irregular. The prosecution's case was not invariably subject to cross-examination. But where evidence of guilt is notorious, procedural deficiencies are routinely treated as harmless error. And Saddam's responsibility for the deaths of hundreds of thousands was as incontrovertible as Stalin's liquidation of the Kulaks or Chairman Mao's harrowing Cultural Revolution.

Categorical opposition to the death penalty is morally unsound. Every civilized legal system permits intentional killings in self-defense or defense of others. The moral depravity of even attempting to kill a human being is thought sufficient to justify lethal force against the perpetrator. Saddam's depravity was much greater because of his direct or indirect responsibility for endless effectuated murders or massacres.

The United States has no right to be morally smug over Saddam's hanging. Intelligence and companion assistance were eagerly provided the Iraqi dictator during the Iraq-Iran war. The United States also participated in the United Nations' corruption-ridden oil-for-food program. According to the Government Accountability Office of the United States Congress, Saddam diverted at least $10 billion for his own use by executing off-book oil trades in exchange for bribes.

In sum, Saddam, like Afghanistan's Taliban and Osama bin Laden, was a partial creation of the United States. That should be remembered whenever America contemplates bolstering a dictator under the banner of Realpolitik.

Iraq: 12,000 Civilians Killed In '06 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

Iraq reported Tuesday that about 12,000 civilians were killed last year — the third full year since the U.S.-led invasion — with a dramatic rise in the last three months, when 5,000 died. Only about half as many Iraqi soldiers died in 2006 as American troops.

But the number of Iraqi security forces killed jumps to 1,543, nearly double the American death count of 823 for the year, when the deaths of police, who conduct paramilitary operations, are added to the number of slain Iraqi soldiers.

In all, the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior reported a total of 13,896 Iraqi civilians, police and soldiers died last year, 162 more than the tally kept by The Associated Press.

The AP count, assembled from its daily news reports, was always believed to be substantially lower than the actual number of deaths because the news cooperative does not have daily access to official accounting by the Iraqi ministries. Many deaths were thought to have gone unreported by AP.

Counts kept by other groups, including the United Nations, list far higher death tolls, which are disputed by the Iraqi government.

While the U.S. government and military provide no death totals for Iraqis, the U.N. Assistance Ministry for Iraq, UNAMI, does keep a count based on reports it gathers from the Baghdad morgue, Ministry of Health, and Medico-Legal Institute.

The figures for November and December are not yet available from the U.N., but as of the end of October the organization had reported 26,782 deaths in the first 10 months of 2006, nearly double what the Iraqi government and the AP reported for the entire year.

In its last report, the U.N. said 3,709 Iraqi civilians were killed in October alone and that citizens were fleeing the country at a pace of 100,000 each month. The organization estimates at least 1.6 million Iraqis had left since the war began in March 2003.

Life for Iraqis, especially in Baghdad and cities and towns in the center of the country, has become increasingly untenable. Many schools failed to open in September, and professionals — especially professors, physicians, politicians and journalists — are falling to sectarian killers at a stunning pace.

At the time of the last U.N. report, Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh called it "inaccurate and exaggerated" because it was not based on official government reports.

The U.N. report said Iraq's heavily armed Shiite militias were gaining strength and influence and that torture was rampant, despite the Iraqi government's vow to reduce human rights abuses.

"Hundreds of bodies continued to appear in different areas of Baghdad — handcuffed, blindfolded and bearing signs of torture and execution-style killing," the last UNAMI report said. "Many witnesses reported that perpetrators wear militia attire and even police or army uniforms."

The two primary militias in Iraq are the military wings of the country's strongest Shiite political groups, on which Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is heavily dependent. Al-Maliki has repeatedly rejected U.S. demands that he disband the heavily armed groups, especially the Mahdi Army of radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

"I think the type of violence is different in the past few months," Gianni Magazzeni, the UNAMI chief in Baghdad, said when the last report was issued in late November. "There was a great increase in sectarian violence in activities by terrorists and insurgents, but also by militias and criminal gangs."

He noted that religious clashes have been common since Sunni Arab insurgents bombed a major Shiite shrine on Feb. 22 in Samarra, north of Baghdad.

UNAMI's Human Rights Office continued to receive reports that Iraqi police and security forces have either been infiltrated by or act in collusion with militias, the report said.

It said that while sectarian violence is the main cause of the civilian killings, Iraqis also continue to be the victims of terrorist acts, roadside bombs and drive-by shootings. Others have been caught in the crossfire between rival gangs.

In its September 2006 issue, The Lancet, an independent and authoritative journal, published a study on mortality rates in Iraq.

The study estimated that 654,965 excess Iraqi deaths, including 601,027 from violence, had occurred in Iraq since the invasion of the country in March 2003.

The "confidence range" for the number of excess Iraqi deaths because of violence has been estimated at between 426,369 and 793,663, with 601,027 as the median number.

The U.S. government and Iraq as well as others, including the Iraq Body Count, an organization which has conducted other types of surveys, denied the validity of the study's findings.

The Iraqi Minister of Health, in a statement made in Vienna in early November, indicated that as many as 150,000 Iraqi civilians might have been violently killed since 2003. But there are no known statistics for the early months of the U.S.-led invasion.

After an extraordinary violence-free start to 2007, Iraqi authorities reported on Tuesday that at least 57 Iraqis were killed in sectarian bloodshed, including 45 tortured bodies found dumped in Baghdad and five in Kut to the south.

Three Iraqi civilians were killed in a roadside bombing Tuesday in eastern Baghdad, police reported. In Baqouba, gunmen killed Diyala provincial council member Ali Majeed and three members of his family. The four were gunned down while driving near the town of al-Wajihiya, Diyala provincial police said.

The military announced the death of a U.S. soldier by a roadside bomb southwest of Baghdad. The blast Monday wounded three others, including an interpreter, as they talked with residents about sectarian violence, the military said.

U.S. troops killed a suspected al-Qaida weapons dealer and two other people in Baghdad raids Tuesday.

In Fallujah, a U.S. Marine fatally wounded an Iraqi soldier in an altercation at the guard post they shared, the U.S. military said.

The confrontation took place Saturday between members of U.S. and Iraqi units assigned to combined security posts at the Fallujah Government Center. The Marine — assigned to the 1st Battalion, 24th Marine Regiment, Regimental Combat Team 5 — has been assigned to administrative duties while the military investigates.

16,273 Deaths Reported In Iraq In 2006 (MLIVENWSFLSH)

By Lauren Frayer

MLive.com NewsFlash, January 2, 2007

(AP) — In a Jan. 1 story about Sunni demonstrators breaking into the Golden Dome mosque in Samarra as part of a protest of the execution of Saddam Hussein, The Associated Press erroneously reported that the protesters broke the locks off the door of the damaged Shiite shrine and forcibly entered. Iraqi police now say demonstrators were allowed to enter the shrine through a side door after threatening violence.

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — As enraged crowds protested the hanging of Saddam Hussein across Iraq's Sunni heartland Monday, government officials reported that 16,273 Iraqi civilians, soldiers and police died violent deaths in 2006, a figure larger than an independent Associated Press count for the year by more than 2,500.

The tabulation by the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior, showed that 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers were killed in the violence that raged in the country last year.

The Associated Press accounting, gleaned from daily news reports from Baghdad, arrived at a total of 13,738 deaths. The United Nations has said as many as 100 Iraqis die violently each day, which translates into 36,500 deaths annually.

In Samarra, demonstrators were allowed to enter a Shiite shrine through a side door after threatening violence, and marched through carrying a mock coffin and photo of the dictator.

The demonstration in the Golden Dome, shattered in a bombing by Sunni extremists 10 months ago, suggests that many Sunni Arabs may now more actively support the small number of Sunni militants fighting the country's Shiite-dominated government. The Feb. 22 bombing of the shrine triggered the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiia, in the form of daily bombings, kidnappings and murders.

Monday's protest came on a day that saw the U.S. military kill six Iraqis during a raid on the offices of a prominent Sunni political figure, who was suspected of giving al-Qaida in Iraq fighters sanctuary.

Until Saddam's execution Saturday, most Sunnis sympathized with militants but avoided taking a direct role in the sectarian conflict — despite attacks by Shiite militia that have killed thousands of Sunnis or driven them from their homes. The current Sunni protests, which appear to be building, could signal a spreading militancy.

Sunnis were not only outraged by Saddam's hurried execution, just four days after an appeals court upheld his conviction and sentence. Many were also incensed by the unruly scene in the execution chamber, captured on video, in which Saddam was taunted with chants of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada."

The chants referred to Muqtada al-Sadr, a firebrand Shiite cleric who runs one of Iraq's most violent religious militias. He is a major power behind the government of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Many Sunnis are also upset that Saddam was put to death the day that Sunni celebrations began for Eid al-Adha, a major Muslim festival. The judge who first presided over the case that resulted in Saddam's death sentence said the former dictator's execution at the start of Eid was illegal according to Iraqi law, and contradicted Islamic custom.

The law states that "no verdict should implemented during the official holidays or religious festivals," said Judge Rizgar Mohammed Amin, a Kurd.

Rizgar presided over Saddam's trial on charges he killed 148 Shiite men and boys in Dujail, north of Baghdad, in a botched assassination attempt in 1982. The judge was removed from the case after Shiite complaints that he was too lenient.

In a Sunni neighborhood in northern Baghdad, hundreds of demonstrators mourned the executed leader. Some praised the Baath Party, the outlawed nationalist group that under Saddam cemented Sunni Arab dominance of Iraq.

"The Baath party and Baathists still exist in Iraq, and nobody can marginalize it," said Samir al-Obaidi, 48, who attended a Saddam memorial in the Azamiyah neighborhood.

In Dor, 77 miles north of Baghdad, hundreds more took to the streets to attend the dedication of a giant mosaic of Saddam. Children carried toy guns and men fired real weapons into the air.

Mourners at a mosque in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit slaughtered sheep as a sacrifice. The mosque's walls were lined with condolence cards from tribes in southern Iraq and Jordan who were unable to travel to the memorial.

Saddam's eldest daughter briefly attended a protest Monday in Jordan — her first public appearance since her father was hanged.

"God bless you, and I thank you for honoring Saddam, the martyr," said Raghad Saddam Hussein, according to two witnesses. She addressed members of the Professional Associations — an umbrella group of unions representing doctors, engineers and lawyers — in the group's office parking lot in west Amman.

Six Iraqis were killed in a U.S.-led raid on the Baghdad offices of a top Sunni politician, Saleh al-Mutlaq. The U.S. military and Iraqi police said they suspected the offices were being used as an al-Qaida safe house.

Al-Mutlaq is a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, which holds 11 of the 275 seats in Iraq's parliament.

U.S. forces said they took on heavy fire from automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades as they sought to enter the building. Ground troops were backed by helicopters that "engaged the enemy with precision point target machine gun fire," the military said.

It was unclear whether the deaths resulted from the ground assault or fire from U.S. helicopters.

Associated Press Television News footage showed masses of rubble in the area and what appeared to be a long smear of blood where a body had been dragged across the floor of one of the buildings.

Walls were pitted with what appeared to be bullet and shrapnel holes.

The U.S. death toll, meanwhile, climbed to at least 3,002 by the final day of 2006 as the American military reported the deaths of two more soldiers in an explosion Sunday in Diyala Province, northeast of the capital. With the announcement, the Associated Press count of fatalities showed that at least 113 U.S. service members died in December. That makes it bloodiest month of 2006.

Iraqi authorities Monday reported that 16,273 Iraqis — including 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers — died violent deaths in 2006. The total exceeds the Associated Press count by more than 2,500.

On the first day of the New Year, Iraqi Police reported finding the 40 handcuffed, blindfolded and bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad. A police official, who refused to be named out of security fears, said 15 of the bodies were discovered in the mainly industrial Sheik Omar district of northern Baghdad.

An Iraqi worker for the Algerian Embassy in Baghdad was shot to death, police said.

Also Monday, the Iraqi government raided and sealed the offices of a privately owned television station, charging it had incited violence and hatred in its programming. In its coverage of the execution of Saddam over the weekend, a newscaster had worn black mourning clothes.

The satellite television channel Al-Sharqiya, which broadcasts from Dubai, remained on the air late Monday. The station is owned by Saad al-Bazzaz, a one-time chief of radio and television for Saddam.

Iraqi Civilian Deaths Hit New Monthly High (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

The tally of civilian deaths in Iraq hit a new high of 1,930 in December, suggesting sectarian violence that surged in the summer remains at peak levels.

The figures, which were reported by [a] news agency, are the highest yet released by the Iraqi interior ministry but may be a significant underestimate as many deaths go unreported.

Since the bombing of the Samarra mosque nearly a year ago, sectarian tensions have taken over from the anti-US insurgency as the main security threat in Iraq. Tackling the communal violence will be the key purpose of the "surge" in US troop numbers in Iraq, expected to form the centrepiece of President George W. Bush's new Iraq strategy when it is announced shortly.

Much of the violence seems perpetrated by either Shia militias or Sunni insurgents as a means of controlling neighbourhoods by driving away members of the other sect.

There had been fears that the execution of Saddam Hussein on Saturday would lead to an upsurge in violence, but a resident of a mixed Sunni-Shia neighbourhood told the Financial Times that the Eid holiday since the weekend had brought a lull. However, he expected the battle to resume shortly.

In the past few days armed groups had painted warnings on the walls of homes in surrounding areas, ordering their occupants to leave and in one case had thrown a grenade over a wall, he said. "This conflict will not end until this neighbourhood is [completely] Sunni or [completely] Shia."

Both sides use mosques as refuges and command centres, and consequently both target the other's mosques with mortar barrages and other attacks. In the past few weeks, armed men invaded a Sunni mosque in the district and damaged the minaret by detonating oxygen canisters.

Most Sunni stayed inside, he said, following orders from the insurgent groups not to go to government jobs or to open their stores. Sometimes they ask Shia neighbours to fetch medical help in emergencies.

The district was expecting another flare-up of violence in coming days, he said, after several Shia homes received death threats. Residents believe the militias may counter by attacking the threatened houses' Sunni neighbours in order to bolster their own side's confidence.

The interior ministry figures showed 12,320 civilians were killed in 2006 in what officials classified as “terrorist” violence, half of them in the past four months. The figure of 1,930 civilians killed in December compared with 1,850 violent deaths in the previous month and 1,289 in October.

All Iraqi death toll figures are controversial and are often difficult to reconcile with one another. Ministries, depending on who controls them, often have an incentive either to reduce or to inflate figures. Official figures are also almost certainly incomplete, as many deaths probably go unreported. The United Nations has estimated that about 100 people are killed every day. A UN report in November stated that 3,709 had been killed in the previous month.

Nearly 2,000 Civilians Slain In Iraq In December (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writer

It was the deadliest month in 2006, government agencies say.

BAGHDAD — December was the deadliest month for Iraqi civilians in 2006, according to a combination of statistics released by staff at the Iraqi Health, Interior and Defense ministries. The death toll was 1,927, compared with 1,846 in November and 1,315 in October.

The surge in civilian fatalities has been attributed largely to the rising tide of sectarian violence in Baghdad and beyond.

Of 12,320 civilians killed during 2006, half died during the last four months, Health Ministry staff said Tuesday. A Times analysis in June found at least 50,000 Iraqis had died violently since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

A typical case is that of Baghdad bus driver Taha Hassan, 41.

His cousin Raad Yassin still recalls the day in early December when Hassan, a father of three, failed to return home as usual by 3 p.m. Three hours later, kidnappers called, asking whether Hassan was a Sunni Arab or Shiite.

Yassin's wife answered the phone. Hassan was Shiite, but she was unsure what the kidnappers wanted to hear and simply told them he was Muslim. The kidnappers demanded $15,000 ransom, and the family paid. After four days of waiting for Hassan to come home, relatives began searching local hospitals.

They found his body in a Baghdad morgue, shot several times, his right eye gouged.

"The reason behind this was sectarian," Yassin, 35, a Shiite nurse in the capital, said of his cousin's murder.

The last time Aysha Jabbawi, 67, saw her son Alaa Ahmed was Dec. 2. Ahmed, 32, a Shiite, was a truck driver who carted lumber from Baghdad to Hillah, their hometown to the south.

The day he died, a group of gunmen stopped him and a friend, Mohammed Jabr, 32. Ahmed offered them his truck and all the money he had, she said, about $3,850. They refused. He struggled with them and they shot him twice, Jabbawi said, then drove off with Jabr. Strangers found Ahmed and took him to a nearby hospital, where he gave a statement to police before he died. Jabr is still missing.

Four days ago, a group of men came to Jabbawi's door with $3,500 in a plastic bag and the key to her son's truck.

"They told me, 'Sorry, Aunty,' " she said. "I didn't say to them a single word."

Ridha Jawad Taqi, a member of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's parliamentary bloc, called the December death toll "a terrifying and horrifying number." He said militias were responsible.

The Iraqi government defines civilian casualties as victims of violence — explosions, shootings and bombings, said a Health Ministry employee who asked not to be named. In addition to the civilian deaths, 24 Iraqi soldiers and 124 policemen died in December's violence, said an Interior Ministry employee who also requested anonymity.

At least 5,900 Iraqi police officers and soldiers have died since the 2003 invasion, according to the Iraq Index, a tally kept by the Washington-based Brookings Institution. Civilian death toll estimates range from tens of thousands to more than half a million.

Many believe the Iraqi government underestimates civilian casualties. The United Nations, for example, estimates that 100 Iraqis die in violence daily.

On the other hand, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Tuesday that the latest figures were too high. Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf said the civilian toll in December was about half what was being reported and one of the lowest monthly totals of the year. Khalaf did not release alternative figures. The U.S. military does not release Iraqi civilian casualty figures.

The death toll for U.S. forces in Iraq reached 3,000 on Dec. 31, including 113 in December, the highest monthly death toll since the battle for Fallouja in November 2004, according to icasualties.org.

In a 24-hour period ending Tuesday, 45 unidentified bodies were found in Baghdad, Interior Ministry staff said.

U.S. Naval Criminal Investigative Service agents are looking into an incident at the Fallouja government building in which a Marine fatally wounded an Iraqi soldier, the Marine Corps said.

The Marine, from the 1st Battalion, 24th Marine Regiment, has been assigned to administrative duties during the investigation. Officials declined to reveal what led to the shooting Saturday.

Marines from the 1st Battalion, 24th Regiment, along with Iraqi forces, are assigned to guard several checkpoints on the outskirts of the city as well as the government building. Three Marines were killed in a sniper attack last week.

A Promising Iraqi Province Is Now A Tinderbox (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

Violence surged after U.S. forces handed security to the Iraqis. Now the Americans are stepping back in.

BAQUBAH, IRAQ — When U.S. forces killed the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Musab Zarqawi, six months ago in a village near here, they hoped security would improve in this strategic province just north of Baghdad.

Instead, security has collapsed in Diyala province, which now ranks as one of Iraq's most troubled regions. Insurgent attacks have more than doubled in the last year. Violence has devastated the provincial police force and brought reconstruction to a virtual standstill.

Assassinations have claimed the lives of mayors, tribal chieftains, police officials and judges, including a Shiite Muslim member of the provincial council who was killed Tuesday. Many government officials here sleep on cots in their offices because driving home is too dangerous.

And Iraqi security forces have been implicated in so many abuses that the U.S. commander here recently gave his Iraqi counterpart an angry lecture, likening the Iraqi troops to an "undisciplined rabble."

U.S. and Iraqi officials interviewed in recent days blamed the sharp downturn on a combination of U.S. neglect and abuses by the Iraqi army. U.S. troops largely disengaged from security here for weeks at a time, they say, handing the reins to Iraqi forces who proved to be abusive and ineffective.

U.S. commanders are attempting a sharp change in strategy, hoping that a classic counterinsurgency campaign, combining reconstruction aid with a more active U.S. presence, can turn the situation around.

For now, insurgents here appear to have gained the upper hand. They demonstrated their freedom of movement last week by barreling a dozen trucks through the streets of Baqubah's Amin neighborhood, shouting militant slogans and brandishing machine guns and shoulder-fired rocket launchers.

The defiant show of force was similar to another insurgent parade caught on video by a U.S. aerial drone in November. Insurgents were seen hauling Shiite families out of their homes and executing them in the streets, U.S. military officials who reviewed the footage said.

Diyala is an area of fertile farmland, abundant water and untapped oil wells stretching north of Baghdad's suburbs and east to the Iranian border. Its population includes all three of Iraq's main religious and ethnic groups.

Of its roughly 1.8 million people, about 55% are Sunni Arabs. But because Sunnis boycotted elections two years ago, Shiites, who make up about one-third of Diyala's population, hold the majority of provincial council seats and control the local security forces. Kurds, mostly in northeastern Diyala, make up about 15%.

Until October, the main U.S. force in the province was the 4th Infantry Division. It largely followed the strategy laid down by top U.S. commanders in Iraq last year: Pull American forces back as much as possible and allow Iraqi troops to take the lead in fighting insurgents. U.S. officers here say that approach did not work.

"4th ID tried to keep a low profile after they handed over security to the Iraqi army, but that approach backfired," said an officer with the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, which now has responsibility for the province. The officer spoke on condition of anonymity because he was criticizing another U.S. military unit.

Under the 4th Infantry's plan, Army convoys stayed on main roads and rarely ventured into Baqubah's dense neighborhoods, military officials said.

"Iraqis told us that 4th ID drove in here with their Humvees and told them, 'If you don't shoot at us, we won't shoot at you,' " the 3rd Brigade officer said. "So the insurgents actually took over this place."

Making matters worse, Iraq's Shiite-dominated government appointed a provincial commander who U.S. military officials say was handpicked by the Badr Brigade, a militia implicated in hundreds of death squad killings in Baghdad. The militia is linked to Iraq's largest Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

Under orders from the Iraqi Ground Forces Command in Baghdad this fall, the commander, Brig. Gen. Shakir Hulail Hussein Kaabi, and his 5th Iraqi Division started a campaign of what U.S. officials now describe as abusive raids and detentions.

The problems were so serious that Col. David W. Sutherland, commander of the 3rd Brigade, took the unusual step of lecturing his Iraqi counterpart during a mid-December briefing at Forward Operating Base Warhorse near Baqubah.

"Six weeks ago, the people of Diyala and Baqubah were disgusted with the disrespect and disregard the Iraqi army had shown them," Sutherland told Shakir through an Arabic interpreter.

"Bullying an innocent person is unacceptable. Taking things from houses is unacceptable. Taking cars or things from cars is unacceptable," he said.

"Before we send an undisciplined rabble into this fight, I will pull the plug," Sutherland told the general. "We are soldiers, not barbarians."

Since taking command of Diyala in October, Sutherland has increased the number of U.S. advisors traveling with Iraqi units and required U.S. approval for any Iraqi operation, in effect rescinding Iraqi control of the 5th Division.

Sutherland said that several joint raids convinced him Shakir was willing to change his tactics and adopt a counterinsurgency doctrine of proportional force.

"In this culture, the more you kill, the more enemies you make. The more you treat with disrespect, the more enemies you make," Sutherland said. "And we were able to show [Shakir], not subjectively but objectively, how that happened and what it created."

American commanders won at least a partial victory in late December when the government agreed to replace Diyala's police chief. The chief, Ghassan Bawi, had been accused of tacitly or directly supporting death squads in the province, according to U.S. officials, who had lobbied for months for his removal. Like Shakir, Bawi was endorsed by the Badr militia, U.S. officials say.

Detainees reported kidnappings and torture at the hands of Iraqi policemen, according to U.S. and Iraqi officials. One of Bawi's most infamous underlings is known as Cable Ali, after his favorite coercive tool.

In an interview, Shakir said he had changed tactics and now used more focused operations. But he clung to the view that his main targets were Sunnis, not Shiites.

"The nature of the target is that they are all Sunnis," Shakir said. "All these problem areas are all Sunni, so our operations are all in Sunni areas. There are actually no Shiites left, because 8,000 Shiites have been killed or displaced."

But the shift in strategy may have come too late.

Diyala's Sunni politicians refuse to attend provincial council meetings until Shakir is stripped of his command, and the governing body has been unable to reach a quorum for weeks.

"The people don't trust the government or the security forces," said Deputy Gov. Awf Rahoomi, a Sunni. "The Shiites in control of security are not professionals — they were appointed on a sectarian basis. This has caused people to put more faith in the armed groups, which have become more powerful than the government forces."

The U.S. has spent roughly $220 million toward reconstruction in Diyala, but as winter temperatures plunge, food transport, electricity generation and petroleum shipments are beset by chronic delays, when shipments occur at all. Most Baqubah shops are closed and most streets devoid of traffic. Sewers are dysfunctional, spilling sludge across the refuse-covered streets and contaminating the water supply.

Many Iraqi contractors now refuse to enter the province, fearing for their lives.

Baqubah's Government Center building is regularly attacked by insurgents, but still serves as a nighttime refuge for government officials afraid to return home at the end of the day.

"The Government Center has become something of a dormitory," said Kiki Munshi, a State Department official who leads the Provincial Reconstruction Team.

Munshi said poor security and government bureaucracy had brought reconstruction to a virtual standstill.

U.S. military officials also complain that poor coordination among the military, State Department officials and the Iraqi government continues to hinder projects.

At a recent meeting between various local ministry representatives and Diyala's mayors and other officials, the politicians complained that Baghdad was not responding to their needs.

The mayor of Khalis said food and clean water were scarce in his area.

"The Iraqi army and the coalition forces arrested a lot of workers for our water treatment project," he said.

Baqubah's mayor said the Iraqi army had confiscated several fuel tankers from Oil Ministry drivers. The mayor of Khanaqin said at least 2,500 families had come to his city to escape violence elsewhere in the province, overwhelming services.

The officials seemed unable to agree on whether poor security was preventing reconstruction or whether reconstruction failures had caused security to erode. It is a conundrum that U.S. soldiers in the field also face.

While on patrol a few days earlier, Capt. Christopher Conley parked his armored vehicle in a Sunni neighborhood to attempt to gather intelligence from a tribal sheik.

"I want the coalition to have a good relationship with your neighborhood," Conley told the elder tribesman.

"We would like to cooperate with you," said the wizened sheik, who identified himself as Abu Mohammed. "But I can promise you that it will come to nothing because of the situation here. All the jobless men. All the closed shops."

"I want to fix the security situation," Conley told him. "I have money to fix things, but no one will come to help because of security."

"If you ask me, no one is ready to hear you right now," Abu Mohammed said. "If security gets better, we'll do whatever you want."

Will We Leave Iraqi Allies Behind? (WP)

By David Ignatius

One day in the Gerald Ford presidency that hasn't received much attention in the past week's memorials is April 30, 1975. That was the day the last American helicopter pulled away from the U.S. Embassy in Saigon, leaving behind many thousands of South Vietnamese who had worked with the United States.

Those wrenching final images of the Vietnam War are relevant now as we think about what lies ahead in Iraq. However long the United States stays in Iraq and whatever success it achieves there, we should agree we have a moral responsibility to the Iraqis who risked their lives and families to be America's allies.

How America leaves Iraq will be as important as how it entered. That's why I found the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton report valuable -- because they focused on an orderly process of transition from U.S. military occupation to Iraqi sovereignty, with the assistance of Iraq's neighbors. President Bush seems about to embark on a riskier course of a "surge" in American troops to achieve something that looks like military victory. But if that "double-down" bet fails, I fear we will eventually witness a repetition of April 30, 1975 -- without the orderly process envisioned by Baker-Hamilton.

America's ragged withdrawal from Vietnam was chronicled by Frank Snepp, a CIA analyst in Saigon at the time. In his 1977 book, "Decent Interval," Snepp wrote that the CIA station in Saigon was able to evacuate only about 537 of its 1,900 "indigenous employees" in April 1975. The agency also abandoned 400 members of the CIA-trained Special Police Branch; 400 members of the Central Intelligence Organization of South Vietnam; hundreds of North Vietnamese and Viet Cong defectors; and nearly 30,000 Vietnamese who had been trained as operatives in the CIA's Phoenix program. These people were, in practical terms, left to die.

In the pell-mell American withdrawal, wrote Snepp, "We committed the unpardonable mistake of failing to ensure the destruction of the personnel files and intelligence dossiers we had helped the government assemble." He concluded: "It is not too much to say that in terms of squandered lives, blown secrets, and the betrayal of agents, friends and collaborators, our handling of the evacuation was an institutional disgrace."

Thomas Polgar, the Saigon station chief, sent a final bleak cable to headquarters: "It has been a long and hard fight and we have lost. This experience, unique in the history of the United States, does not signal necessarily the demise of the United States as a world power. The severity of the defeat and the circumstances of it, however, would seem to call for a reassessment of the policies of niggardly half-measures which have characterized much of our participation here."

Vietnam and America did indeed survive this trauma -- to the point that three decades later, Vietnam is a prosperous and friendly nation visited by American presidents. A big reason why is that after the chaotic withdrawal, America worked to keep faith with people who had been its allies. The brutal policies of the North Vietnamese created waves of refugees who became known as "boat people." Many thousands of them made their way to the United States, and their children and grandchildren are among our nation's great success stories.

One of the great tragedies of the Iraq war has been America's inability to protect its friends in Iraq or to offer them a haven when they were forced to flee the country. The New York Times reported this week that 1.8 million Iraqis are living outside the country, with tens of thousands more fleeing each month. But until recently, the Bush administration had planned to resettle just 500 Iraqis in the United States in 2007. The Times quoted Kirk W. Johnson, a former U.S. aid worker in Fallujah: "We're not even meeting our basic obligation to the Iraqis who've been imperiled because they worked for the U.S. government."

The Vietnamese who came to America after April 1975 provided a backbone for investment and political change in their home country. Their superpower ally failed on the battlefield, but the Vietnamese who believed in free markets and modern values ended up as the winners.

I want to believe that will happen eventually in Iraq, as well. But one of the worst effects of the war is that it is destroying the educated middle class of Iraq -- driving doctors, teachers and business people into desperate exile. When Iraq comes back together some day, will these educated Iraqis be America's friends, or will they despise us?

Whatever we do in Iraq in coming months, it should include a bipartisan commitment to keep faith with the people who risked everything for a new Iraq -- by making room for them in America, if necessary. We need a surge of compassion more than a surge of U.S. troops.

Two Civilians Answer Return Call To Duty In Iraq (WP)

By Stephen Barr

A reminder that federal employees are regularly heading to Iraq for duty:

Nancee Needham, who has worked for the Defense Department inspector general's office for nearly 18 years, begins a one-year tour in the war-torn country this month.

Needham, a civil service employee, will serve as the inspector general's program director for audit operations there. She spent eight weeks in Iraq last year on an auditing project and calls her decision to volunteer for a year-long Baghdad assignment "my turn to pay back" the department and the nation for providing her with a rewarding career.

Tim Walsh, a technology manager with the Air Force, joined the government four years ago and spent six months in Iraq in 2004. He has volunteered for a second assignment in the war zone. "You work for the DOD and they depend upon you during peacetime. You got to pony up during wartime," Walsh said.

As a general practice, federal agencies prefer to rely on volunteers like Needham and Walsh for duty in war zones. Volunteers have helped staff the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, restore electrical power plants and operate post exchange stores.

But with the Iraq war in its fourth year, there has been some concern that the ranks of civil service volunteers are growing thin.

The Iraq Study Group, chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former House member Lee H. Hamilton, has recommended that agencies order civilian employees to fill key jobs in Iraq if not enough volunteers step forward. The recommendation grew out of a sense that agencies are not contributing enough personnel to Iraq, a commission aide said.

John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, questions how civil service employees could be ordered to Iraq when the violence in Baghdad makes it exceedingly difficult to move around and perform jobs.

"This is a slippery slope," Gage said of the Baker-Hamilton recommendation. "Security issues have to be upfront and resolved before you think of sending untrained federal workers over there."

The government does not keep count of how many federal employees are serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. By most accounts, the Army has the largest number of volunteers in Iraq -- usually about 2,000 at any one time. (In fiscal 2006, it deployed more than 4,000 civilians in Iraq and Afghanistan, an Army spokeswoman said.)

About 1,000 Americans from various agencies staff the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, according to the Congressional Research Service. They have come from the State, Defense, Agriculture, Commerce, Homeland Security, Health and Human Services, Justice, Labor, Transportation and Treasury departments and the Agency for International Development, the CRS reported last October.

Some agencies, such as the Air Force, assign civilians to U.S. bases outside Baghdad. Walsh, for example, worked on the Horned Owl project in 2004 at Camp Anaconda and the Balad air base in northern Iraq. His small team gathered data from an airplane equipped with sensors that can detect some bombs buried in roads and some types of weapons caches.

Walsh, who manages technology systems for an Air Force office in Northern Virginia, helped set up a secure electronic network, coordinated intelligence activities and relayed information to the Army about possible threats.

In a war zone, Walsh noted, federal employees can be called upon to work outside their areas of expertise. During the battle of Fallujah, he helped out at a military clinic because medics were overworked and needed extra hands to care for wounded troops.

To some degree, Walsh said, he may feel more attuned to the military than other federal civilians because he once served in the Kansas Army National Guard and because his father was a career officer. He is not married.

Needham said she found last year's stint in Baghdad's Green Zone to be "a rewarding experience." In her second week there, she said "I decided I can do this," and signaled her intent to volunteer for this year's tour.

She will supervise seven auditors and will be in charge of auditing at two locations. Her team will review some of the Defense Department's financial management practices and look at internal controls on spending.

From her first stay in Baghdad, Needham learned that living and working accommodations cannot be taken for granted, especially when electrical generators shut down. "Everything is more difficult in Iraq, and things don't work all the time," she said.

Like Walsh, she comes from a family with ties to the armed forces. Her father served in World War II and headed an American Legion post when she was growing up. She has four children and 13 grandchildren and is divorced.

Asked how her family reacted to her plans for a year in Iraq, Needham quipped that her announcement was met with "stunned silence," much the way her family responded when she bought a Harley-Davidson motorcycle.

The family's surprise over her decision to go back quickly turned to pride, Needham said. "My family very strongly supports the troops over there."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

At Apple, Timing Led To Overnight Windfalls (LAT)

By Dawn C. Chmielewski, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

Stock option grants in 1997 came on the eve of a big share-price jump.

In August 1997, Apple Computer Inc. handed four top executives options to buy a total of nearly 1 million shares. The next day, the value of those options jumped a staggering 48%, or $7.7 million.

This was no coincidence, according to a shareholder lawsuit filed against executives and directors of the Cupertino, Calif.-based company in federal court in Northern California. Rather, the options were granted to coincide with good news that would give the four executives an overnight windfall.

The stock soared when co-founder Steve Jobs announced that Apple's sworn enemy, Microsoft Corp., threw the struggling company a life raft in the form of a $150-million cash infusion. In exchange, Apple gave Microsoft a stake in the company and agreed to use the software giant's Web browser on its Mac personal computers.

The investment rocked the high-tech world at the time but became only a footnote in the astonishing comeback of a company as celebrated today for its marketing and design prowess as Nike, Prada or Mercedes-Benz.

But the grants are an example of the fast-and-loose practices that went unchecked in a corporate culture fashioned by Jobs to revive Apple, which by 1997 was hemorrhaging money, according to the lawsuit, a combination of 11 shareholder complaints.

"The company was struggling, was cash-poor and reliant upon stock options to bring and keep executives there, so the conditions [for manipulation] were ripe," said Mark Molumphy, a partner at Cotchett, Pitre, Simon & McCarthy, the lead law firm in the case.

Apple declined to comment on the lawsuit.

Filed days before Christmas, it alleges that Apple engaged in widespread manipulation of option grants to allow employees to buy shares at low prices. Apple "spring-loaded" options in advance of good news and "backdated" other grants to days when the stock traded at low prices to create an automatic paper profit, claims the suit, which has only recently come to light.

"What they've done — and it's not isolated — is utilized confidential internal corporate data in a way to divert to themselves substantial profits," said Darren Robbins, a San Diego lawyer involved in the shareholder lawsuit. "That constitutes both a breach of fiduciary duty and a violation of federal securities law."

On Friday, Apple absolved Jobs of wrongdoing after a three-month internal investigation of its option practices. The company, however, acknowledged 6,428 instances of improperly dating option grants over a six-year period, when it had "insufficient safeguards" to prevent stock manipulation, according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The first incident occurred on Dec. 29, 1997, just a few months after Jobs had returned to the company and taken the title of "interim" chief executive.

'Instant windfall'

In some cases, Apple's filing said, Jobs had recommended the options be backdated to create an instant windfall for executives. It said he had neither benefited financially nor appreciated the accounting implications of backdating, which forced the company to take an $83-million charge against earnings in 2006 for underreporting expenses related to employee compensation.

The company's admissions have raised new questions among securities lawyers and corporate governance experts about Jobs' role in the controversy. "There has been a tacit admission that Steve Jobs served as a ringleader in this backdating process," said Christopher Bebel, a former SEC counsel and prosecutor who is not involved in the lawsuit.

He predicted that Apple's insistence that current management had done nothing wrong could "come back to haunt the company" in a scenario similar to Martha Stewart telling investors she had participated in no wrongdoing and later being indicted on securities fraud. "[Jobs] may find himself in a Martha Stewart quandary with obstruction of justice charges."

In its filing Friday, Apple said it had "serious concerns" about the involvement in the granting, recording and accounting of option grants by two former corporate officers it did not name but who are believed to be former General Counsel Nancy R. Heinen and former Chief Financial Officer Fred D. Anderson.

The company said its review found no instances of backdating from 2003 through 2005, when new procedures and controls on granting options were put in place to comply with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Apple is among nearly 200 companies whose option-dating practices are under internal investigation or being probed by federal regulators. At least 65 executives and directors have resigned or been fired after being implicated in the scandal, including Bruce Karatz, head of Los Angeles home builder KB Home, and UnitedHealth Group Inc. CEO William McGuire.

An option is the right to buy stock at a set price within a certain time period. The price is generally determined by the stock's close on the day the option is granted by a company's board. In their current probes, regulators are focusing on backdating, whereby grant dates are changed by weeks or months to coincide with the stock's lowest price in a set period. Doing so could give executives instant paper gains and cause a company to understate compensation costs and overstate earnings.

Backdating isn't necessarily illegal, but failing to disclose the practice in a timely manner is.

Apple's is the highest-profile case so far. A host of high-tech companies have been ensnared in part, observers say, because stock options are the currency of choice in Silicon Valley for keeping top talent from jumping to another venture.

"This is how Silicon Valley works," said Alan Deutschman, the author of a critical book about the Apple chief, "The Second Coming of Steve Jobs." "Even though Apple is an anomaly — because of Steve's passion for design and his ability to connect to the zeitgeist and the popular culture — in a lot of ways it epitomizes how Silicon Valley is run. Steve, from his earliest experience in the corporate world, has been very conscious and political about stock and stock options and rewarding loyalists."

Options' indispensable role in Silicon Valley has made it hard for some experts to accept Apple's contention that Jobs was naïve about the practices surrounding them. It's also hard to swallow considering that Jobs has been an officer of a public company since 1980 and has a net worth of more than $5 billion.

Curiously, options themselves have not built Jobs' wealth. When the charismatic leader rejoined the company in 1997, he held only a single share of Apple stock. He has received a salary of only $1 a year since 1998. But he holds 5.4 million shares of Apple worth about $460 million today. Only 120,000 are options, worth about $10 million.

The bulk of his fortune stems from Pixar Animation Studios, which transformed him from a barefoot computer geek into a full-fledged media mogul. Jobs' 49% stake in Pixar, the computer-driven studio behind such blockbuster movies as "Cars" and "Toy Story," was converted into 6.7% of Walt Disney Co. when he sold the company to the Burbank giant in May 2006. Those shares are worth $4.7 billion today.

Jobs received one of the biggest option grants in history during Apple's revival, when he was given 10 million shares Jan. 12, 2000. That was one of two option grants Jobs was awarded that Apple said Friday were backdated — and that the company canceled in 2003.

A special CEO compensation committee of the board didn't authorize the Jan. 12 grant until a week later, on Jan. 18. The options' exercise price of $21.80 coincided with the lowest closing price during that quarter, according to the shareholder lawsuit. The grant yielded a paper profit of $65.8 million for Jobs within 20 trading days.

Company records show that the other backdated grant Jobs received — 7.5 million shares — were approved at a special board meeting on Oct. 19, 2001. In its filing, however, Apple acknowledged that the meeting "did not occur."

Apple said the two stock option grants were canceled in March 2003 in exchange for 5 million shares of restricted stock. The company would not explain why the options were canceled, but its regulatory filings said Jobs wanted them to provide "additional shares that could later be granted to employees whose contributions are critical to the long-term success of the Company."

SEC records show that Jobs sold his restricted shares — the only Apple stock he has sold since 1997 — for $300 million the day they vested on March 19, 2006.

That was a day after the Wall Street Journal published the first story on the SEC's stock options backdating probe. The story did not mention Apple, which disclosed its backdating problem in late June.

Power struggle

Jobs returned to Apple in February 1997 after the company spent $427 million to buy Next Software, which Jobs had founded in 1985 following his ouster from Apple. Jobs had resigned after the board stripped him of his managerial duties amid a power struggle with the company's then-new chief executive, John Sculley.

A later Apple CEO, Gil Amelio, recalled last week how he recruited Jobs to return as the charismatic "Mr. Outside."

"He had the stage presence and stuff that I lacked," Amelio said. "I thought frankly I was better at literally running the company. It didn't take very long for him to decide that wasn't a good idea. He worked with the board, behind my back, to oust me."

A couple of months after Amelio's July 1997 departure, Jobs assumed the title of "interim" chief executive and set out to create a board he could control, according to the shareholder lawsuit. Jobs' mission was to insulate himself to prevent a repeat of his painful 1985 departure, said longtime observers.

"The big lesson Steve learned from his first time around at Apple was you have to be in control, cause otherwise they can kick you out," Deutschman said.

Jobs brought in two close friends, Larry Ellison, head of database software titan Oracle Corp., and William V. Campbell, a former Apple executive who had gone on to become chief executive of financial software maker Intuit Inc. Also joining the board were two executives with whom Jobs enjoyed professional ties: Jerome B. York, who at the time was chief executive of tech retailer Micro Warehouse Inc., and Millard Drexler, then chief executive at Gap Inc., who had appointed Jobs to the clothing firm's board.

In addition to granting generous options to Jobs that were later canceled, they heaped them on key executives. Four executives benefited from the grants made the day before the pivotal Microsoft announcement. Chief Financial Officer Anderson, Executive Vice President of Marketing Guerrino de Luca, Controller Robert Calderoni and Senior Vice President of hardware engineering Jonathan Rubinstein received shares that vested in annual installments over three years. During that period, Apple's shares tripled.

No small company

From April 2000 to August 2001, Apple's board lacked a compensation committee and relied on the full board to administer stock grants as well as approve executive compensation. One swath of grants issued during that time gave four senior executives 1 million shares at the stock's closing price on Jan. 17, 2001, the day quarterly earnings were reported. The next day, the stock surged 11% on the results, generating a paper gain of $1.9 million for each, the investor suit alleged.

Ralph Ward, publisher of the "Boardroom Insider," an online corporate governance newsletter, said it wasn't unusual a decade ago for boards of small companies to grant options, especially in Silicon Valley, where "it has always been, 'We're all pals here doing business together.' "

In 2000, however, Apple would not have been considered small. It had annual sales of $8 billion, mostly of iMac computers and its new iBook notebook. It was another year before the introduction of the iPod in late 2001.

"That does raise some eyebrows, particularly with Apple," Ward said. "Companies are supposed to outgrow that when they become major, big-cap public companies. Some don't outgrow it as well as they should."

The shareholder lawsuit contends that Apple's practices were no aberration. The SEC is investigating stock option practices of Pixar, where Jobs served as chief executive and chairman until the Disney acquisition.

At Pixar, four of the seven grants were recorded at the lowest price during the fiscal years in which they were granted, the suit alleges.

"This dispels any notion that Apple is now trying to portray that Jobs is somehow ignorant of the accounting effects of what they were doing because it wasn't just happening at Apple," said Molumphy, the shareholders' attorney.

Apple's portrayal also defies Job's personality traits as a leader who gets involved in the most microscopic details.

"I don't know if there's a Wikipedia definition for 'control freak' but when they do that entry, Steve's picture should be next to it," Deutschman said.

"The way Apple and its allies have tried to spin this options story has been, 'Oh, Steve is passionate about the design of the product but he doesn't pay attention to these other things.' One of the big things about Steve's second time around at Apple is that he's really mastered the financial aspects of running the company."

Tough Year Ahead For US Chiefs (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera In New York

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

American chief executives are bracing themselves for a tough year, with corporate governance issues, shareholder activism, and a more difficult operating environment likely to test their leadership and business skills.

Corporate experts predict that US chief executives will see their once undisputed authority further eroded in 2007 by the growing desire from institutional and retail investors to have a bigger influence on company matters.

Over the past year, this trend has been strengthened by the explosion of the options backdating scandal, increased shareholder anger at lavish executive compensation and attacks from activist hedge funds.

"The pressure is not going to relent on CEOs in 2007," says John Challenger of the recruitment firm Challenger Gray & Christmas. "The days of the imperial chief executive are over."

The increased pressure on America's corporate leaders has led to unprecedented levels of chief executive turnover. In 2006, more than 1,340 US chief executives left their jobs – the highest on record – according to Mr Challenger's firm.

The options backdating scandal, which has engulfed more than 180 companies, has forced more than 15 chief executives to resign and more could follow.

The controversy – coupled with more investor scrutiny of executive pay and the ongoing impact of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation – are rapidly changing the US's corporate governance landscape.

Regulatory and corporate governance challenges for chief executives will be compounded by uncertainty over the prospects of many sectors in 2007.

With growth in both the US economy and companies' profitability expected to slow, albeit without a "hard landing", US corporate leaders will face stronger competition from overseas rivals.

The power of private equity groups – a feature of the past two years – is also expected to grow during 2007 as buy-out funds look to invest the record amount of funds they have raised.

"One of the messages for 2007 is: whether you like it or not, your company is for sale," says Steve Ellis, worldwide managing director of the management consultancy Bain & Co.

"This is dramatically increasing the pressure on CEOs to show meaningful improvements in their operating performance."

A Typical Miscreant-II

January 3, 2007; Page A12

The markets have finally had their say about the wonderfully overblown backdating scandal. When Apple filed its latest mea culpa on Friday along with a board expression of confidence in Steve Jobs's leadership, the company's shares jumped four bucks. Message: The market doesn't give a hoot about backdating. It gives a hoot whether Mr. Jobs might be run out of his job.

This ought to cast a light on whether the drop in market prices of companies in the backdating scandal reflects the shock and horror of investors at the details of backdating -- or shock and horror at the meal that trial lawyers, prosecutors and the media are making of companies caught up in this episode.

Whether Mr. Jobs is safely out of woods remains to be seen. It didn't help that just a week earlier, the Associated Press reported that SEC Chairman Chris Cox has been averring that, in sorting through dozens of backdating cases, his agency would save its legal firepower for "cases of serious fraud, with elements such as deliberately lying or forging documents."

Uh oh. In granting Mr. Jobs options on 7.5 million shares, somebody at Apple pencil-whipped a technical requirement of a board meeting to approve the grant. Of course, Mr. Jobs was already a billionaire. Does anybody think he engaged in theft to pad his net worth by a faction of a percent?

We won't remarket our column of last October, though it anticipated much of Apple's latest admissions. The company now says it "identified a number of grants for which grant dates were intentionally selected in order to obtain favorable exercise prices." It also acknowledges that Mr. Jobs had a role in "recommending" the favorable dates.

Having vouchsafed these eye-openers, Apple's filing proceeds to blur the matter amid a general discussion of how it chose to account for hundreds of option grants that were apparently misdated mostly through simple bureaucratic snafu. We never learn which grants were deliberately engineered by the CEO to award the recipient a "favorable" exercise price, or why Mr. Jobs found it useful to do so.

Apple's goal, obviously, is self-defense. Alas, this rules out trying to engage the media in a conversation about whether backdating is really the crime the media imagines it to be.

Backdating, let's recall, was simply an artifice to allow companies to issue "in the money" options (the terms of which were accurately reported to shareholders) without taking an accounting expense. That's all backdating is. Does it matter in the teensiest whether options are expensed? No, expensing has no probative value whatsoever for evaluating a company's shares or its compensation policies. Expensing creates a junk number, of zero analytical value.

Don't expect to hear any of this from companies actually involved in the backdating scandal. Apple proves you can never overestimate the shallowness of the media. That much is shown by the meretricious non sequitur, incorporated verbatim in many media accounts, that notwithstanding Mr. Jobs' role in backdating, "he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants."

Apple here shrewdly judges that what exercises the media are the large numbers involved in CEO compensation. Notice that Apple chooses to record an accounting charge for Steve Jobs options that were canceled and never exercised, but doesn't take a charge for other options that were canceled and never exercised. Does anyone doubt that this was a P.R. call because Apple judged it useful to be seen engaging in penitential accounting for Mr. Jobs's options?

We won't bore you with the findings of organizational psychology on "fairness" perceptions. Suffice it to say, "fairness" is an indeterminate thing, so people tend to look at process as a proxy for the fairness of outcomes.

This is called "procedural fairness" or "procedural justice." People naturally resent outcomes that leave some much better off than others. Procedural flyspecking is how we decide whether to put our resentment over such outcomes into abeyance or surrender to it.

Popular coverage of CEO pay is a perfect expression of this "fairness heuristic." It strives to meet a public demand for reasons to resent high CEO pay by constantly highlighting claims of cronyism, self-dealing, fraud, etc. to explain why CEO compensation is so high. By now this has become almost an unconscious conspiracy of obfuscation about the true source of ever-rising executive compensation. Try a thought experiment. If CEO pay were a real "problem," wouldn't it be a sublimely easy problem to solve? Just hire somebody who will do the job for less.

This society is full of capable, responsible people who take jobs for five- or six-figure salaries. Why don't boards wave off the demands of their first-choice CEOs and go for one of these less demanding folks? The question answers itself: Because boards believe their first-choice CEOs are worth it. Rationally, boards are prepared to bid away a sizeable sliver of a company's net worth to get the CEO they want. Take the gyrations in Apple's share price last Friday: At stake as investors worried about Mr. Jobs's fate was $3.4 billion in shareholder wealth -- many, many times Mr. Jobs's total compensation since returning to Apple a decade ago.

Now, not all CEOs are as pivotal to a company's performance as Mr. Jobs is perceived to be, but this has nothing to do with the CEO pay calculus. All CEOs sit at the switch: They make the calls by which shareholder wealth is preserved or squandered. Should a company sacrifice short-term profits in order to invest more in customer service? Should it embark on a bold product redesign or milk an aging product line a bit longer?

The market wants a CEO in whom it has confidence, and who is responsive to the share price. The media's relentless appetite is for evidence that CEO pay fails the "fairness heuristic." This basic disjunction is why one of the signal phenomena of the age, the towering increase in executive compensation, remains unexplained to the American people despite the massive amount of journalism spent on subjects like backdating.

Causey Heads To Prison For Role In Enron (WP/BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 2 -- Richard A. Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer, was on his way Tuesday to a federal prison in Bastrop, Tex., to begin a 5 1/2 -year sentence for his role in the fraud that destroyed the company.

Causey, 46, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud in December 2005, less than a month before he was to stand trial with former Enron chief executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, both of whom were found guilty.

"A lot of improper things were done at Enron," Causey said as he was sentenced in November. "Some of those were done by me, and for that I am profoundly sorry."

Causey was the last of 16 former executives to plead guilty to crimes at Enron, which was the world's largest energy-trading company before it went bankrupt in December 2001 as widespread accounting fraud came to light.

More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee pensions were wiped out when Enron collapsed. Investors are suing to recover more than $30 billion.

Causey was assigned to the prison he requested. Bastrop is three hours from his home in Houston, where Enron was based, and 30 miles from Austin, where the oldest of his three children attends college.

The Bastrop prison has a low-security section, surrounded by a razor-wire-topped double fence, and an unfenced minimum-security camp. Authorities would not say which one Causey is assigned to. With time off for good behavior, he can expect to serve four years and nine months.

Causey will be assigned a job such as groundskeeping or kitchen work, paying 12 to 40 cents an hour. He can apply for a job that pays 23 cents to $1.15 an hour in a prison factory that retrofits vehicles for the government, said Michael Truman, a spokesman for the U.S. Bureau of Prisons.

At his sentencing, Causey asked U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III for leniency, saying his withdrawal from the case let prosecutors to ignore accounting charges and focus jurors' attention on securities-fraud charges against Skilling and Lay.

Causey agreed to serve seven years as part of his plea. Lake sentenced him to nearly all of it after prosecutors sought a reduction of three to six months. They called Causey's cooperation too little, too late.

"A witness who is reluctant to acknowledge his own responsibility is of no use to the government," prosecutor Kathryn H. Ruemmler said at Causey's sentencing. "Without Mr. Causey's implicit consent and explicit conduct, the fraud that occurred at Enron could not have occurred."

Causey's lawyer, Reid H. Weingarten, said later that Enron was "reputed to be the worst accounting scandal in history, but the only accountant inside or outside the company who will get a prison sentence is Rick Causey."

Causey forfeited $1.25 million in illegal gains in addition to being sent to prison.

Weingarten said Tuesday that he could not confirm whether Causey had reported to the prison.

"I have no reason to assume it didn't happen because I would have heard if it was otherwise," said Weingarten. Representatives of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons were not immediately available for comment because of a federal holiday.

Skilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of conspiracy, fraud, lying to auditors and insider trading. He is serving a 24-year prison sentence in Waseca, Minn. Lay, convicted of 10 counts of fraud and conspiracy in the same trial, died of heart disease before he could be sentenced. His guilty verdict was erased under a U.S. legal principle that cancels a conviction if the defendant dies before he can appeal.

Head To Head On The Hill (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

DOJ_NMG_0110464

From their years at Harvard Law School to their tenure in the House of Representatives, Barney Frank and Christopher Cox chose markedly different approaches to reach their destinations.

This week, their paths will cross again as Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat, assumes control of the House Financial Services Committee, which oversees the Securities and Exchange Commission -- led by Cox, a former Republican lawmaker from California.

Despite similar r?sum?s, the men could hardly be more divergent in ideology and personal style.

Frank, who used an anti-neatness slogan in his first federal campaign 27 years ago, has a lacerating wit. His support for predatory-lending reforms, minimum-wage increases and universal health care mark him as one of the most left-leaning lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

Cox rarely appears in public with a hair out of place or a wrinkle in his perfectly tailored suits. He speaks with deliberation and labors to defuse criticism. Cox cut his teeth in the Reagan White House, and his votes in Congress earned him an 87 percent lifetime rating from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce before he became chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Already, they have clashed over a change to an SEC rule that some investor advocates say will reduce disclosure of executive pay in the form of certain stock awards. The change, announced in a press release three days before Christmas, amounted to a gift to the business lobby, Frank told reporters last week. "I didn't even know they had a chimney at the SEC," Frank joked, true to form.

Equally in character, Cox called Frank to smooth things over, explaining the timing of the move and defending his approach as logical, since, he said, the initial plan would have forced companies to report pay that corporate officials might never have collected.

The damage-control effort appears to have worked, for now. In a follow-up interview, Frank praised the SEC leader for his "responsible" approach at the helm and predicted few sharp disagreements to come. "There are going to be cases where I'll believe we should go further than he," said Frank, who advocates more disclosure to investors .

Frank plans to present his agenda -- what he calls "the grand bargain" -- at the National Press Club today. He will urge lawmakers to offer business concessions on trade and some burdensome regulations in exchange for more housing for the poor and minimum-wage gains.

For years, Frank has focused on housing and income inequality, just as Cox has championed making it easier for companies to win access to capital markets. But while holding fast to those priorities, neither has been reluctant to entertain opposing views.

To date, Cox has pursued a far less ideological agenda at the SEC than governance analysts expected -- and Frank's record reflects a more business-friendly stance than many have assumed. Both men voted in favor of a 1995 law that imposed limits on the filing of class-action securities lawsuits. While in Congress, both reaped significant campaign contributions from banks, insurers, and law and accounting firms. And both have said they turn first to the markets for solutions to economic problems, rather than to government.

Frank, for instance, said he agrees with certain conclusions reached late last year by an independent panel with support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., including making it more difficult for prosecutors to indict businesses. He also supported tweaks to a costly audit rule springing from the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, as long as the intent of the corporate accountability legislation was not thwarted.

"They're both pragmatic," said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America. "I don't think either of them is looking to pursue a radical agenda."

But, as the SEC leader learned last week, Frank is less flexible in the area of ever-expanding executive pay -- an issue that fits into his broader agenda of lessening wealth disparity and one he says could come up for Financial Services hearings as early as March, after he holds oversight sessions on housing problems stemming from Hurricane Katrina. Frank previously introduced legislation that would put executive compensation up for a shareholder vote, a measure he is likely to revisit this year.

"He has certainly been eager for Democrats to have the responsibility for governance," said his sister Ann Lewis, a campaign adviser to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). Lewis says her brother developed a thick skin after years growing up in Bayonne, N.J., and playing in the sometimes brutal fields of Boston politics.

He leavens that intensity with humor to disarm his audience and make a point, which Lewis said "really goes a long way to enabling him to be politically effective."

Cox, by contrast, earnestly strives to reach consensus, making unanimous votes a priority at an agency that had been sharply divided under his predecessor. A series of 5 to 0 votes last year at the SEC is a testament to Cox's political acumen and also makes the agency a less attractive target for Hill Democrats, the consumer federation's Roper said.

That's an observation Frank agrees with. "Chris is a lawyer, and he's a very careful guy," Frank said. "Among other things, he understands he's a law enforcement officer."

Cox, who was pursuing a joint business and law degree from Harvard, and Frank, who by then was studying law and serving as a member of the Massachusetts state legislature, didn't have much contact in Cambridge during the 1970s. On Capitol Hill, they collaborated on only a few issues, including a years-long drive to privatize the National Helium Reserve and an effort to win the release of a Chinese dissident who had lived in Frank's congressional district.

As lawmakers, both men developed a reputation for understanding the details of policy proposals and putting their substantial intellect to use. Whether and how they diverge in their new roles will be one of the more interesting questions of the next year, corporate governance experts said.

"Investors benefit from a bipartisan pro-investor consensus, and we hope that our Republican friends in the regulatory community will work with Barney to achieve that," said Damon A. Silvers, associate general counsel at the AFL-CIO.

Enron's Last Victim: American Markets (NYT)

By WILLIAM A. NISKANEN

Washington

WHEN the new Congress begins its session tomorrow, two familiar faces will not be present: Senator Paul S. Sarbanes and Representative Michael G. Oxley, who are both retiring. Mr. Sarbanes, a Maryland Democrat, has served for 30 years; Mr. Oxley, an Ohio Republican, for 26 — and their main legacy will be their joint attack on corporate corruption, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002.

The act, which was passed hastily in the wake of the Enron scandal, was surely well intentioned. But it has proven counterproductive in the extreme, and Congress would best honor the departing lawmakers by repealing it.

Sarbanes-Oxley has seriously harmed American corporations and financial markets without increasing investor confidence. The section of the law requiring companies to perform internal audits has turned out to be far more costly than proponents projected, especially for smaller firms. These costs have led some small companies to go private, hardly a victory for public oversight, and some foreign firms to withdraw their stocks from American exchanges.

In addition, the average "listing premium" — the benefit that companies receive by listing their stocks on American exchanges — has declined by 19 percentage points since 2002. This explains why the percentage of worldwide initial public offerings on our exchanges dropped to 5 percent last year, from 50 percent in 2000.

Other costs associated with the act may turn out to be more important. For example, more stringent financial regulations and increased penalties for accounting errors may make senior managers too risk-averse. Most chief executives are not accountants, so the requirement that they personally affirm tax reports — at the risk of jail time should anything be amiss — may make them reluctant to partake in perfectly legitimate activities.

Paradoxically, Sarbanes-Oxley's strict rules on oversight by boards of directors would have been insufficient to prevent the collapse of Enron. By the act's standards, Enron had a model board; most members were distinguished professionals. The chairman of the audit committee was a former accounting professor and dean of the Stanford Business School.

Nor would the act's provisions to create a stronger Securities and Exchange Commission have made a difference. The commission had been aware of Enron's accounting techniques since 1992 and had never thought to question them.

Nor was Sarbanes-Oxley necessary in prosecuting the senior managers of Enron, WorldCom and other corporations where fraud was committed — all have been convicted of accounting fraud under laws predating the act.

The negative repercussions of the act on businesses might have been worth it if the act had achieved its primary goal: substantially increasing the confidence of investors in the accuracy of the accounts of firms listed on the exchanges. But that does not seem to have happened.

The best measure of investor confidence is the price-earnings ratio — the price that investors are willing to pay for each dollar of a company's reported earnings. The overall price-earnings ratio for the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, however, has declined continuously since the Sarbanes-Oxley Act was being drafted in the spring of 2002.

Several leaders of the new Democratic Congressional majority have endorsed a relaxation of the audit requirements and other parts of the act. That is encouraging, but it is not enough. The basic structure of Sarbanes-Oxley is unsound.

One big problem is that the act nationalized the rules for corporate governance, reducing the value of the competition among the states for setting such rules. In addition, the act failed to resolve the major conflict of interest created when auditing firms are paid by the companies they audit. Rather than creating a regulation to change the system, Sarbanes-Oxley created an expensive and arguably unconstitutional new regulatory agency to regulate the audit firms' activities.

And, as is too often the case, Congress has rewarded the failures of the very bureaucracies that failed to keep up with Enron — doubling the budget of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Tinkering is not enough. Sarbanes-Oxley continues to discourage smaller companies from trading publicly and foreign companies from listing their stocks on American exchanges. In the eyes of investors, it hasn't cleaned up any corruption, it has only forced companies to jump through hoops. As Senator Sarbanes and Representative Oxley drift into retirement, their act should retire with them.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bruno Deals Eyed (NYDN)

By Joe Mahoney, Daily News Albany Bureau Chief

New York Daily News, January 3, 2007

ALBANY - The FBI has subpoenaed an investment firm for documents related to state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno in a widening probe of the state's top Republican, the Daily News learned yesterday.

A source familiar with the investigation said the firm, McGinn, Smith & Co. of Albany, is "one of the groups Sen. Bruno did consulting for" through his own business.

The FBI, working with a federal grand jury convened by the U.S. attorney's office here, is conducting a wide-ranging inquiry to determine if Bruno has cashed in on his position as legislative leader through his business dealings, sources said.

Bruno, of Rensselaer, has stated he is "guilty of nothing," arguing his business arrangements are independent of the legislation he helps control.

But he has been tight-lipped about his company, Capital Business Consultants, refusing to name its clients or income.

Bruno spokesman John McArdle declined to address questions about the senator's relationship with McGinn, Smith.

The firm's executives could not be reached for comment on the FBI inquiry.

The FBI is also reviewing subpoenaed documents relating to land transactions made by now-dissolved First Grafton Corp., a real estate investment firm that Bruno helped to start, as well as plane rides arranged for Bruno by a wealthy friend, Jared Abbruzzese, sources said.

Abbruzzese was an early investor in Evident Technologies, a high-tech Troy company to which Bruno steered $500,000 in pork barrel "member items" in 2002 and 2004.

Despite the probe, legislative insiders predict Bruno will be reelected today as Senate president, a position he has held for 12 years.

FBI Investigating Murder Of Pascua Yaqui Member (AZDS)

By Brady McCombs, Arizona Daily Star

Arizona Daily Star, January 3, 2007

The FBI is investigating the New Year's Day death of the brother of the chairwoman of the Pascua Yaqui Tribe as a homicide, an FBI spokeswoman in Phoenix said Tuesday.

Gabriel Frias, the 32-year-old brother of chairwoman Herminia Frias, died from shotgun blast to the midsection, an autopsy performed Tuesday by the Pima County Medical Examiner's Office revealed, said Deborah McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman in Phoenix.

The father of three was found shot outside a residential area on the reservation southwest of Tucson early New Year's Day morning, she said. He was conscious when the first responders arrived but died a short time later at about 4 a.m., she said. He was shot more than once but she wouldn't say how many times.

The FBI remained tight lipped about the events leading up to the shooting, possible suspects or motives, citing the need to protect the ongoing investigation, McCarley said. They haven't arrested anyone, she said.

The Frias family, meanwhile, was making preliminary plans for a wake on Sunday and a funeral on Monday, said Pilar Thomas, interim attorney general for the Tribe. The arrangements have not been finalized, she said.

Gabriel Frias, the youngest of six children, is survived by his parents and his three children — a 12-year-old son, a 2-year-old daughter and a 3-week-old boy, Herminia Frias said.

Herminia Frias, 33, who became the tribe's first female leader in June 2004, plans to take some time off to be with her family, Thomas said. Tribal government matters will continue as usual with the other three executive officers handling her duties, she said.

The Tribe has 14,600 enrolled members with nearly 4,000 of them living on the reservation. The tribe has 1,395 acres off West Valencia Road and South Camino de Oeste.

Indicted Cops Turn Themselves In, Other Officers Show Support (NOTP)

By Laura Maggi And Brendan McCarthy, Staff writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 3, 2007

Surrounded by colleagues offering hugs, handshakes and shouts of support, seven New Orleans police officers walked into central lock-up Tuesday morning to be booked on murder and attempted murder charges, stemming from their shooting of six people a week after Hurricane Katrina.

Steady applause broke out as the officers, accompanied by their attorneys and union representatives, began the slow march to jail. At the back of the crowd of more than 200, a woman called out, "Thank you, guys," as others clasped hands with the indicted officers, who appeared visibly moved by the outpouring. One man in the group had tears in his eyes.

Not everyone offered comfort: A handful of protesters, marching outside the ring of support, pronounced the officers guilty and called them terrorists and thugs. And shouts from inside the jail could be heard on the street below — a handful of voices screaming out obscenities and warnings. "Now you are on the inside," one man yelled.

The officer's indictment by a state grand jury indictment last week has clearly galvanized members of New Orleans Police Department, as well as other local police agencies, who turned out on a cold January morning to line South White Street next to the House of Detention.

Police have blasted the indictments, saying the officers who killed two and seriously wounded four on the Danziger Bridge merely carried out their duty, responding to reports of sniper fire at rescue workers. When they arrived at the bridge, on Chef Menteur Highway in eastern New Orleans, they were immediately engaged in a gunfight, police have said.

The grand jury rejected that account, siding with a set of victims who have filed federal lawsuits against the police stemming from the shooting. Those victims have said they were unarmed and did not shoot at the police.

Lance Madison — who police arrested for attempted murder of a police officer but the grand jury later cleared — has said he did hear shooting before the cops arrived. But Madison and his mentally handicapped brother, who police shot and killed, had no weapons and never threatened police, Lance Madison has said.

As the seven accused officers neared the booking department, several fellow law enforcement officers formed a tight-knit circle around them, clasping their hands on backs of the accused and and shuffling them to the doors.

Once they had walked through the jailhouse doors, officers broke out into chants of "N-O-P-D" and "heroes," largely drowning out a small counter-protest of people with signs reading that "police killings must stop."

"I've never seen such an outpouring of support in all the years I've been doing this. It was quite touching," said Franz Zibilich, the attorney for Robert Faulcon, who was indicted on two counts of first-degree murder and four counts of attempted first-degree murder.

Faulcon and the other three officers accused of first-degree murder will be spending an indeterminate amount of time in Orleans Parish Prison, as Chief Judge Raymond Bigelow ruled last week that they are not eligible for bail. Defense attorneys said that they expect to file motions on Wednesday for bond hearings, which are expected to be held Friday.

Sgt. Kenneth Bowen, Sgt. Robert Gisevius, and officer Anthony Villavaso were charged along with Faulcon with the first-degree murder of James Brissette, 19.

Faulcon, who left the force after the flood, was also charged with the first-degree murder of Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally handicapped man whose body was found with seven gunshot wounds to his back and upper arm. Attorneys for the officers maintain that Madison was hit by seven pellets from one shotgun blast.

Zibilich said Faulcon had never discharged his weapon during his four years on the NOPD, calling him a "decorated, perfect police officer" who spent years in the military before joining the force.

Officers Michael Hunter, Ignatius Hills and Robert Barrios were indicted on attempted murder charges, and therefore eligible for bail. Bigelow set a bond of $100,000 for each count of attempted murder.

Only Hunter posted bail on Tuesday. The families of Barrios and Hills are raising money or finding property to use collateral, with the hope that they can get out of jail within the next few days, their attorneys said.

"They aren't people of means," said Bruce Whittaker, the attorney representing Hills.

Special arrangements have been made for the indicted officers within Orleans Parish Prison, said a spokeswoman for the criminal sheriff's office. They will not be locked up with the general population, a typical provision granted to accused and often even convicted police officers.

A handful of protesters marched alongside the officers, outside of the phalanx of supporters. They carried signs—one read "NOPD Terrorism Must Stop"—and chanted for end to police brutality.

The Rev. Raymond Brown, a community activist and New Orleans chairman of the National Action Network, held a sign aloft and screamed with rage.

"They are guilty," he said, "a bunch of thugs."

The New Orleans branch of the NAACP offered more measured criticism of the display of support, saying it sends a bad signal to the public for the police to applaud accused murderers.

"The system should have an opportunity to function," said Danatus King, an attorney and NAACP branch president.

But the protest could stop potential witnesses from coming forward, King said. Further, the fact that an internal police department investgation cleared the indicted officers could also send a dangerous message to the public: that reporting criminal acts by officers will not result in a thorough NOPD inquiry, King said.

The police rally was organized by the Police Association of New Orleans, with members of the Fraternal Order of Police handing out payroll deduction forms and asking members of NOPD to donate at least $5 per biweekly paycheck to a family assistance fund for the officers. The six officers on the force at the time of the indictment were suspended without pay, according to the department.

Watch For Scams, Gulf Coast Homeowners Told (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, January 2, 2007

Officials along the Gulf Coast are warning homeowners that they will likely face a wave of contractor scams in the coming months as they begin collecting billions of dollars in government grants to rebuild what Hurricane Katrina destroyed.

Mississippi has hired six investigators to target schemes aimed at recipients. Louisiana will send out vans to warn consumers about scams and take complaints. Both states are filling the airwaves with warnings about common schemes, and regularly warn aid recipients to research contractors and put work agreements in writing.

The grant programs in both states will distribute as much as $10.5 billion in aid to homeowners and could trigger thousands of building projects in areas already struggling with a shortage of qualified contractors.

"What used to be an occasional complaint about phony contractors or an occasional fraud has turned into — well, the best way I can describe it is blood in the water," says Charles Marceaux, executive director of Louisiana's contractor licensing board. The board now reviews the conduct of about 100 contractors each month, based on complaints from homeowners, Marceaux says. The complaints range from concerns about unqualified local workers to information about rip-off artists from as far away as Mexico, he says.

The temptation of such scams will only intensify as more homeowners start collecting grants, he says. So far, Louisiana's grant program has given money to 104 of the almost 92,000 people who applied, and Mississippi has paid 8,200 of its roughly 17,500 applicants"The biggest risk for fraud is once we put the money into the hands of a homeowner," says Donna Sanford, who runs Mississippi's program.

It's the latest venue for fraud in the federal government's $80 billion hurricane recovery effort, already faulted repeatedly by federal auditors for waste and abuse. The U.S. Government Accountability Office,the investigative arm of Congress, estimated this year that that Federal Emergency Management Agency has made $1 billion worth of fraudulent or unjustified aid payments.

Officials expect contracting schemes will make up the next wave of fraud, in part because taking money from homeowners is already proving far less complicated than scamming the government-run grants, Mississippi State Auditor Phil Bryant says. Both states required that applicants be interviewed in person and prove they own damaged homes; Louisiana also photographed and thumbprinted applicants.

"This is federal taxpayer money, and we're going to have zero tolerance for any fraud, abuse or corruption," Louisiana Attorney General Charles C. Foti, Jr. says. He says his office now gets 125 contractor fraud complaints a week, and the number is increasing.

Panel Seeks End To Death Penalty For New Jersey (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

TRENTON, Jan. 2 — A legislative commission recommended on Tuesday that New Jersey become the first state to abolish the death penalty since states began reinstating their capital punishment laws 35 years ago. Its report found “no compelling evidence” that capital punishment serves a legitimate purpose, and increasing evidence that it “is inconsistent with evolving standards of decency.”

Death Penalty Study Commision Report

The report, whose lone dissenter was the original author of the state’s modern death penalty statute, came a year after New Jersey joined Illinois and Maryland in imposing moratoriums on executions, and amid growing unease among politicians and the public about capital punishment.

Eight other states, including New York, have also suspended executions in recent years, most because of court decisions. Maryland had lifted its moratorium in 2003, after a year, but a court essentially reinstated it last month.

Death penalty experts said that New Jersey was the first state to receive an official recommendation that capital punishment be abandoned, and it lands in a state where legislators have a Democratic majority along with a Democratic governor who supports repeal of the statute.

The governor, Jon S. Corzine, embraced the report on Tuesday. "As someone who has long opposed the death penalty," he said in a statement, "I look forward to working with the Legislature" to carry out the recommendations.

There is ample opposition to capital punishment in both houses of the Legislature, and Senate President Richard J. Codey said in an interview that he expected to ask for a vote, although he would not discuss a timetable.

Assembly Speaker Joseph J. Roberts, who also said he supported an end to the death penalty, issued a written statement saying that he would not consider scheduling a vote until discussing the report with other Democrats, leaving the possibility that repeal legislation could remain locked in committee.

New Jersey's last execution was in 1963, and its death row population has shrunk to nine men. Many appeals have been extended for years by a process known as "proportionality review," meant to assure that capital sentencing was not being arbitrarily applied, before the State Supreme Court.

The 13-member New Jersey Death Penalty Study Commission, including two prosecutors, a police chief, clergy members and murder victims' representatives, began meeting in June and heard from scores of witnesses at five public hearings before issuing the 127-page report.

"Based on our findings, the commission recommends that the death penalty in New Jersey be abolished and replaced with life imprisonment without the possibility of parole, to be served in a maximum security facility," the report said. "The commission also recommends that any cost savings resulting from the abolition of the death penalty be used for benefits and services for survivors of victims of homicide."

If the Legislature did abolish the death penalty, it would be the first to do so since the United States Supreme Court halted all executions in 1972 — after which 38 states rewrote their laws to reinstate the practice. New Jersey restored the death penalty in 1982.

But a repeal would be in line with a nationwide retreat from executions, with the annual count declining by nearly half since 1999. A nationwide Gallup telephone poll in 2006 found Americans almost evenly divided when asked whether a death sentence or life without the possibility of parole was a preferable punishment for murder, after years of previous polls in which a majority supported the death penalty.

"We're in a period of national reconsideration of the death penalty," said Austin D. Sarat, a professor of political science and law at Amherst College in Massachusetts. "I believe what's happening in New Jersey will have a tremendously galvanizing effect."

Richard C. Dieter, the director of the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, attributed the sea change to the many wrongful convictions exposed by DNA evidence. "That is the wedge that has made the death penalty difficult to fix," Mr. Dieter said. "It's all related to the scientific revolution we've had in the last 10 years."

Professor Sarat, the author of the 2001 book, "When the State Kills," said the shift in public opinion had accelerated even in the last few months.

Two weeks ago, a botched execution in Florida underscored doubts about lethal injection and led Gov. Jeb Bush to suspend the death penalty. The same day, a federal court ruled that California's lethal injection procedures violated the constitutional prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment.

"If you'd asked me six months ago if they'd end up in this place, I'd have said no," Professor Sarat said of the New Jersey commission. "I would have said they'd take a more careful route."

New York, which has only one man on death row and has not carried out an execution since reinstating the death penalty, has had a moratorium since the state's Court of Appeals found its law unconstitutional in 2004. The Legislature has not moved to revise the statute.

In New Jersey, a bill to repeal the death penalty was introduced several years ago but never brought to a vote in the judiciary committee of either chamber. But Mr. Codey, the Senate president, said on Tuesday, "I think that will be done."

"What's the use of having a death penalty if at the age of 18 you commit a murder and then have to live longer than Methuselah to be executed?" he asked.

Mr. Codey also pointed to the change in public opinion since the enactment of the death penalty law, as did the commission. The panel cited a 1999 Star-Ledger/Eagleton-Rutgers Poll in which 44 percent of New Jersey residents supported the death penalty and 37 percent preferred life imprisonment without parole, and a 2002 poll that asked the same question found that 36 percent supported the death penalty and 48 percent favored life without parole.

The commission's report, which recommended the life-without-parole alternative, drew stinging responses from several Republicans. "How can they possibly arrive at that conclusion when New Jersey has not enforced the current law even once since its enactment?" the Assembly's minority leader, Alex DeCroce, who represents Morris and Passaic Counties, asked in a written statement.

The dissenter on the commission, John F. Russo, a former State Senate president from Ocean County and a Democrat, said the problem was not in the law but in "the liberal judges and other individuals who have consistently disregarded the legislative will and refused to enforce the law as written."

Mr. Russo, a former prosecutor, recounted a death penalty verdict that he had fought for but left him in tears. "I realize the gravity of the issue," he said, adding that he believed the death penalty should still be available in cases of serial killings and terrorism.

Special Panel Urges New Jersey To Abolish Death Penalty (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hester Jr., Associated Press Writer

AP, January 3, 2007

(AP) - TRENTON, New Jersey-New Jersey should abolish its death penalty and replace it with life imprisonment without the possibility of parole, according to a special commission's report sent Tuesday to Governor Jon Corzine and legislators.

The report, obtained by The Associated Press, found no compelling evidence that New Jersey's death penalty, which has not been used in more than four decades, serves any purpose.

It also found abolishing the death penalty would eliminate the danger of executing an innocent person, and said the death penalty costs taxpayers more than prisoners serving life terms without parole.

"There is increasing evidence that the death penalty is inconsistent with evolving standards of decency," the report said.

"The alternative of life imprisonment in a maximum security institution without the possibility of parole would sufficiently ensure public safety and address other legitimate social and penological interests, including the interests of the families of murder victims," the report found.

One member of the group, former Senator John F. Russo, who wrote the state's death penalty statute when executions were reinstated in 1982, dissented from the commission's findings.

The 13-member commission was formed earlier this year to study capital punishment in a state that has not executed anyone since 1963. Nine men are on death row in New Jersey, but the legislation that created the commission imposed a moratorium on executions until 60 days after the panel completed its work. No execution was imminent when the moratorium was imposed.

The state already was temporarily barred from executing anyone under a February 2004 court ruling that said the state could not execute anyone until it revised procedures on how to impose the penalty. The court had raised concerns about lack of public access to executions and whether the state could handle last-second stays issued after lethal drugs were administered.

Corzine, a Democrat, opposes the death penalty. He is the first elected New Jersey governor to oppose it since Brendan Byrne, who left office in January 1982.

If lawmakers and Corzine implement the commission's recommendation, New Jersey would become the 13th state without a death penalty. New Jersey was the third state to impose a death penalty moratorium to study the issue, behind Maryland and Illinois.

State Prosecutors Getting Federal Help In Child Sex Cases (AP)

Until the state Legislature changes prison sentences for people who distribute child pornography, local prosecutors are getting help from federal officials in putting pedophiles in prison.

Investigators in Harnett County discovered 228 video clips and 124 still photos of child pornography - including some involving a toddler - on Christopher Paul Brady's computer.

In state court, the 31-year-old Brady received three years of supervised probation.

"I got the most I could get," said Assistant District Attorney Mary Wilson.

But federal prosecutors stepped in and charged the Lillington man with trafficking in child pornography. After being convicted, Brady was sentenced to more than 15 years in prison.

"We're saving some people some trauma. We're going to get a good sentence," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Exum, who works with prosecutors on child pornography cases in eastern North Carolina.

Exum works under Project Safe Childhood, a U.S. Justice Department program which was started last year and aims to put pedophiles in prison on lengthy sentences.

FBI statistics show child pornography and exploitation cases increased nationally from 113 in 1996 to 2,135 last year and prosecutors have seen a similar increase in cases coming to court - from 344 in 1995 to 1,576 in 2005.

The state Legislature convenes Jan. 24 and one task is to seek tougher penalties for child pornography charges. State law currently gives prison time to people who make child pornography, but a special legislative committee recommended tougher sentences.

"I think we will get a lot of support in the General Assembly," said Rep. Karen Ray, R-Iredell, and co-chairwoman of the committee. "This is a no-brainer."

Columbus County Assistant District Attorney Samantha Alsup handles pornography cases and said state law doesn't take it seriously.

"Until our state legislature gets tougher on people who look at child pornography, we're going to have to rely on the federal government to keep our communities safe," she said.

UTEP Professor Sues Federal Government (EPTIMES)

El Paso Times, January 3, 2007

A UTEP professor is suing the federal government hoping to force the release of documents surrounding the case of "Lalo," the former Immigration and Customs Enforcement informant involved in drug- related murders in Juárez.

Bill Weaver, an associate professor of political science at UTEP, filed the suit in mid-November against the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Justice because the agencies did not answer his Freedom of Information Act requests from 2005, court documents showed.

What Weaver is seeking are the never-released conclusions of an internal audit looking at the conduct of special agents and prosecutors who monitored the informant, Guillermo Eduardo Ramirez Peyro, 35, known as "Lalo," as 12 men were tortured, killed and buried in a Juárez back yard in 2003 and 2004.

Weaver also wants a sound recording made by the informant of the gruesome killing of an associate, a Mexican lawyer named Fernando Reyes, in August 2003.

The professor said he wants to use the information for an upcoming book.

"If it had happened on the Canadian border, there would be hell to pay," he said. "That just offends me. That's not the business that the U.S. government should be in."

Ramirez was a lieutenant in the Vicente Carrillo Fuentes drug cartel in Juárez and also worked as a U.S. informant, first for the DEA and then for ICE. ICE memos and other documents suggest that ICE agents and U.S. attorney's office officials knew of the ongoing killings but did nothing to stop them.

Ramirez, who is currently fighting deportation to Mexico, said in an immigration hearing that his ICE handlers monitored his phone conversations and knew when a "carne asada," a barbecue, the code name for murder, was being planned.

In October, ICE officials said they considered the case closed.

But the case has lately attracted the attention of the international press and of a few government watchdogs.

DOJ_NMG_0110473

Weaver said he will soon file two more lawsuits over his FOIA requests. One lawsuit will be against ICE for all information applying to Ramirez including payments and debriefings, and the other will be against the federal courts to see what ICE told the courts about Ramirez in order to obtain wiretapping warrants.

DEA officials in El Paso could not be reached for comment today.

The DEA answered Weaver s FOIAs in writing in December 2006, saying that some of the documents he asked for were in South America, correspondence show.

But Weaver in his lawsuit said the documents are readily available in Washington, D.C., and unclassified.

"The delay on this request is troublesome. Several DEA agents have informed me that all of the material requested is together, at headquarters office, and requires no searching of field offices or even any disparate offices at headquarters," he wrote in the lawsuit. "I have a hard time coming to any conclusion other than that my request is being purposefully stalled."

Weaver is senior adviser to the Virginia-based National Security Whistleblowers Coalition, which counts as a member Sandalio Gonzalez, the former special agent in charge of the DEA in El Paso who was openly critical of ICE over the informant affair. The book Weaver is writing is about whistleblowers.

Defense Attorney Pleads For Life Of Truck Driver Convicted In Deadliest Human Smuggling Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

(AP) - HOUSTON-A truck driver convicted for his role in the deadliest immigrant smuggling attempt in the U.S. should not be sentenced to death because he is not the "worst of the worst," his defense attorney told jurors Tuesday.

But prosecutors said Tyrone Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen living in New York state, should be executed because he committed a deliberate act of violence in a depraved manner that resulted in the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants trapped inside a sweltering tractor-trailer.

"The only justifiable punishment in this case should be death," Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez said.

After a nearly monthlong break due to the illness of an attorney and the holidays, the punishment phase in Williams' retrial resumed on Tuesday with opening statements.

Williams was convicted on Dec. 4 for his role in the May 2003 deaths of the illegal immigrants, who succumbed to the deadly heat in the back of his tractor-trailer as he was smuggling them from southern Texas to Houston.

Jurors now have to decide if Williams, who was convicted on all 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting, should be sentenced to death or up to life in prison.

During his opening statement, Craig Washington, Williams' lead attorney, told jurors his client never intended for the immigrants to die and continues to be remorseful about what happened.

Washington said other members of the smuggling ring Williams worked with were equally culpable for what happened, but none of them are facing a possible death sentence.

Washington said Williams can be rehabilitated and that his family, who was present in the courtroom, would be hurt by a death sentence.

But Rodriguez said Williams merits a death sentence because by not freeing the immigrants during the smuggling attempt, he intentionally committed an act of violence that put people at grave risk and caused their deaths.

Rodriguez said Williams' actions were done in a heinous and cruel manner that also put in danger the lives of the other immigrants trapped inside his trailer. More than 70 immigrants were stuffed inside the trailer.

Nineteen of the immigrants died of dehydration, overheating and suffocation after spending nearly four hours inside the oven-like container. Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop in Victoria, about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston.

Family members of the 19 victims are expected to testify during the punishment phase.

Williams is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty. In 2005, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury could not agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

An appeals court granted Williams a new trial after his conviction in 2005 because the jury could not agree on his role in the smuggling attempt.

Division I-A Minority Coaches Grows To Seven (USAT)

By Thomas O'toole

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Floyd Keith isn't ready to proclaim great strides when it comes to hiring minority head football coaches in NCAA Division I-A. But with two moves already this month, the executive director of the Black Coaches Association said Wednesday that he is encouraged by what is happening.

"At the end of the day I still have to wait and see where the numbers end up," he said. "With two I-A hires, that brings it to seven, which, if there is one more hire, would equal the most."

Mario Cristobal, who is Cuban-American, was hired at Florida International, and Randy Shannon, who is African-American, was hired at Miami (Fla.). They join five other current I-A minority head coaches. In 1998 there were eight. As recently as the 2005 season there were three. Eighteen of the 119 jobs in I-A have opened this season, with all but three filled.

Keith's organization began issuing an annual report card on hiring practice in 2004 as a way to bring pressure on schools to at least consider minority candidates. The group also wants recruits and their families to consider a school's BCA grade before signing.

The grade emphasizes minorities brought into the interview process as well as those hired. The third report card, which grades individual schools, was issued in September.

Keith says anecdotally he is encouraged by "what I'm hearing about the numbers of interviews in the current process. But it still gets to, at the end of the day, who's being hired."

Mass. Lawmakers Vote On Gay Marriage (AP)

By Steve Leblanc

AP, January 3, 2007

In a suspense-filled final day of the legislative session, Massachusetts lawmakers kept alive a proposed constitutional amendment Tuesday that would put a stop to gay marriage in the only state that allows same-sex couples to wed.

The vote came after weeks of mounting legal and political pressure on legislators from both sides in the debate.

With a combination of parliamentary maneuvering, flip-flopping and brinksmanship, lawmakers gave the first round of approval necessary for the amendment to appear on the ballot in 2008. The measure still needs the endorsement of the next legislative session.

If the amendment makes it onto the ballot and residents approve it, it will leave Massachusetts' 8,000 existing gay marriages intact but ban any new ones.

"This is democracy in action. It's not a vengeance campaign. It's not a hate campaign. It's just an opportunity for the people to vote," said Kris Mineau of the Massachusetts Family Institute, a conservative group that opposes gay marriage.

If lawmakers had failed to act on the amendment Tuesday, the measure would have died, and opponents of gay marriage who collected 170,000 signatures to try to put the issue on the ballot would have had to start over again.

The pressure on lawmakers came from all sides: Gay rights activists and Democratic Gov.-elect Deval Patrick called on the Legislature to let the measure die without a vote. Gay rights opponents — and Massachusetts' highest court — demanded an up-or-down vote.

The state Supreme Judicial Court — the same court that ruled in 2003 that gays have a constitutional right to marry — declared last week that lawmakers had shirked their constitutional duties by refusing to vote on an amendment submitted by the people. But the justices acknowledged they had no authority to force action.

To advance to the next round, the amendment needed the approval of only 50 of the 200 members of the Legislature. On Tuesday, 61 lawmakers voted in favor, while 132 were opposed.

A few hours later, the lawmakers agreed to reconsider. But then they largely affirmed the original result, with 62 voting in favor of the amendment.

Earlier in the day, the governor-elect, who supports gay marriage, met with the leaders of the Democratic-controlled Legislature to argue against a vote, calling it a "question of conscience."

Patrick charged that the amendment process was being used to "consider reinserting discrimination into the constitution."

"This is not just another question for popular decision. This is a question, under the equal protection clause, about what freedoms the minority is entitled to," Patrick said.

Patrick takes the oath of office Thursday. His predecessor, Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who is considering a run for president, opposes gay marriage.

On Tuesday, crowds of gay marriage supporters and opponents returned to the Statehouse to press lawmakers on the issue.

Proponents of the amendment stood at the foot of the Statehouse steps with signs reading "Let the People Vote."

"Legislators are sent to Beacon Hill to vote on a matter, not to not vote on a matter," said one of the sign holders, Paul Ferro, 30.

Opponents of amendment stood on the opposite side of the street, in front of a Civil War memorial, with their own banners. "Let the people marry," read one.

A person on the pro-gay marriage side held a sign that read, "Start Acting Like Christians." An opponent of gay marriage yelled from across the street, "We are Christians, just like you!"

In November, seven states approved gay-marriage bans, joining 20 that had done so in previous elections.

Other states are moving in the opposite direction: New Jersey's gay couples gained new rights last week when the state legalized same-sex civil unions there. Vermont and Connecticut also allow civil unions.

Same-Sex Marriage Setback In Massachusetts (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

BOSTON, Jan. 2 — Massachusetts, the only state where same-sex marriage is legal, took a first step toward possibly banning it Tuesday when legislators voted to advance a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union between a man and a woman.

The amendment now requires the approval of at least 50 legislators in another vote in the 2007-8 session. Then it would be placed on the November 2008 ballot as a referendum question.

If it passed, the amendment would not invalidate the more than 8,000 same-sex marriages that have taken place since they became legal in May 2004. But it would prevent future marriages of gay men and lesbians.

“This is democracy in action,” said Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, which sponsored the amendment. “It’s giving people the opportunity to vote on the most essential institution in human existence — marriage.”

Arline Isaacson, co-chairwoman of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus, choked back tears.

“The price that our children and families will pay is so severe that we simply have to recommit ourselves to fight this some more,” she said.

The swiftness of the vote on Tuesday surprised people on both sides of the issue, taking place without any debate, just minutes after the constitutional convention had been gaveled into session. Proponents of the amendment needed just 50 of the legislature’s 200 lawmakers to support it; the final vote was 61 in favor of the amendment and 132 opposed.

Later in the day, supporters of same-sex marriage persuaded lawmakers to reconsider the amendment, but the second vote, 62 to 134, only affirmed the results of the first.

National groups on both sides of the issue said they would commit resources to help advocates wage battle here. This past Election Day, the tide had seemed to be turning slightly in favor of supporters of same-sex marriage, with the defeat of an opposition amendment in Arizona and passage of seven others by slimmer margins than similar amendments in 2004.

Just two months ago, at an earlier constitutional convention, the legislature appeared to have essentially killed the proposal to allow a vote. During that session, legislators recessed without voting on the amendment, tabling it until Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session. Both sides said they expected that lawmakers would then vote to end the session without taking up the measure.

But last week, the state's Supreme Judicial Court, which three years ago ruled that same-sex marriage should be legal, threw a wrench into things.

The court chided lawmakers for their maneuvers to avoid a vote on the amendment, saying the legislature had demonstrated "indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties."

The court said it was not empowered to order the legislature to vote on the amendment, which petitioners, including Gov. Mitt Romney, had asked it to do. But the court's criticism appeared to be enough to make some lawmakers, including some supporters of same-sex marriage, decide to allow a vote.

"Certainly, the court ruling changed the atmosphere this week," said Mr. Mineau, whose organization had gathered a record 170,000 petition signatures to get the amendment before the legislature.

Ms. Isaacson said, "The S.J.C. decision really tipped the scales against us."

Tuesday's vote was considered a victory for Governor Romney, a Republican who has used his opposition to same-sex marriage as a conservative rallying point as he has laid the groundwork for an expected run for the presidency in 2008.

In a statement Tuesday, Mr. Romney called the marriage vote "a huge victory for the people of Massachusetts."

By contrast, the vote was something of a rebuke to the incoming governor, Deval L. Patrick, a supporter of same-sex marriage who on Thursday will be sworn in as the first Democrat to occupy the governor's office in 16 years. On Tuesday, before the constitutional convention, Mr. Patrick met with the House speaker and the Senate president, both Democrats, to urge them to find a way to defeat the amendment, even if it meant adjourning without voting on it.

"I believe that adults should be free to choose whom they wish to love and to marry," Mr. Patrick said, adding that he objected to using the constitutional amendment process "to give a minority fewer freedoms than the majority."

After the vote, Mr. Patrick said in a statement, "We have work to do over the next year to turn this around."

The new legislature taking office this month includes more supporters of same-sex marriage. But people on both sides of the issue said it was not clear if the balance had tipped enough to sideline the amendment.

Ms. Isaacson and other gay rights activists have said that, should the initiative get on the 2008 ballot, they fear losing to an expensive campaign that would draw opponents from around the country. Polls in Massachusetts have generally found that just over half of the citizens surveyed supported same-sex marriage, but about the same number wanted the constitutional amendment to come before voters.

On Tuesday, scores of demonstrators lined the street outside the Statehouse and spilled into the building.

"I think it is going to get defeated next time around," said Lea Roy, 38, a supporter of same-sex marriage from Fitchburg who hopes to marry her girlfriend. "It's something you always dream about growing up — getting married. Then it's like, I'm gay and we're not allowed to get married."

But David Wilson, who, along with his partner, Rob Compton, was a plaintiff in the original lawsuit that legalized same-sex marriage, was less optimistic.

"It feels like the rug has been pulled out from under us," said Mr. Wilson, who has married Mr. Compton. "Maybe I'll feel better tomorrow, but today I feel like I've been shot."

Bea Martins, 63, an opponent of same-sex marriage from Fall River, said she was "very pleased" by the vote. As the initiative winds its way through the rest of the process, Ms. Martins said, "my counsel is we continue praying to the dear Lord for justice to be done."

Mass. Gay Marriage Law Contested (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0110477

By Michael Powell And Robin Shulman

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Massachusetts legislators approved a measure yesterday that next year could allow voters to overturn a historic same-sex marriage law in the only state in the nation where such unions are legal.

A bitterly divided state legislature voted to advance a proposed amendment to the state constitution that defines marriage exclusively as a union between a man and a woman. If the measure survives another legislative vote, it will go on the statewide ballot in 2008, a presidential election year.

"It's in the best interests of children and society for marriage to be defined as between a man and woman," said Glen Lavy, a senior counsel with the Alliance Defense Fund, which strongly favors banning same-sex marriage. "The battle to preserve marriage in Massachusetts as between a man and a woman is alive and well."

Voters in 26 states have passed initiatives that effectively ban same-sex marriages. Voters in only one state -- Arizona -- have failed to approve such a ban.

Yesterday's vote fell like a hammer on gay-rights advocates, who have fought a half-decade-long war to gain the right to same-sex marriage in Massachusetts. In 2003 the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled that same-sex couples have a right to marry, and 8,000 couples have since done so.

No gay or lesbian activist involved in this struggle tried to portray yesterday's action as anything but a setback.

"It's a profoundly disappointing vote," said Matt Foreman, executive director of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force. "It's always wrong to put the rights of a minority up to a popular vote."

Only two years ago, Janet Lawn, 46, and her longtime partner, Maryann Chaisson, obtained a legal marriage. She recalls standing in their back yard as a Unitarian minister sounded the words: "By the power invested in me by the state of Massachusetts, I pronounce you married."

"The whole crowd erupted," Lawn recalled. "It was really wonderful on many levels having the dignity and respect to be able to say, 'I'm married.' "

And how does she feel now?

"Pretty awful," she says. "It's painful to have people think that it's okay to vote on the validity of my life and my marriage."

Both sides forecast a wrenching battle if the amendment goes on the ballot in 2008. The Catholic Church and various evangelical denominations have poured money and manpower into the effort. Outgoing Gov. Mitt Romney (R), a social conservative and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, has worked the telephones and has urged legislators to approve a vote on the proposed amendment.

"This is a huge victory for the people of Massachusetts," Romney said in a statement. "In a democracy, the voice of the people is sovereign."

It is by no means clear that Massachusetts voters will overturn the same-sex marriage law, even if they have the chance. In the last few years, a decided majority of state legislators -- and Gov.-elect Deval Patrick (D) -- have supported same-sex marriage and vowed to try to sink the proposed amendment in a legislative session later this year.

A Boston Globe poll last year found that 56 percent of respondents said same-sex marriages should be allowed by law, a sharp increase from a year earlier. "It's going to be wrenching and divisive, but it's a fight the entire gay movement will take on," Foreman said.

Grounded in state law, yesterday's vote was a peculiar one. Once supporters obtain enough signatures, they send the proposed constitutional amendment to the legislature. Only 50 of the 185 legislators need to approve a proposed constitutional amendment in sessions in two consecutive years for it to be placed on the state ballot.

Sixty-two legislators wound up voting for the proposed amendment yesterday; 134 voted against it.

More than a few activists see a bitter battle ahead, and one that could resonate in a presidential election year. "The Republicans use gay marriage as an issue to mobilize their base," Foreman said. "But the reality is that marriage in Massachusetts hasn't caused the sky to fall. The Red Sox even won the World Series since then."

Same-sex 'Marriage' Measure Advances (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0110478

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

Massachusetts lawmakers yesterday twice passed a proposed constitutional amendment to outlaw same-sex "marriage," bending to a recent court ruling that said they had a duty to vote on the measure.

The measure has to pass another joint legislative session before it can be placed on the November 2008 ballot, but yesterday's votes brought relief to supporters.

"Today's victory is about restoring the integrity and authority of the people's constitutional right to petition their government," said Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute and spokesman for VoteOnMarriage.org, which led the 2005 petition drive that garnered 170,000 signatures in favor of the amendment.

The measure seeks to redefine marriage in Massachusetts as the union of one man and one woman, essentially ending homosexual "marriage" in the only state where it is legal. The amendment would not be retroactive, and would not affect the 8,764 same-sex couples who have "married" in the state, according to the Massachusetts Registry of Vital Records and Statistics.

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court legalized homosexual "marriage" in November 2003 with its decision in the Goodridge v. Department of Public Health case. The nation's first legal same-sex "marriages" were performed in May 2004.

Homosexual rights activists expressed dismay with yesterday's votes.

It will be a disaster if the amendment goes to the ballot, said Arline Isaacson, a leader of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus.

"The state will endure one of the nastiest and most divisive debates you've ever seen with the radical-right money pouring in and an anti-gay campaign of the likes people could not possibly imagine," she said.

Gov.-elect Deval Patrick, a Democrat who will be sworn in this week, also decried the measure.

"I believe a vote to advance this question to the 2008 ballot is irresponsible and wrong," he said. "It would do nothing more than condemn us all to more years of debate and expense on a matter that is legally and practically settled."

The joint session yesterday was the final chance for a vote on the marriage amendment. Twice last year, Democratic leaders ended joint legislative sessions without voting on the measure, and a failure to vote yesterday would have effectively killed it.

When lawmakers sidestepped the issue in their November session, amendment supporters, including outgoing Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, took their grievance to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

On Dec. 27, the court unanimously ruled that lawmakers have a constitutional duty to take yes-or-no votes on the merits of pending citizen-initiative amendments, although, the justices added, they did not have the power to force a vote.

Shortly after opening yesterday's joint session, state Senate President Robert E. Travaglini called for a vote on the amendment. Although the vote was 132-61, with the majority against the amendment, it won because it needed only 25 percent approval, or 50 out of 200 votes.

Lawmakers later agreed to reconsider the matter and took another vote in the late afternoon. That vote 134-62 also upheld the amendment.

"I'm very proud that we took a vote," said Democratic state Sen. Susan C. Tucker, an amendment opponent, said later. "I think we owed the people that. At the same time, I'm also equally proud of my 'no' vote," she added.

Crowds of homosexual "marriage" supporters and opponents held rallies outside the State House.

"Legislators are sent to Beacon Hill to vote on a matter, not to not vote on a matter," said Paul Ferro, 30, one of the many proponents with a sign reading "Let the People Vote."

Opponents of the amendment stood on the opposite side of the street with banners reading "Let the people marry."

In November, voters in seven states approved constitutional amendments to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman, bringing the number of states with such amendments to 27.

ANTITRUST:

Qualcomm Under Scrutiny By Korean Antitrust Agency (NYT)

By CHOE SANG-HUN

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea, Jan. 2 — The South Korean antitrust agency has formed a task force to investigate the licensing and business practices of the wireless technology company Qualcomm, the latest in a string of legal battles for the company, officials said on Tuesday.

In Japan, Europe and the United States, Qualcomm, which is based in San Diego, faces accusations by rivals that it has abused its market dominance in wireless technology to demand excessive royalties and block fair competition.

Qualcomm is known for developing code-division multiple access, or CDMA, wireless technology, which is a rival standard to the global system for mobile communications, or GSM, technology. It makes money by selling chips that power cellphones, as well as collecting royalties or licensing its technology to other chip makers and cellphone manufacturers.

The creation of a task force, which is modeled after the one investigating antitrust complaints against Microsoft, means that the case in question merits a full-blown investigation, said Na Yang-ju, a spokesman for the South Korean antitrust watchdog agency, the Fair Trade Commission.

But commission officials also acknowledged that the case against Qualcomm was more complicated than they had expected. A year ago, the commission ruled that Microsoft was guilty of breaching fair trade rules, a decision the company is appealing.

"We have been investigating Qualcomm's case since last April but we have found it to be a complicated case where facts are difficult to establish," a commission investigator, Lee Seung-kyu, said.

South Korea is home to several leading mobile phone makers as well as smaller companies that provide technology and components. More than 80 percent of the country's 48 million people carry cellphones, all based on Qualcomm technology.

"Companies here have constantly complained about Qualcomm demanding too much royalty," said Kevin Lee, an industry analyst at Woori Investment and Securities in Seoul.

"The investigation can be seen as political pressure on Qualcomm to be more friendly toward South Korean companies which use its technology," Mr. Lee added.

Executives at the company said they had no comment because they had not yet received official queries from the Fair Trade Commission.

Investigators from the commission searched Qualcomm Korea's two offices in April, seeking data on Qualcomm's business dealings with Samsung, LG and Pantech.

Qualcomm Korea said it was standing by a statement issued in April by its parent that its "business practices are lawful and procompetitive."

The investigation into Qualcomm was set off last year by complaints from Nextreaming and Thin Multimedia, two South Korean companies that make software that allows cellphone users to download music, surf the Internet and display video over high-speed cellular networks.

Lim Il-tiek, president of Nextreaming, accused Qualcomm of undermining fair competition by bundling its multimedia software into its market-dominant cellphone chip sets.

By JOHN MARKOFF And MIGUEL HELFT

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 2 — In 1997, Jonathan T. Taplin, a veteran film and television producer, stood up at a cable industry convention and asserted that in the future all movies would be distributed over the Internet. He recalls being laughed out of the room.

Mr. Taplin may laugh last. Online distribution of movies has arrived, at places like Apple Computer's iTunes Store. And even though Mr. Taplin's own video-on-demand company, Intertainer, shut down operations five years ago, it says it deserves some credit — and cash.

Last week, Intertainer filed a broad lawsuit asserting that Apple, Google and Napster are infringing on a 2005 patent that covers the commercial distribution of audio and video over the Internet.

Founded by Mr. Taplin and two other Hollywood entertainment executives in 1996, Intertainer developed technology to distribute movies on demand through cable and phone lines for viewing on televisions and personal computers. It gained investors including Intel, Microsoft, Sony, NBC and Comcast.

"Intertainer was the leader of the idea of entertainment on demand over Internet platforms before Google was even thought up," said Mr. Taplin, now an adjunct professor at the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Southern California. He and a secretary constitute the entire remaining staff of Intertainer.

Theodore Stevenson, a partner at McKool Smith, the Dallas firm representing Intertainer, said the company filed suit against Apple, Google and Napster because they were perceived as leaders in the market for digital downloads. He declined to specify the damages that Intertainer was seeking.

Apple, Google and Napster all declined to comment on the lawsuit.

Intertainer's tale is somewhat different than other intellectual property suits brought by technology licensing firms. By 2002 the company seemed to have a growing business, with 125,000 Internet subscribers for its servers and 35,000 TV subscribers through the Comcast cable system.

But in the fall of 2002, the company shut down its service and filed a lawsuit against some of the backers of Movielink, a competitor backed by five Hollywood studios, including Sony, Universal and Warner Brother. At the time Mr. Taplin said the studios were using Movielink as a price-fixing vehicle to kill Intertainer.

An antitrust investigation by the Justice Department into Movielink was dropped in 2004.

The studios settled the lawsuit last March for an undisclosed sum, and Mr. Taplin said in a phone interview Tuesday that Intertainer would henceforth pursue a patent licensing business.

The company holds nine patents, including United States Patent No. 6,925,469, which was issued in 2005 and is intended to cover the management and distribution of digital media from various suppliers.

Despite initial backing from Microsoft and Intel, Mr. Taplin said the two companies were not involved in the decision to bring the Apple, Google and Napster lawsuit. He said that decision was made by Intertainer's board and that none of his original corporate backers have board seats. Several of the company's original investors have taken patent licenses, he said, but he would not name the companies.

Despite the company's decision to file the case in a federal district court in Texas that has traditionally looked favorably on plaintiffs in patent lawsuits, several digital media experts said that Intertainer might have a difficult time enforcing its patent because of its relatively recent filing date, in 2001.

By that time, for example, Real Networks, the Seattle-based pioneer in streaming digital media, had begun a Internet subscription service for digital content.

Legal experts said it was difficult to handicap Intertainer's claims. "There are so many of these lawsuits nowadays," said Eric Goldman, director the High-Tech Law Institute at Santa Clara University School of Law. "It is hard to figure out which ones are a serious threat and which one are not."

Mr. Goldman also said it was unclear what specific technology or service was covered by the Intertainer patent.

"I have the same problem with this patent as so many of the patents of the dot-com boom days: I don't know what it means," Mr. Goldman said.

Mr. Stevenson, the Intertainer lawyer, said the patent covers a system that can be used by content owners to upload their content and used by consumers to download it. "It is pretty basic to the architecture of digital content delivery nowadays," he said.

Mr. Taplin, who once worked as a road manager for Bob Dylan and produced several movies including "Mean Streets," "The Last Waltz" and "To Die For," has a history of activism on technology issues. In 2002, he encouraged those attending a technology conference to urge the Federal Communications Commission to ensure that broadband providers would not be able to block specific Web sites — an early version of a hot-button issue that has become known as network neutrality.

Earlier that year, he testified before the Senate against legislation that would have forced high-tech manufacturers to incorporate technology to prevent piracy in their software and hardware.

Nucor Agrees To Buy Harris Steel Of Canada For $1.07 Billion (NYT)

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

CHARLOTTE, N.C., Jan. 2 (AP) — The Nucor Corporation, the maker of steel products, said Tuesday that it had agreed to acquire the Harris Steel Group of Canada for $1.07 billion.

Nucor, which makes steel from recycled metal at its minimill operations across the United States, said the deal would broaden its geographic reach and give it opportunities to grow.

Nucor bid 46.25 Canadian dollars ($39.69) for each Harris Steel share, a 6 percent premium over the Friday closing price of 43.49 Canadian dollars ($37.32) for Harris shares on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

Harris also had 123 million Canadian dollars ($105.5 million) in debt at the end of September.

The tender offer will be open for at least 35 days and has the support of the boards of both companies, Nucor said.

The companies said John Harris, chairman and chief executive of Harris Steel, and other members of the Harris family and Paul Kelly, Harris Steel's president and chief operating officer, agreed to tender their shares to Nucor, giving Nucor more than 50 percent of Harris Steel shares.

The two companies already have a partnership that dates from 2004, when Nucor paid $21 million to acquire a 50 percent stake in Harris's 11 reinforcing-steel-products operations in the United States.

Harris, based in North York, Ontario, has 23 additional plants in Canada.

The deal requires regulatory approval in the United States and Canada. Nucor, which is based in Charlotte, plans to allow Harris Steel to operate as a separate, wholly owned subsidiary once the deal is completed.

Nucor, which has operations in 18 states, expects the acquisition to bolster earnings immediately.

Shares of Harris rose 2.55 Canadian dollars, to 46.04 Canadian dollars ($39.51) on Tuesday. The New York Stock Exchange was closed Tuesday because of the day of mourning for former President Gerald R. Ford.

Nucor Bets On Finished Steel (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

With its $1.07 billion acquisition of Harris Steel Group Inc. in Canada, Nucor Corp. is breaking from its nonunion tradition and offering a glimpse of where it sees growth in the steel industry.

The move by the Charlotte, N.C., steelmaker also answers a question that has followed Nucor and other steelmakers: where to invest sizable cash reserves from three years of strong steel prices? With this deal, Nucor shows it sees opportunity in finishing steel products for its customers and in distribution rather than adding steelmaking capacity.

The deal comes amid rising concern by some in the steel industry over the potential for raw steelmaking overcapacity. Nucor had said fourth-quarter earnings would be less than expected because of lower shipments and prices.

While many large steel companies are buying other primary steelmakers around the world, Nucor -- which had $1.69 billion in cash on its balance sheet in the third quarter -- is focusing its investment and growth largely in North America's manufacturing infrastructure. Nucor said it sees the construction market growing, with increasing demand for bridges, tunnels, airports and hospitals.

Harris -- which fabricates steel into reinforced steel bar, platform grating and wire mesh for construction products ranging from bridges to airports and stadiums -- serves that market. The move "significantly advances Nucor's downstream growth initiatives," said Nucor Chairman and Chief Executive Dan DiMicco.

In a big challenge for Nucor, about half of Harris's 3,000 employees belong to a mix of ironworker, auto-worker and steelworker unions. Nucor is famously nonunion. "It's definitely a stretch for Nucor, culturally," said Timna Tanners, a steel analyst in New York with UBS Research. "They haven't been quiet about their distaste for unions over the years."

Nucor has managed to keep its other operations nonunion by offering higher salaries and production incentives. But Ms. Tanners suggests the company doesn't have many nonunion options left in North America when it comes to acquisitions and expansions. "We understand that opportunity comes with unions," says Nucor Executive Vice President Hamilton Lott.

Nucor had a joint venture with Harris, which also makes cold-drawn bar products used to make farm machinery, power tools and auto parts, for the past three years and already owned a 50% stake in Harris's U.S. rebar-fabrication division, which produces concrete-reinforcing bar -- a round and ridged bar product used in construction.

To buy the remaining interest in Harris, Nucor has offered 46.25 Canadian dollars (US$39.67) a share, a 6.3% premium to Harris's Friday close of C$43.49 on the Toronto Stock Exchange. The offer has the support of both companies' boards. Harris will keep its name, as a Nucor subsidiary, and be led by current Chairman and CEO John Harris. The Harris board, however, will consist of three Nucor representatives and Mr. Harris.

Harris reported net income of C$25.62 million in the third quarter and C$63.5 million in the first nine months of 2006. Sales totaled C$387 million in the third quarter and C$1.08 billion in the first nine months of 2006.

Previously, the largest acquisition Nucor made was the 2002 purchase of Birmingham Steel for about $615 million. In past decades, Nucor grew by building new steel minimills and shunned acquisitions. But, in recent years, consolidation swept the global steel industry and brought new competitors such as minimill competitor Gerdau SA, of Brazil, which acquired numerous minimills in the U.S. Nucor, in turn, has been acquiring smaller steel minimill operations that have come up for sale.

Gerdau Ameristeel, the North American subsidiary of Gerdau SA, and Dallas-based Commercial Metals Inc. are large players that produce rebar and deliver and install the material on job sites. Reinforcing bar is the largest business segment for Harris Steel, and Nucor now has a similar method of producing steel and distributing it all the way to construction sites.

In Brief Seminoles Face Lawsuit Over Hard Rock Deal (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Baltimore development firm Cordish Co. and affiliate Power Plant Entertainment LLC filed suit in Broward County Circuit Court in Florida, claiming the Seminole Tribe of Florida was able to buy the Hard Rock chain of cafes and casinos through collusion and bid rigging. The plaintiffs allege Hard Rock Cafe International Inc. management secretly negotiated with the Seminoles for seven months before plans to sell were announced in July. Power Plant, a partnership between Cordish and Coastal Development LLC, was the original developer of two Seminole Hard Rock casinos and hotels in Tampa and Hollywood, Florida. The Seminoles last month agreed to buy the chain for $965 million from the U.K.'s Rank Group PLC. In a statement, the Seminoles accused Cordish of being "a sore loser" and insisted the deal went through "a lengthy and open bidding process." They said the lawsuit "has no merit." Rank Group shareholders are scheduled Monday to vote on the sale.

Inquirer Begins Layoffs

The Philadelphia Inquirer began a round of long-expected layoffs amid a drop in circulation and ad revenue. In all, 68 newsroom employees were expected to be laid off, a company spokesman said. The Inquirer and the Philadelphia Daily News were purchased for $562 million by Philadelphia Media Holdings, an investment group led by Brian Tierney, a former advertising executive who is now the papers' chief executive and publisher. In November, Mr. Tierney announced that layoffs in the 415-worker newsroom were unavoidable. Layoffs aren't expected at the Daily News.

Starbucks Trims Fats

Starbucks Corp. is cutting trans fats from the doughnuts, muffins and other treats in half of its U.S. stores, and plans to eventually drop the artery-clogging fats from all company-operated U.S. coffeehouses. Spokesman Brandon Borrman said the Seattle company's standalone stores in Seattle, San Francisco, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Diego, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Portland, Ore., will have no trans fats in their food as of today. In December, New York became the first American city to ban artificial trans fats in restaurants and eateries. With some exceptions, restaurants will be barred from using spreads and frying oils containing artificial trans fats by July 1.

Protecting Internet Democracy (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0110483

One of the big winners in the last election may turn out to be the principle, known as net neutrality, that Internet service providers should not be able to favor some content over others. Democrats who are moving into the majority in Congress — led by Ron Wyden in the Senate and Edward Markey in the House — say they plan to fight hard to pass a net neutrality bill, and we hope that they do. It is vital to preserve the Internet's role in promoting entrepreneurship and free expression.

Internet users now get access to any Web site on an equal basis. Foreign and domestic sites, big corporate home pages and little-guy blogs all show up on a user's screen in the same way when their addresses are typed into a browser. Anyone who puts up a Web page can broadcast it to the world.

Cable and telephone companies are talking, however, about creating a two-tiered Internet with a fast lane and a slow lane. Companies that pay hefty fees would have their Web pages delivered to Internet users in the current speedy fashion. Companies and individuals that do not would be relegated to the slow lane.

Creating these sorts of tiers would destroy the democratic quality of the Internet. Big, wealthy voices would start to overpower the smaller, poorer ones. Innovation would be threatened if start-ups and small companies could not afford the new fees. The next eBay or Google might never be born.

A net neutrality law would require cable and telephone companies to continue to provide Web sites to Internet users on an equal basis. Mr. Markey, of Massachusetts, will be taking over a key subcommittee that handles Internet issues. He has promised to hold hearings to educate Congress and the public, and to reintroduce his strong net neutrality bill. Mr. Wyden, of Oregon, plans to reintroduce an equally solid bill in the Senate.

Passing the legislation will not be easy. The cable and telephone companies have fought net neutrality with a lavishly financed and misleading lobbying campaign, because they stand to gain an enormous windfall. But there is growing support from individuals and groups across the political spectrum, from MoveOn.org to the Gun Owners of America, who worry about what will happen to their free speech if Internet service providers are allowed to pick and choose the traffic they carry.

In the last week, there was a limited but important victory for net neutrality. As a condition of approving the AT&T-BellSouth merger, the Federal Communications Commission required AT&T to guarantee net neutrality on its broadband service for the next two years. The commission was right to extract this concession, but it should not be necessary to negotiate separate deals like this one. On the information superhighway, net neutrality should be a basic rule of the road.

Dge To Decide Dispute Over Fort Reno Land (AP)

EL RENO, Okla. — A federal judge in Washington will decide whether the federal government wrongfully took about 7,000 acres of land belonging to the Cheyenne-Arapaho Tribes of Oklahoma.

Attorneys for the Cheyenne-Arapaho filed an 18-page response on Friday to the government's motion to dismiss the tribes' lawsuit over the land. The tribes want to do oil exploration on the land and use it for development of retail, offices and possibly a casino, Cheyenne-Arapaho Gov. Darrell Flyingman said.

"It's valuable land," he said. "There's hundreds of oil and gas wells right around Fort Reno. That's one of the reasons they're trying to keep it."

In 1869, the Cheyenne-Arapaho were moved from Colorado onto 5 million acres west of Oklahoma City. Fourteen years later, a presidential order whittled 9,000 acres off their reservation to create Fort Reno. The tribes believe the land was to revert to them when the government no longer needed it for military purposes.

When the cavalry abandoned the post in 1908, it became a "remount station," where horses and mules were raised and trained for the military. When the remount station closed in 1954, the government announced the property would be set aside for possible military use.

James M. Upton, the Justice Department attorney representing the government, did not reply to messages seeking comment.

According to the government, which is seeking to dismiss the tribes' lawsuit, the Cheyenne-Arapaho claim on the land died in 1891, when the reservation was allotted and the tribes signed an agreement ceding the remaining 400,000 acres, which then were opened to non-Indian settlement.

The tribes say they never ceded the Fort Reno land and that the government remained bound to its promise to return it to them when no longer needed for military use.

"It's our land. We never gave it up," Flyingman said.

The tribes received 2 cents per acre in 1891, then $15 million more in 1965 after filing a lawsuit under the Indian Claims Commission Act, which was designed to correct past injustices in land dealings with Indian tribes.

The tribes say the payment covered the rest of the old reservation, excluding the Fort Reno land.

A bill in Congress, the Fort Reno Mineral Leasing Act, would've authorized the Agriculture Department secretary to open the land to oil and gas exploration.

The measure, co-sponsored by Sen. Jim Inhofe, R-Okla., died when the 109th Congress adjourned Dec. 9, but Flyingman suspects it will be re-introduced in the coming session.

"We have a big fight on our hands. We're taking on the Oklahoma delegation plus the oil companies," he said.

In a statement in November, Inhofe, said the measure "... allows USDA to lease the property, while at the same time allowing some of the funds from the leasing to be put toward renovating and maintaining the historic buildings at Fort Reno."

Since 1948, the U.S. Department of Agriculture has operated a research station at Fort Reno and hosted Historic Fort Reno, a nonprofit organization that runs the old fort as a historic site.

Should the tribes prevail, Flyingman said both will be invited to stay.

Feds Alter Timetable For Trial In Reactor Case (TOLB)

By Tom Henry, BLADE STAFF WRITER

Toledo Blade (OH), January 3, 2007

Davis-Besse trio charged with lying

Federal prosecutors veered off their timetable for having criminal charges against two former Davis-Besse engineers and a contractor heard in U.S. District Court by the end of this fall - partly because of the complexity of the case, and partly because of recent finger-pointing among the trio.

The case now may be split into at least two trials.

Defendants Andrew Siemaszko, of Spring, Texas; David Geisen, of DePere, Wis., and Rodney N. Cook, of Millington, Tenn., face up to five years in prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted on charges of making false statements to a federal agency.

Mr. Siemaszko and Mr. Geisen are former Davis-Besse engineers. Mr. Cook is a contractor who had been associated with the Ottawa County nuclear plant for years.

Each is accused of jeopardizing northern Ohio's safety five years ago by lying about Davis-Besse's old reactor head when the Nuclear Regulatory Commission was debating whether the plant was too dangerous to keep operating in the fall of 2001.

Siemaszko

Zoom | Photo Reprints The NRC, based on what it learned in subsequent months, said acid melted so much steel off the massive lid that it nearly blew open and allowed radioactive steam to form in containment for the first time since the partial meltdown of Three Mile Island Unit 2 in 1979.

The agency ultimately said there's no question FirstEnergy Corp., in hindsight, should have shut down the plant at least six weeks earlier than it did on Feb. 16, 2002.

Sometime early this year, Judge David Katz of U.S. District Court in Toledo is expected to hear arguments about keeping the case as one trial or splitting it into two.

U.S. Department of Justice attorneys want one trial. Mr. Siemaszko's attorneys have asked for their case to be heard separately from Mr. Geisen and Mr. Cook, and vice versa.

All defendants claim in separate filings that the government's case centers around five letters that FirstEnergy sent to the NRC in the fall of 2001.

None of the three defendants signed the letters. But all are alleged to have helped prepare or approve the information in them.

Based on conflicting information about their roles, a jury "could disbelieve all three of the defendants but, if tried together, it cannot believe all three defendants," a brief from the Siemaszko defense team said.

It claims "his former colleagues are now severely antagonistic towards him and accuse him of providing them the information submitted and upon which they relied."

A brief from the attorneys representing Mr. Geisen and Mr. Cook said their clients have likewise been victims of antagonistic behavior on the part of Mr. Siemaszko, and claim that statements he has made about them to investigators are false.

Chuck Boss, a Maumee attorney and part of Mr. Siemaszko's defense team, said he believes his client's case would go first if the judge grants two trials.

"The defenses of these people are diametrically opposed to one another. They're 180 degrees apart." Chuck Boss, a Maumee attorney on Andrew Siemaszko's defense team Mr. Siemaszko has been held up as a whistle-blower by the Union of Concerned Scientists and Ohio Citizen Action.

Both groups maintain that he is being punished for trying to shed light on Davis-Besse's problems.

In September, Mr. Siemaszko sued FirstEnergy for wrongful termination and breach of contract in Ottawa County Commons Pleas Court. That case also is pending.

Federal court records claim both sides believe neither can get a fair trial if the criminal cases are heard together. Jury selection for a single trial has been tentatively scheduled for April 16, although that date is subject to change if two trials are granted.

Mr. Siemaszko's attorneys also are trying to subpoena FirstEnergy computer records that they consider vital to his defense.

Cynthia Magnuson, Justice Department spokesman, last week reiterated the government's policy of declining comment on pending litigation.

Mr. Geisen's attorney, Richard Hibey, of Washington, had little to say beyond acknowledging that motions are to be heard. Mr. Cook's attorney, John Conroy, also of Washington, could not be reached for comment.

Last January, FirstEnergy Corp. was handed a $28 million fine, the largest in U.S. nuclear history, for its corporate role in covering up evidence about Davis-Besse's old reactor head.

Indictments were announced the same day against the trio. They are the only current or former employees to be charged. Federal prosecutors said at the time they expected either to get pleas from the three defendants or have their cases heard by late fall 2006.

The government wound up asking for more time. It cited the complexity of the case and its 20,000-plus documents.

Bush Tipped To Talk Tough On Energy But Snub Kyoto (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Energy will be a central theme of President George W. Bush's state of the union speech this month, as it was in last year's address when he briefly caught national attention with the claim that the country was "addicted to oil".

But his critics doubt that he will do much more than call for more spending on alternative fuels, and again fail to embrace international efforts to agree a post-Kyoto regime to tackle greenhouse emissions.

"We've had the hydrogen economy, then alternative fuels, and 'addicted to oil'," said a senior industry lobbyist. "Yet on close Senate votes, such as drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, he has not put his prestige on the line by making personal calls. Energy policy has been the creation of Congress. Almost anything Bush says in the speech is irrelevant the day after he says it."

The administration rejects that, with one senior official noting: "It's a lot more than rhetorical: what was done with the 2005 act was substantial." Mr Bush has identified energy as a key area for bipartisan co-operation in the next two years.

Al Hubbard, chairman of the National Economic Council, who is co-ordinating White House energy policy, has also raised expectations. In a speech at De Pauw University he predicted "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence".

"One of the challenges is how they differentiate themselves from last year," warned Spencer Abraham, energy secretary in Mr Bush's first term. "You have had a big commitment to hydrogen and to ethanol. We thought $1.7bn over five years on hydrogen was big bucks but it was seen as insufficient by our critics. Maybe $10bn is enough to get attention. But the question is whether it is actually implemented by Congress."

Current and former administration officials admit that the $2bn announced last year in loan guarantees for alternative fuels, such as clean coal technologies, has been snarled in bureaucracy. The deadline for applications has now been extended.

Growing concern from US executives was underscored in the report last month from the Energy Security Leadership Council, a high-profile group of executives and retired generals. They called for increasing the supply of domestic oil but also giving more attention to energy efficiency, notably raising Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards, designed to improve vehicle fuel efficiency by 4 per cent annually.

The latter would be popular. According to a recent Wall Street Journal poll, 74 per cent of Republicans would support higher standards even if it increased vehicle prices. A Democratic aide on the House energy committee said: "Doing something meaningful on vehicle fuel efficiency would be a major step forward for this administration."

Robert Hormats, vice-chairman at Goldman Sachs and a leadership council member, briefed senior White House officials, including Mr Hubbard, on the report. "Discussion was most extensive in alternative sources of energy and the idea of additional drilling," he said. "There was some discussion of Cafe standards, but the point was if they prove to be technologically undoable, they are harmful."

Another participant at the meeting said: "It was not just a courtesy meeting. They were most interested in the specifics and why 4 per cent was chosen as an annual increase, and whether the group would seriously engage or go back to running their companies."

Mr Hormats told the Financial Times that he would like to see Mr Bush create a commission, using the council as a prototype, "with both financial and military people to develop critical mass to address this issue, like Alan Greenspan did in 1983 with social security."

There is some optimism that the White House could move on Cafe standards. David Conover, director of the US Climate Change Technology Programme until February, said: "It is conceivable that he could endorse a set of principles giving him administrative flexibility to set Cafe standards, but more likely it will be a call on Congress to respond to his 10-month request to strengthen standards."

Such a move could bolster Mr Bush's credibility on energy but would face a difficult vote in Congress, given the lobbying power of car makers and the fact that John Dingell, who represents Detroit, will chair the House energy committee. In December Bob Lutz, vice-chairman of General Motors, warned that changing the standards would in effect "hand the truck and SUV market over to the imports, particularly the Japanese".

There are fewer hopes of an administration shift on climate change. In spite of pressure from leaders such as Tony Blair, the British prime minister, senior officials resist deeper engagement on limiting greenhouse gas emissions after the Kyoto protocol ends in 2012, and remain privately dismissive of the conclusions in the British Stern report on global warming, which called for 1 per cent of gross domestic product to be spent on fighting climate change.

US Reliance On Opec Highest In 15 Years (FT)

By Ed Crooks And Javier Blas

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

US dependence on the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries for its oil imports has risen to its highest level in 15 years, following Angola's arrival this week as the 12th member of the oil producers' group.

Angola's entry was agreed at the Opec meeting in Abuja, Nigeria, last month, and was formalised on Monday. The African country is the first new member to join the oil cartel since 1975.

The move comes at a time when Opec is trying to exert more influence, as seen in its decision at the December meeting to cut 500,000 barrels a day from its output from February.

Including Angola, Opec now supplies more than 54 per cent of the oil imports of the developed countries, its highest level for five years. For the US, the increase is even sharper: at more than 52 per cent, Opec's share of US oil imports is at its highest since 1992.

Angola is particularly significant because it is one of the fastest-growing producers. Reasonable projections suggested it would have provided about a quarter of the total increase in non-Opec oil production this year.

Important new fields developed by Total of France, Chevron and Exxon Mobil of the US, and BP of the UK are either just coming on stream or are expected to begin producing in the next couple of years. That is helping to lift Angola's production from about 1.45m b/d towards the end of last year to an expected 2m b/d by the end of this year. The World Bank expects production to peak at 2.6m b/d in 2011 – more than the current output of Nigeria, Africa's biggest producer.

However, Angola's entry into Opec is unlikely to have much impact on the price of oil. It has yet to agree a production limit with the group, and Opec officials have suggested that its planned production increase is likely to be accommodated by the group. As a result, the global balance of supply and demand is not expected to change. As one Opec official put it: "It is just a question of moving Angola's production from one column into the other."

Edward Morse, chief energy economist of Lehman Brothers, suggested Angola's entry could cause problems for the group.

"For Opec it implies greater overall market share for the producer group, but at the cost of uncertainty over Angola's eventual compliance with a quota that has as yet to be assigned. It certainly makes Saudi efforts to control the group's overall production more tenuous."

Mr Morse added that maintaining discipline could be more difficult because Angola had a record of paying "lip service only" to production agreements.

That assessment was echoed by Rafael Morais, an Angolan freelance journalist, who suggested that the government could want to join Opec for "a kind of cartel's protection, leverage and a sort of club's prestige" while not necessarily wanting to abide by all its rules.

He said: "It can join Opec and still produce as much as it wants and sell at pleasure through non-transparent channels. It's like having the cake and eating it too."

Gansler Vows 'All-Out Assault' On Bay Polluters (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Douglas F. Gansler, Montgomery County's longtime prosecutor, pledged an "all-out assault" on those who pollute the Chesapeake Bay as he was sworn into office yesterday as Maryland's first new attorney general in two decades.

In the Senate's marbled chamber in Annapolis, where the outgoing Republican governor administered the oath of office, Gansler, a Democrat, ticked off a list of the estuary's environmental woes. He cited swimming bans at Sandy Point State Park in Annapolis and declining oyster harvests, saying, "Some fish don't even know if they're boys or girls anymore -- it's gotten that bad.

"We're going to wage an all-out assault on those who pollute our air and water," Gansler said.

The pledges echoed campaign promises that helped carry Gansler to a comfortable victory in November in his bid to fill the seat left vacant by J. Joseph Curran Jr., a fellow Democrat who, after two decades as the state's chief legal officer, decided not to run for another term.

Gansler, 44, had been Montgomery state's attorney since 1998. He drew attention last year by winning convictions against John Allen Muhammad and Lee Boyd Malvo, the snipers who terrorized the region in 2002.

Despite the dire proclamations about the health of the bay, yesterday's ceremony in many respects had the feeling of a family affair. Gansler spoke of his wife, Laura, and their two sons, who, he jokingly said, did not understand the concept of spending $2 million to win a job that pays $125,000 a year.

The ceremony was emceed by Gansler's father, an undersecretary of defense in the Clinton administration, who shares his son's gift for ease with public speaking.

"Tell a joke," Gansler called out to his father as the crowd waited for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. to arrive.

Jacques S. Gansler did not exactly tell a joke, but laughter rippled across the chamber as he spoke of his efforts years ago at the Pentagon to start meetings on time. The elder Gansler spoke of close media scrutiny -- "abuse from the press," he called it -- and said public service is often not rewarding.

"I'm so pleased that my son's willing to take that kind of responsibility on," he said.

Ehrlich, who leaves office this month, arrived a moment later to administer the oath to Gansler. Afterward, Gansler and the governor shared a hug and patted each other on the back.

In his address, Gansler said he was "very, very, very honored" that Ehrlich participated in the ceremony. "I look forward to being your lawyer for the next two weeks," Gansler told the governor.

Gansler also paid tribute to Curran, whom he described as a "wonderful person" of uncommon popularity. "Nobody can serve 48 years in public service and be beloved as he is," Gansler told Curran.

Curran, who praised Gansler, said that he is not sure what he will do next but that he has been approached about leading the Injured Workers' Insurance Fund, a quasi-state agency whose director stepped down last week. "As one door shuts, another one opens," Curran said.

With its staff of 420 lawyers, the attorney general's office acts as the legal counsel to many institutions of state government. It also represents the government in all cases in state and federal appellate courts. In addition, it has the power to prosecute a range of criminal activity, including white-collar crimes, health-care fraud and multi-jurisdictional crimes.

Gansler has promised to take an "activist approach" to the job. In addition to standard fare such as consumer protection and antitrust matters, he said in an interview that he plans to push legislators to enact a racketeering law that would give state prosecutors powers similar to those that federal prosecutors have used to fight gangs.

He said he will also establish an antigang task force that could work with local state's attorneys on those cases, which generally involve multiple defendants and are resource-intensive.

On the environment, Gansler singled out coal-burning power plants, saying that they tend to be in less-affluent areas and are responsible for respiratory ailments that disproportionately affect African Americans.

In an approach that underscores his pledge to use the power of his office in innovative ways, Gansler said the prevalence of those ailments should be viewed as a civil rights issue, one that could presumably be addressed in court.

Gansler, whose election has also been seen as emblematic of the diffusion of political power once centralized in Baltimore, said he will move one division of the office, fewer than 20 lawyers, to a location not yet selected in the Washington suburbs.

As Costs Of Wildfires Grow, So Does A Question: Who Should Pay? (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

DENVER, Jan. 2 — The steeply rising cost of preventing and suppressing wildfires, which burned more of the American landscape in 2006 than in any other year since at least 1960, is creating a rift between Washington and state and local governments over how the burden ought to be shouldered.

The scorched landscape adjoining a residential development near Los Angeles bears witness to a fire last month that gutted five houses.

A study issued in November by the inspector general's office of the United States Department of Agriculture, the parent agency of the Forest Service, said the nature of the wildfire threat was changing as private homes and communities pushed ever closer to the boundaries of once-remote public lands. Those communities and landowners, rather than federal taxpayers, should have to pay for more of their own fire protection, the report concluded.

States and local governments are gearing up to fight back in Congress, arguing that decades of federal mismanagement of national forests and open spaces, not development, created the threat and that little communities with few resources are neither responsible for it nor equipped to make a difference.

The pattern of wildfire distribution during the recently ended fire season, which charred more than 9.8 million acres, supports either side. According to federal statistics, more state, county and private lands burned than in any other year since 1997 — about half the total 2006 losses — primarily because of monstrous blazes in Oklahoma, in Texas and across the Upper Plains, regions where most property is privately owned.

That finding, though also driven by broader factors like drought and heat that have little to do with residential development in fire-prone areas, supports the federal contention that the government has had to shift an increasingly large share of its resources from the task of protecting its own forests to firefighting elsewhere.

In some places, though, the issue is more complex. In Stillwater County, Mont., north of Yellowstone National Park, for example, the small, long-established towns of Nye and Fishtail are bordered on two sides by national forest. In early July, the first of two huge fires erupted in the forest and roared into those communities, where 100,000 acres of mostly private land and 32 homes were burned. The blaze was the worst in the county's history, local officials say.

"The forest is very dry and primed for fires started by lightning, and when that occurs in a forest not managed as well as it could have been, it soon gets out of control and meets the community," said Ken Mesch, the Stillwater County disaster and emergency services coordinator. "If the federal government started pulling back money for fire suppression, they would be hanging us out to dry."

Federal land managers say protection of private land at the boundaries of public space — called the wildland-urban interface — is the fastest-growing component of the nation's firefighting budget. In 2003 and 2004, the inspector general's report estimated, the Forest Service spent at least half a billion dollars, and perhaps as much as a billion, protecting private property in such areas.

The trend is similar at the Interior Department, which oversees hundreds of millions of acres of public lands in the West through the Bureau of Land Management, the Fish and Wildlife Service, and the National Park Service. Fire prevention activities — controlled fires or thinning of burnable vegetation — have shifted there toward the interface lands, said Lynn Scarlett, deputy interior secretary.

Ms. Scarlett said that almost half the 1.1 million acres treated by the Interior Department for fire-risk reduction in 2006 were in interface zones, about double the proportion as recently as 2002. She said her department, too, was considering that it demand increased cost-sharing by state and local governments, though she emphasized that any outcome would have to be collaborative.

"One of the last things you want in an emergency is people squabbling over who's going to pay," she said.

The report from the Agriculture Department's inspector general said a major problem was simply the weight of accumulated assumptions: fire response in the West has long meant federal authorities' riding to the rescue, with no questions asked and no cost too great to bear.

"Public expectations and uncertainties about protection responsibilities," the report said, "compel the Forest Service to suppress fires aggressively and at great expense when private property is at risk, even when fires pose little threat to National Forest system land."

About 8.5 million homes were built at the wildland-urban interface within the interior West in the 1990s alone, according to the Forest Service. But state and local officials say they already pay their share to protect those communities and homeowners, partly because the residential growth has coincided with years of federal budget cuts. Arizona, for instance, now has 12 to 14 air tanker firefighting aircraft under contract, up from 2 to 4 in 2005, as a result of reduced federal spending on tankers, said Lori Faeth, a policy adviser to Gov. Janet Napolitano.

"Our forests are in the condition they are because of poor federal management," Ms. Faeth said. "They've put us in this position, and they have the responsibility to pay for it."

The Forest Service's director of fire and aviation management, Tom Harbour, said the agency would follow up on the inspector general's recommendations. "We're not going to walk away," Mr. Harbour said, "but we will engage in a vigorous debate with our partners about the right way to split the pie."

Still, money is only part of the issue, he said. Communities and developers in the West should be thinking in new ways as well, he said, including the use of fire-wise construction techniques and preparedness plans that involve residents in their own defense even before fires start.

Many land experts say hardly anyone is addressing the most tangled and emotional question raised by the debate: how much or how little voice federal land managers should have in land-use decisions.

“Thinking through in advance the fire implications of a new subdivision next to a national forest boundary — that doesn’t happen,” said James L. Caswell, administrator of the Idaho Office of Species Conservation.

Given the property rights issue and the tension between local governments and Washington that has shaped the West’s culture for the last century, a system of planning that allows federal officials veto power would seem unlikely.

Mr. Caswell said better planning must be part of the solution. “A thousand houses next to a boundary could overwhelm all the other cost-control issues,” he said.

“But,” he added, “that’s a very emotional topic, so it’s really hard to deal with.”

Hurricane Expert Mayfield Warns Of Potential Disaster (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

MIAMI, Florida — Frustrated with people and politicians who refuse to listen or learn, National Hurricane Center chief Max Mayfield ends his 34-year government career tomorrow in search of a new platform for getting his unwelcome message: Hurricane Katrina was nothing compared to The Big One yet to come.

Mayfield, 58, leaves his high-profile job with the National Weather Service more convinced than ever that U.S. residents of the Southeast are risking unprecedented tragedy by continuing to build vulnerable homes in the tropical storm zone and failing to plan escape routes.

He pointed to the 7 million coastal residents of southern Florida.

"We're eventually going to get a strong enough storm in a densely populated area to have a major disaster," he said. "I know people don't want to hear this, and I'm generally a very positive person, but we're setting ourselves up for this major disaster."

More than 1,300 deaths across the Gulf Coast were attributed to Hurricane Katrina, the worst human toll from a weather event in the United States since the 1920s.

But Mayfield warns that 10 times as many fatalities could occur in what he sees as an inevitable strike by a killer storm during the current highly active hurricane cycle, which is expected to last another 10 to 20 years.

His apocalyptic vision of tens of thousands dead and millions homeless is a different side of the persona he established as head of the hurricane center.

Mayfield attained national celebrity status during the tempestuous 2004 and 2005 seasons, appearing on network television with hourly updates as hurricanes Charley, Ivan, Frances and Wilma bore down on the Caribbean and the U.S. Southeast. His calm demeanor and avuncular sincerity endeared him to millions of TV viewers seeking survival guidance.

And he argues that his own dire predictions don't have to become reality.

The technology exists to build high-rise buildings capable of withstanding hurricane-force winds and tropical storm surge even more powerful than experienced in the past few years. Much of Hong Kong's architecture has been built to survive typhoons, and hotels and apartments built in Kobe, Japan, after a 1995 earthquake devastated the city are touted as indestructible, he said.

What is lacking in the United States is the political will to make and impose hard decisions on building codes and land use in the face of resistance from the influential building industry and a public still willing to gamble that the big one will never hit, he said.

"It's good for the tax base" to allow developers to put up buildings on the coastline, Mayfield said in explaining politicians' reluctance to deter housing projects that expose residents to storm risks.

"I don't want the builders to get mad at me," he said, "but the building industry strongly opposes improvement in building codes."

DOJ_NMG_0110491

Consumers also have yet to demand sturdier construction, Mayfield added. A builder gets a better return on investment in upgraded carpet and appliances than for safety features above and beyond most states' minimal requirements, he said.

As a senior civil servant, Mayfield was prohibited from making job inquiries in the private sector while still in the government's employ. But he said on Tuesday, his last day in office, that he hopes to launch a second career as a consultant in emergency planning and disaster response. He has particular interest in a potential public-private initiative to mine natural disaster scenes for their educational value.

He envisions a natural disaster assessment service equivalent to the National Transportation Safety Board that probes the causes and consequences of aviation and other transport accidents.

Mayfield said he is also pondering collaboration with advocates of tougher building standards and land use regulations.

One particularly disturbing statistic he cites is that even after the devastating hurricane seasons of 2004 and 2005, fewer than 50 percent of those living in storm-prone areas make plans for evacuating in the event of an approaching hurricane.

While he has been critical off the Federal Emergency Management Agency in its response to Katrina's devastation of New Orleans, he warns against depending too heavily on the federal government after natural disasters.

"You don't want the federal government to be your first-responders," he said. "The government can't do everything for people and it shouldn't or else you create a culture of dependence."

Mayfield praises the Florida state government for a well-oiled disaster response program and steps toward improving building safety, in contrast with other states along the Gulf of Mexico that he says still have no statewide building standards.

At the hurricane center on the Florida International University campus, Mayfield will be succeeded by Bill Proenza, the National Weather Service's director for the southern region.

Though Mayfield's name and face recognition are the envy of some presidential hopefuls, he laughs out loud at the notion of running for office.

"Oh, good gosh, no! That is just not my thing," he says.

At the hurricane center on the Florida International University campus, Mayfield will be succeeded by Bill Proenza, the National Weather Service's director for the Southern region. Home to 77 million, the region has "the most active and severe weather in the world," according to the weather service's parent agency, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Proenza, 62, began his meteorological career at the Miami office as an intern in 1963. As director of 50 regional offices and 1,000 employees in the Southern region for the last eight years, he has long experience collaborating with the hurricane center staff on forecasts and tracking.

"That's why I don't have any problem walking out the door," said Mayfield, declaring himself fearful that the mild 2006 hurricane season left those in the storm zone ever more complacent.

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Unless you've been hibernating for the winter, you have no doubt heard the many alarms about global warming. Now even the Bush Administration is getting into the act, at least judging from last week's decision by Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne to recommend that the majestic polar bear be listed as "threatened" under the Endangered Species Act. The closer you inspect this decision, however, the more it looks like the triumph of politics over science.

"We are concerned," said Mr. Kempthorne, that "the polar bears' habitat may literally be melting" due to warmer Arctic temperatures. However, when we called Interior spokesman Hugh Vickery for some elaboration, he was a lot less categorical, even a tad defensive. The "endangered" designation is based less on the actual number of bears in Alaska than on "projections into the future," Mr. Vickery said, adding that these "projection models" are "tricky business."

Apparently so, because there are in fact more polar bears in the world now than there were 40 years ago, as the nearby chart shows. The main threat to polar bears in recent decades has been from hunting, with estimates as low as 5,000 to 10,000 bears in the 1950s and 1960s. But thanks to conservation efforts, and some cross-border cooperation among the U.S., Canada and Russia, the best estimate today is that the polar bear population is 20,000 to 25,000.

It also turns out that most of the alarm over the polar bear's future stems from a single, peer-reviewed study, which found that the bear population had declined by some 250, or 25%, in Western Hudson Bay in the last decade. But the polar bear's range is far more extensive than Hudson Bay. A 2002 U.S. Geological Survey of wildlife in the Arctic Refuge Coastal Plain concluded that the ice bear populations "may now be near historic highs." One of the leading experts on the polar bear, Mitchell Taylor, the manager of wildlife resources for the Nunavut territory in Canada, has found that the Canadian polar bear population has actually increased by 25% -- to 15,000 from 12,000 over the past decade. * * *

Mr. Taylor tells us that in many parts of Canada, "polar bears are very abundant and productive. In some areas, they are overly abundant. I understand that people not living in the North generally have difficulty grasping the concept of too many polar bears, but those who live here have a pretty good grasp of what that is like." Those cuddly white bears are the Earth's largest land carnivores.

There is no doubt that higher temperatures threaten polar bear habitat by melting sea ice. Mr. Kempthorne also says he had little choice because the threshold for triggering a study under the Endangered Species Act is low. The Bush Administration was sued by the usual environmental suspects to make this decision, which means that Interior will now conduct a year-long review before any formal listing decision is made.

Nonetheless, the bears seem to have survived despite many other severe warming and cooling periods over the last few thousands of years. Polar bears are also protected from poaching and environmental damage by the Marine Mammal Protection Act, so there is little extra advantage to the bears themselves from an "endangered" classification.

All of which suggests that the real story here is a human one, namely about the politics of global warming. Once a plant or animal is listed under the Endangered Species Act, the government must also come up with an elaborate plan to protect its habitat. If the polar bear is endangered by warmer temperatures, then the environmentalist demand will be that the government do something to address that climate change. Faster than you can say Al Gore, this would lead to lawsuits and cries in Congress demanding federal mandates to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Think we're exaggerating? No sooner had Mr. Kempthorne announced his study than Kassie Siegel of something called the Center for Biological Diversity told the New York Times that "even this Administration" would not be able to "write this proposal without acknowledging that the primary threat to polar bears is global warming and without acknowledging the science of global warming." Her outfit was one of those who had sued the feds in the first place over the polar bears, notwithstanding its location in the frozen tundra of Arizona. But no matter. For want of a few hundred polar bears, the entire U.S. economy could be vulnerable to judicial dictation. * * *

With that much at stake, Mr. Kempthorne could have shown a stiffer backbone in resisting this political pressure. At the very least he now has an obligation to ensure that Interior's year-long study be based on real science and the actual polar bear population, rather than rely on computer projections. Any government decision to limit greenhouse gases deserves to be debated in the open, where the public can understand the consequences, not legislated by the back door via the Endangered Species Act.

A Light Bulb Goes On (NYT)

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Bad habits can be hard to break. So it's great news that Wal-Mart is putting its considerable heft behind one of the easiest ways to reduce energy consumption and the production of global-warming gases: the corkscrew-shaped light bulbs of the future.

Light bulbs don't have tailpipes to remind us that their use adds to pollution. But more than half of the nation's electricity comes from coal-burning plants. Switching from familiar bulbs to longer-lasting, energy-saving compact fluorescent lamps makes sense economically and environmentally.

As Michael Barbaro reported in The Times yesterday, Wal-Mart is pushing to sell 100 million compact fluorescents a year. Because they use 75 percent less electricity, that would save customers $3 billion on their electricity bills and save the world from 20 million metric tons of greenhouse gases.

But it will also take a lot of work to persuade consumers to make the change. There's the strange shape and the general lack of familiarity, of course, but probably the biggest impediment is that while the bulbs are cheaper to use, they cost more to buy. Compact fluorescents are often eight times more expensive, but each one saves consumers $30 over its lifespan because they last longer and use less electricity. It's a quirk of our human brains that people generally have a hard time paying more for something today even if it's a better deal in the long run. That will take some work to overcome.

The poorest consumers — those who are behind on their bills and living paycheck to paycheck — may not be able to absorb the extra cost upfront. Every effort should be made to get the bulbs for those who need them most, including expanding programs to distribute them to recipients of energy-assistance programs for the poor.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Defense Keys On 'Coercive Tactics' (TT)

Tampa Tribune, January 3, 2007

TAMPA - Scott Schweickert's defense is asking a judge to block the prosecution from introducing at trial Schweickert's statements about how he helped Steven Lorenzo drug, sexually torture and kill two men.

Defense attorney Pedro Amador argues in court papers that Schweickert's statements "were made as a result of coercive tactics employed by government agents."

Schweickert was not given a lawyer during several interviews, even though he "requested a lawyer from his first contact with law enforcement," Amador wrote.

Schweickert faces a federal trial next week on charges of conspiracy and drug facilitated crimes of violence. Lorenzo is serving 200 years in federal prison on charges he drugged and sexually tortured nine men, including the two victims authorities say Lorenzo and Schweickert killed: Jason Galehouse and Michael Wachholtz.

According to an arrest affidavit filed at the time of Schweickert's arrest in May 2005, Schweickert was interviewed by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Scott A. Albrecht and other detectives on May 10 and 19 in 2005, after being advised of his Miranda rights.

According to the affidavit, Schweickert told investigators that he and Lorenzo met online and struck up a conversation about their mutual interest in dominant sexual activities. Although Schweickert said that a majority of the chats about violence, abduction and drug use were pure fantasy, he said some of the fantasies became reality in 2003.

That Dec. 19, Schweickert told detectives, he and Lorenzo met Galehouse at the nightclub 2606. Galehouse accompanied the two to Lorenzo's house. Later, Schweickert told detectives, he helped subdue a struggling Galehouse, who went limp and died. Schweickert told investigators he helped Lorenzo dismember and dispose of Galehouse's body.

The next night, Schweickert told detectives, he and Lorenzo returned to 2606, where they met Wachholtz, who also went with them to Lorenzo's house. Schweickert said he helped subdue Wachholtz while Lorenzo administered ether. During a struggle, Wachholtz died, and Schweickert helped dispose of the body, he said.

Amador wrote in his motion that Schweickert also was interrogated on Nov. 2, 2004, during a search of his Peru, Ill., home. According to the motion, Schweickert was handcuffed and questioned without his rights being read to him. During the interrogation, he was read his rights and then requested a lawyer.

The interrogation was stopped, and Schweickert was never provided a lawyer, Amador wrote.

Schweickert was subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury in Tampa on May 10, 2005, Amador wrote. Upon arriving in Tampa, Schweickert requested a lawyer, Amador wrote, but was told he was not entitled to one. Before testifying, he was interrogated for several hours, Amador wrote.

After testifying, Schweickert was read his Miranda rights and did not request a lawyer "but had already been told he would not get one," according to the motion.

Schweickert did not request a lawyer when he was interrogated again on May 19, 2005, Amador wrote, even though he was read his Miranda warnings "because he was previously told by law enforcement that he was not entitled to a lawyer. He continued participating in the interrogation because of promises by law enforcement that he believed amounted to immunity."

Arizona Key Gateway For Pot (AR)

The Arizona Republic, January 2, 2007

Arizona, already the country's main entry point for illegal immigration, is gaining another dubious distinction: marijuana smuggling gateway.

The Border Patrol said agents seized over 331 tons (662,650 pounds) of marijuana worth $530 million last fiscal year, ending Sept. 30. That set a record for the fifth straight year. It nearly equaled the 350 tons seized in California, Texas and New Mexico combined.

Now, Arizona is on a pace to set a new record. Since Oct. 1, agents have seized over 106 tons, worth $170 million, nearly 20 tons more than the same period the previous year.

Marijuana seizures typically spike in late fall, after the harvest in Mexico, and a bumper crop this year means more pot to smuggle.

The record seizures indicate the Border Patrol, augmented by more agents, and National Guard troops, are doing a better job of stopping marijuana loads from getting through, officials said.

The size of some loads is staggering. On Dec. 6, agents seized an estimated $4.2 million worth of pot crammed inside two pickups in Nogales.

Arizona Sets Record For Pot Seizures Fifth Year In A Row (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

PHOENIX -- Agents with the U.S. Border Patrol have seized a record amount of marijuana from smugglers along the Arizona-Mexico border for the fifth year in a row.

The agency said it has seized more than 331 tons of marijuana worth $530 million last fiscal year, ending Sept. 30.

The record amount nearly equaled the 350 tons seized in California, Texas and New Mexico combined.

Officials say Arizona is on pace to set another record this year. Since Oct. 1, agents have seized more than 106 tons of pot worth $170 million. That's nearly 20 tons more than the same period the previous year.

The record seizures indicate the beefed-up Border Patrol and National Guard troops are doing a better job of stopping marijuana loads from getting through, officials said.

Arizona is the busiest entry point for illegal immigrants along the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border.

Azusa Council Poised To Approve Ban On Pot Dispensaries (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, January 3, 2007

AZUSA, Calif. - The city is poised to join several others across California in banning medical marijuana dispensaries.

The City Council planned to vote Tuesday on an ordinance designed to prohibit the so-called "pot clubs." Officials approved the new rule unanimously on its first reading last month.

Council member Keith Hanks said he understands that marijuana helps people who are sick, but the dispensaries can open up the possibility of abuse in the system.

"How do you become a legal possessor of marijuana and show that you only have it to distribute for helping people who are sick? How can the police enforce the marijuana control laws? They're put in a difficult position," he said.

But advocates for the clubs say regulating them is more effective than banning them.

"In many of the 27 cities and six counties (statewide) that have allowed dispensaries, they reduced crime and reduced complaints and helped patients," said Don Duncan, the Southern California coordinator for Americans for Safe Access.

If the ordinance is approved, Azusa would join several other cities that outlaw the dispensaries, including Pasadena, or have enacted moratoriums that prevent marijuana cooperatives from coming to town.

The measure reads, "Any business, operation or use that cannot be conducted or carried out without being in violation of state or federal law shall be prohibited."

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, legalizing the drug for therapeutic use. In 2003, state legislation was approved allowing counties to issue identification cards to medical users to protect them from prosecution by local law enforcement.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that federal authorities could still seize and destroy marijuana stashes and arrest growers and consumers even in the 11 states that allow medical marijuana use.

Federal law prohibits any marijuana use.

This Is Your Brain On Drugs, Dad (NYT)

By Mike Males

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WHEN releasing last week's Monitoring the Future survey on drug use, John P. Walters, the director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, boasted that "broad" declines in teenage drug use promise "enormous beneficial consequences not only for our children now, but for the rest of their lives." Actually, anybody who has looked carefully at the report and other recent federal studies would see a dramatically different picture: skyrocketing illicit drug abuse and related deaths among teenagers and adults alike.

While Monitoring the Future, an annual study that depends on teenagers to self-report on their behavior, showed that drug use dropped sharply in the last decade, the National Center for Health Statistics has reported that teenage deaths from illicit drug abuse have tripled over the same period. This reverses 25 years of declining overdose fatalities among youths, suggesting that teenagers are now joining older generations in increased drug use.

What the Monitoring the Future report does have right is that teenagers remain the least part of America's burgeoning drug abuse crisis. Today, after 20 years, hundreds of billions of dollars, and millions of arrests and imprisonments in the war on drugs, America's rate of drug-related deaths, hospital emergencies, crime and social ills stand at record highs.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the number of Americans dying from the abuse of illegal drugs has leaped by 400 percent in the last two decades, reaching a record 28,000 in 2004. The F.B.I. reported that drug arrests reached an all-time high of 1.8 million in 2005. The Drug Abuse Warning Network, a federal agency that compiles statistics on hospital emergency cases caused by illicit drug abuse, says that number rose to 940,000 in 2004 — a huge increase over the last quarter century.

Why are so few Americans aware of these troubling trends? One reason is that today's drug abusers are simply the "wrong" group. As David Musto, a psychiatry professor at Yale and historian of drug abuse, points out, wars on drugs have traditionally depended on "linkage between a drug and a feared or rejected group within society." Today, however, the fastest-growing population of drug abusers is white, middle-aged Americans. This is a powerful mainstream constituency, and unlike with teenagers or urban minorities, it is hard for the government or the news media to present these drug users as a grave threat to the nation.

Among Americans in their 40s and 50s, deaths from illicit-drug overdoses have risen by 800 percent since 1980, including 300 percent in the last decade. In 2004, American hospital emergency rooms treated 400,000 patients between the ages 35 and 64 for abusing heroin, cocaine, methamphetamine, marijuana, hallucinogens and "club drugs" like ecstasy.

Equally surprising, graying baby boomers have become America's fastest-growing crime scourge. The F.B.I. reports that last year the number of Americans over the age of 40 arrested for violent and property felonies rose to 420,000, up from 170,000 in 1980. Arrests for drug offenses among those over 40 rose to 360,000 last year, up from 22,000 in 1980. The Bureau of Justice Statistics found that 440,000 Americans ages 40 and older were incarcerated in 2005, triple the number in 1990.

Yet drug officials seem fixated on paper-and-pencil surveys of drug use by teens. In releasing its survey last week, the Office of Drug Control Policy trumpeted that "America's balanced strategy to reduce drug use is working." Representative Mark Souder, an Indiana Republican who has been a top supporter of federal antidrug efforts, says "the Bush administration is doing very well" on this front because "drug use, particularly among young people, is down."

But, some may say, don't teenage drug use rates predict future drug problems? To the contrary: 30 years of experience shows that fluctuations in the percentage of youths who report using drugs on surveys has almost nothing to do with the harm that drug abuse causes (addiction, disease, injury, death, crime, family and community distress), either in adolescence or later in life.

I compared teenage drug use trends reported annually by Monitoring the Future since the 1970s with trends for other behaviors and with federal crime, health and education statistics. In years in which a higher percentage of high school seniors told the survey takers they used illicit drugs, teenagers consistently reported and experienced lower rates of crime, murder, drug-related hospital emergencies and deaths, suicides, H.I.V. infection, school dropouts, delinquency, pregnancy, violence, theft in and outside of school, and fights with parents, employers and teachers.

The data also contradict Mr. Walters's claim that generations reporting lower rates of drug use enjoy "less addiction, less suffering, less crime, lower health costs and higher achievement." For example, baby boomers rarely used illegal drugs as youths.

In 1972, the University of Michigan researchers who carry out Monitoring the Future found that just 22 percent of high school seniors had ever used illegal drugs, compared to 48 percent of the class of 2005. Yet as that generation has aged, it has been afflicted by drug abuse and its related ills — overdoses, hospitalizations, drug-related crime — at far higher rates than those experienced by later generations at the same ages.

It's time to end the obsession with hyping teenage drug use. The meaningless surveys that policy makers now rely on should be replaced with a comprehensive "drug abuse index" that pulls together largely ignored data on drug-related deaths, hospital emergencies, crime, diseases and similar practical measures.

A good model is the California Department of Alcohol and Drug Programs' fledgling drug abuse index, which I helped compile and which aims to pinpoint which populations and areas are most harmed by drugs, both legal and illicit.

Few experts would have suspected that the biggest contributors to California's drug abuse, death and injury toll are educated, middle-aged women living in the Central Valley and rural areas, while the fastest-declining, lowest-risk populations are urban black and Latino teenagers. Yet the index found exactly that. These are the sorts of trends we need to understand if we are to design effective policies.

The United States' drug abuse crisis has exploded out of control. Scientifically designed strategies are urgently needed to target the manifest drug-caused damage that current policies are failing miserably to address.

Mexico Sends Troops,Police To Fight Drug Crime In Tijuana (AP)

TIJUANA, Mexico (AP)--The Mexican government is sending more than 3,000 soldiers and federal police officers to fight drug gangs in the violent border city of Tijuana, the latest offensive by President Felipe Calderon who has vowed to crack down on organized crime.

The force, backed by 28 boats, 21 planes and nine helicopters, will hunt down suspected traffickers, patrol the coast and man checkpoints in a city that is a popular smuggling route for cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana entering the United States, Interior Secretary Francisco Ramirez Acuna said in a news conference Tuesday in Mexico City.

"We will carry out all the necessary actions to retake every region of national territory," Ramirez Acuna said. "We will not allow any state to be a hostage of drug traffickers or organized crime."

Tijuana, across the border from San Diego, California, is one of the world's busiest border crossings. Last year, there were more than 300 killings in the city, most of which stemmed from fighting between rival drug gangs, investigators say.

Tijuana Mayor Jorge Hank Rhon welcomed the soldiers, saying he would like them to work hand-in-hand with city police who are establishing random security checkpoints.

Calderon took office in December after winning a close election on a law and order platform.

Last month, he sent 7,000 soldiers and federal police to his native state of Michoacan, which has been plagued by execution-style killings and beheadings as rival drug gangs fight over marijuana plantations and smuggling routes.

The troops have arrested more than 50 people, including several suspected leaders of the feuding cartels, and seized large quantities of gold, bulletproof vests, military equipment and shirts with federal and municipal police logos.

Calderon is scheduled to make his first visit to the troops on Wednesday at a military base.

Calderon's predecessor, Vicente Fox, promised the "mother of all battles" against organized crime, sending in thousands of soldiers and federal police to some drug-embattled towns and arresting several major drug kingpins.

But the arrests appeared to spark more violence as gangsters battled to take over the smuggling routes of those killed or arrested.

ATF To Investigate Explosive Devices Found After PG Standoff (TEXGAZ)

By Terri Richardson, Texarkana Gazette

Texarkana (TX) Gazette, January 3, 2007

The investigation into explosive devices found in the home of a man who gave himself up after a four-hour, Texas-side standoff will be made by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives.

“Components of explosive devices were found in the building. It is unknown at this time what the intent of (the homeowner) was regarding the explosive components,” said Shawn Fitzgerald, spokesman for the Texarkana, Texas, Police Department.

Texas-side police have not released the man’s name, but neighbors and co-workers identified him as Todd Gingrich, 43.

Police were dispatched to Gingrich’s home at 5814 Larry Drive at 12:37 a.m. Saturday to provide assistance to thwart a possible suicide. They were notified that he allegedly had access to a large number of weapons.

Family members said the collection included automatic and semi-automatic weapons, so the Metro SWAT Team was activated to negotiate with Gingrich.

Negotiators attempted to contact Gingrich over the next four hours, but were unsuccessful.

Fortunately, at 4:50 a.m., officers were able to take Gingrich into custody without injury after he reportedly became ill and exited the building on his own.

“No directed threats were made toward the Texarkana, Texas, police nor the Metro SWAT Team members during the incident,” Fitzgerald said.

Criminal charges are not being sought by police because the only person clearly threatened during the standoff was Gingrich.

Though the layout of weapons found inside the game room and other indications make the scene appear otherwise, there is no proof that any police officers were clearly threatened.

Though the layout of weapons found inside the game room and other indications make the scene appear otherwise, there is no proof that any police officers were clearly threatened.

“A large cache of weapons was discovered in the building where the victim had been staying during the incident, but it is unknown at this time what the reason or intent was regarding the weapons,” said Fitzgerald.

The Dallas Bureau of the ATF was contacted and responded to the scene. The ATF confiscated all weapons and devices, and the case has since been turned over to that agency, police said.

ATF may pursue criminal charges following a psychological evaluation.

DOJ_NMG_0110498

"The primary concern of the police is to make sure he does not do himself bodily harm and to keep everyone else safe," Fitzgerald said.

Neighbors and co-workers verified the identity of Gingrich, a chemical specialist at Cooper Tire & Rubber whom they perceived as peculiar.

One co-worker at Cooper Tire & Rubber who has interacted with him on the job said Gingrich is reclusive.

"He was very secluded. He did not talk to anybody. I took him to be a bit of a recluse. He ate by himself and wouldn't talk to you in the hallway. I just took him to be a real peculiar fellow," the co-worker said.

Only a handful of neighbors notified by police chose to evacuate the area. Others who attempted to get into the neighborhood during the standoff were stopped at a secure perimeter maintained by officers.

"They had the roadblock in front of my house and wouldn't let anyone in or out. My dad had people visiting and they couldn't leave. The cops said under no circumstances, no one in or out," said Michael Riley, who lives on Sidney Drive, one street over from Larry Drive.

Riley said they previously lived across the street from Gingrich and described him as odd and antisocial.

"Last week we were walking by and he just went into his garage and stared. It was really weird," said Riley's brother, Neil Riley.

TAX:

Democrats To Target Oil And Gas Industry In Early Hours (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 3, 2007

Before adjourning last month, the Republican-led Congress gave oil and gas companies a parting gift: wider access to oil and gas drilling in the Gulf of Mexico.

What a difference a few weeks and a new majority make.

Among the first items Democrats want to pass are measures that at least some oil and gas companies oppose, such as a measure to repeal certain tax breaks included in a broad energy bill passed in 2005 and a bill to collect royalties on existing drilling leases.

Provisions that could cost the industry even more money, such as one imposing a windfall-profit tax, could follow in the Democratic-led Congress, although some of the harsher measures may strain caucus unity.

"People are very concerned, and concerned on a lot of levels," said one lobbyist at a major oil company.

Democrats could try as early as this week, though most likely next week, to force companies that signed leases in 1998 and 1999 to renegotiate those contracts so they pay royalties on oil produced in the Gulf when per-barrel prices pass a set threshold.

What appears to be an Interior Department error meant that the threshold typical of such contracts wasn't included in the leases signed during those two years. The error has left billions of dollars in royalties uncollected by the federal government.

Democrats are also considering repealing a manufacturing tax break that oil and gas companies now are able to claim, as well as other tax measures adopted in the broad energy bill adopted in 2005.

Democrats would use the additional revenues to pay for a new fund for conservation and development of renewable energy sources.

Political party affiliation doesn't necessarily determine how a member may view an oil and gas issue, so bills the industry opposes will not necessarily pass, particularly with President Bush, a former oil man, still in the White House. But the industry is much closer to Republicans in general than to Democrats, as evidenced in the ratios of PAC contributions.

Shortly after Democrats won majorities in the House and Senate in November, oil and gas lobbyists began preparing anew for the reintroduction of bills originally prompted by record industry profits and soaring gasoline prices. Some Republicans have supported these measures as well.

The industry is in the midst, for example, of a $100 million public relations and grassroots lobbying campaign to boost its sagging public image.

Lobbyists meanwhile have reiterated in Hill meetings their argument that bills that cut too deeply into corporate profits will drive companies to explore and drill in areas outside the United States, thereby raising this country's dependence on foreign oil.

That argument has bipartisan appeal, particularly in areas of the country where local economies are heavily reliant on the oil and gas industry. Staff aides from Democratic "oil-patch" offices have met leadership aides in the weeks leading up to the holiday break to discuss which measures are acceptable.

Oil and gas-friendly members plan to support the measure to force companies to renegotiate leases, which also has some support among Republican members, and the development of an alternative energy and conservation fund. Several companies have agreed to pay royalties in the future.

The Democrats' bill would forbid companies from future Gulf production contracts.

But some members will likely balk at the windfall-profits tax or another measure under consideration that would increase taxes on the industry by changing the accounting rules for oil inventories. Each approach would likely cost the industry billions of dollars.

Lobbyists said aides to the oil-patch members have sought assurances that what they might view as punitive measures are limited to the initial batch of bills contemplated to start the session, which would leave out profit and inventory tax changes.

But these members who support the oil and gas industry have apparently been unable to get that assurance from leadership offices, one lobbyist said.

Oil and gas companies are not united in their views. The major oil companies do not support certain tax breaks in the 2005 energy act, for example, and seem willing to accept the general parameters of the Democrats' early legislation. This, the companies calculate, will allow them to draw a line in the sand and oppose more financially onerous provisions later.

Drew Hammill, a spokesman for Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said Democrats have not decided on the exact oil and gas provisions that will be included in their package for the 100-hour legislative push.

But Democrats are intent on setting up the energy reserve for renewable energy and conservation, repealing certain tax breaks, and forcing oil companies to renegotiate the 1998 and 1999 Gulf leases. The total revenues will amount to billions of dollars, Hammill said, although the exact figure depends on which breaks Democrats decide ultimately to target.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

What The Congress Can Do For America (WSJ)

By George W. Bush

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Tomorrow, members of the 110th Congress will take their oaths of office here in Washington. I will have the privilege of working with them for the next two years -- one quarter of my presidency, plenty of time to accomplish important things for the American people.

Together, we have a chance to serve the American people by solving the complex problems that many don't expect us to tackle, let alone solve, in the partisan environment of today's Washington. To do that, however, we can't play politics as usual. Democrats will control the House and Senate, and therefore we share the responsibility for what we achieve.

In the days and weeks since the November elections, I have been encouraged by the productive meetings I've had with many of the new leaders in Congress from both parties. I am hopeful we can find common ground without compromising our principles.

I believe we share many of the same goals for the people we serve -- and with good will and hard effort, we can find practical ways to advance the American Dream and keep our nation safe.

My principles are no secret. I have campaigned on them in my races for governor and in two presidential contests, and I have worked hard during my presidency to translate these principles into sound policy.

I believe that when America is willing to use her influence abroad, the American people are safer and the world is more secure. I believe that wealth does not come from government. It comes from the hard work of America's workers, entrepreneurs and small businesses. I believe government closest to the people is more responsive and accountable. I believe government plays an important role in helping those who can't help themselves. Yet we must always remember that when people are hurting, they need a caring person, not a government bureaucracy.

These are all common-sense principles, and they provide the basis for how I will approach governing with the new Congress. We've proved it can be done: When our nation was attacked, Republicans and Democrats came together to pass the Patriot Act and reform our intelligence agencies. When our economy was struggling, we worked together to pass tax relief that has helped our economy grow, create jobs, and raise the standard of living for the American people. When we saw that our public schools were failing our children, we came together to pass the No Child Left Behind Act, insisting on high standards, accountability and better options for parents.

The outcome of the elections has changed the balance of power in Congress, yet the priorities for keeping our country safe and prosperous go beyond party labels.

Our priorities begin with defeating the terrorists who killed thousands of innocent Americans on September 11, 2001 -- and who are working hard to attack us again. These terrorists are part of a broader extremist movement that is now doing everything it can to defeat us in Iraq.

In the days ahead, I will be addressing our nation about a new strategy to help the Iraqi people gain control of the security situation and hasten the day when the Iraqi government gains full control over its affairs. Ultimately, Iraqis must resolve the most pressing issues facing them. We can't do it for them.

But we can help Iraq defeat the extremists inside and outside of Iraq -- and we can help provide the necessary breathing space for this young government to meet its responsibilities. If democracy fails and the extremists prevail in Iraq, America's enemies will be stronger, more lethal, and emboldened by our defeat. Leaders in both parties understand the stakes in this struggle. We now have the opportunity to build a bipartisan consensus to fight and win the war.

America's priorities also include keeping our economy strong. The elections have not reversed the laws of economics. It is a fact that economies do best when you reward hard work by allowing people to keep more of what they have earned. And we have seen that businesses can expand and hire more workers when they have more money to invest -- and since August 2003, America's employers have added more than seven million new jobs.

It is also a fact that our tax cuts have fueled robust economic growth and record revenues. Because revenues have grown and we've done a better job of holding the line on domestic spending, we met our goal of cutting the deficit in half three years ahead of schedule. By continuing these policies, we can balance the federal budget by 2012 while funding our priorities and making the tax cuts permanent. In early February, I will submit a budget that does exactly that. The bottom line is tax relief and spending restraint are good for the American worker, good for the American taxpayer, and good for the federal budget. Now is not the time to raise taxes on the American people.

By balancing the budget through pro-growth economic policies and spending restraint, we are better positioned to tackle the longer term fiscal challenge facing our country: reforming entitlements -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- so future generations can benefit from these vital programs without bankrupting our country.

One important message I took away from the election is that people want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to slip into legislation billions of dollars of pork-barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by Congress. I'm glad Senator Robert Byrd and Congressman Dave Obey -- the Democrats who will lead the appropriations process in the new Congress -- heard that message, too, and have indicated they will refrain from including additional earmarks in the continuing resolution for this fiscal year.

But we can and should do more. It's time Congress give the president a line-item veto. And today I will announce my own proposal to end this dead-of-the-night process and substantially cut the earmarks passed each year.

The strength of our economy also requires us to address some of the biggest issues facing the American people -- greater energy security, comprehensive immigration reform, and affordable health care. While progress has been made in each of these areas, we must do more. I look forward to working with Congress on these difficult issues. * * *

Our Founders believed in the wisdom of the American people to choose their leaders and provided for the concept of divided and effective government. The majority party in Congress gets to pass the bills it wants. The minority party, especially where the margins are close, has a strong say in the form bills take. And the Constitution leaves it to the president to use his judgment whether they should be signed into law.

That gives us a clear challenge and an opportunity. If the Congress chooses to pass bills that are simply political statements, they will have chosen stalemate. If a different approach is taken, the next two years can be fruitful ones for our nation. We can show the American people that Republicans and Democrats can come together to find ways to help make America a more secure, prosperous and hopeful society. And we will show our enemies that the open debate they believe is a fatal weakness is the great strength that has allowed democracies to flourish and succeed.

To the new members of the 110th Congress, I offer my welcome -- and my congratulations. The American people have entrusted us with public office at a momentous time for our nation. Let them say of these next two years: We used our time well.

Bush Remains Resolute On Tax Cuts (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As Democrats prepare to take control of Congress, President Bush sent a strong signal of his continued opposition to tax increases.

In an op-ed in today's editions of The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Bush contends that his deep tax cuts have kept the economy strong while shrinking projected deficits. "The bottom line is tax relief and spending restraint are good for the American worker, good for the American taxpayer, and good for the federal budget," Mr. Bush writes. "Now is not the time to raise taxes on the American people."

He also writes -- for the first time, but with few details -- that the budget he sends Congress next month would "balance the federal budget by 2012 while funding our priorities and making the tax cuts permanent."

Mr. Bush's comments reflect his administration's reliance on tax cuts as both an economic elixir and a political weapon. During the 2006 congressional campaign, as Republican scandals and the Iraq war increasingly dominated the debate, the White House leaned heavily on tax cuts as an antidote for bad news.

QUESTION OF THE DAY

• Which party is likely to be more responsible with taxpayers' money?1

BUSH OP-ED

• Commentary: What the Congress Can Do for America2

"The main reason for our growing economy is that we cut taxes," Mr. Bush said in his last weekly radio address before the election, broadcast live from a Colorado coffee shop, where he met with small-business owners. "Entrepreneurs like the ones I'm having breakfast with this morning have put that money to good use. They expanded their businesses, and they're creating jobs in their communities."

He also frequently attacked Democrats on the campaign trail -- including incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi -- for claiming to support tax cuts while voting against many of his.

Mr. Bush's tax-cutting rhetoric, though, wasn't enough to save Republicans from what the president later termed a "thumpin'." And as he begins the final two years of his presidency, the impact of his arguments might again be muted.

Comments Sure to Resonate

Democratic House leaders have made it clear they aren't interested in any broad frontal assault on Mr. Bush's income-tax cuts, which for the most part are scheduled to last until 2010. Some Democrats have even signaled that they would like to find a tax cut of their own to pass, perhaps a longer-term fix for the alternative minimum tax.

Still, Mr. Bush's comments are sure to resonate on Capitol Hill in coming weeks, as the new Democratic majorities consider long-term budget resolutions that either don't balance the budget or allow at least some of Mr. Bush's tax cuts to expire down the road.

Ms. Pelosi and other Democrats have even discussed the possibility of raising income taxes for people above a certain level, perhaps $250,000. They also face pressure to reach a deal to restore the federal estate tax at some level after 2010.

Bringing the federal deficit to zero by 2012, while making permanent the tax cuts that are set to expire in 2009 and 2010, would require more restraint on spending than either the White House or Congress has shown of late. The last official White House budget forecast, issued in July, extended through fiscal 2011 and showed a $127 billion deficit that year. Since then, a continued surge in tax receipts has improved the outlook somewhat. The Congressional Budget Office's August 2006 baseline forecast -- which assumes the expiration of current tax cuts -- projected a 2012 deficit of $54 billion. By then, Mr. Bush will have been long out of office.

Still, he is sure to continue to challenge Democrats in coming months on spending -- especially so-called earmarks, special-interest projects in lawmaker's districts. He also will be tempted to veto spending bills, which so far he has failed to do.

Theme of Federalism

While praising Democrats' efforts to limit earmarks, he promised to announce a permanent fix of his own today. More broadly, Mr. Bush sounded the theme of federalism, suggesting that "government closest to the people is more responsive and accountable" than Washington.

A senior aide to Mr. Bush said the president wasn't firing a fiscal shot across the bow at Democrats, but was simply "articulating a long-held view that tax relief has worked." He added that Americans "want their leaders in Washington to cut wasteful spending. The president's budget will do just that."

Mr. Bush sought to set a tone of bipartisan cooperation in the op-ed piece, saying he was hopeful he can "find common ground" with Democrats, mentioning affordable health care, energy and immigration reform as possible areas of agreement.

Bush Warns Against Merely Political Bills (WP/AP)

President Bush, facing a Democratic-controlled Congress for the first time, is urging lawmakers to work with his administration and warning that "political statements" in the form of legislation would result in a stalemate.

"Together, we have a chance to serve the American people by solving the complex problems that many don't expect us to tackle, let alone solve, in the partisan environment of today's Washington," Bush wrote in a guest column for today's Wall Street Journal. "To do that, however, we can't play politics as usual. Democrats will control the House and Senate, and therefore we share the responsibility for what we achieve."

Bush, while sounding a tone of bipartisanship on the eve of the new session of Congress that begins Thursday, repeated long-held positions on the war in Iraq, tax cuts and other issues often criticized by Democrats. He has vetoed only one bill, but he reminded readers that the Constitution calls on the president to use his judgment in deciding which bills to sign into law.

"If the Congress chooses to pass bills that are simply political statements, they will have chosen stalemate," Bush wrote. "If a different approach is taken, the next two years can be fruitful ones for our nation. We can show the American people that Republicans and Democrats can come together to find ways to help make America a more secure, prosperous and hopeful society."

Bush planned to meet with his Cabinet today to discuss domestic priorities and to court about a dozen members of Congress, Democrats and Republicans, at a social reception tonight. The schedule represents Bush's official return to work after a Christmas vacation at his Texas ranch.

Dems To Inherit Agenda Dominated By War (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, January 3, 2007

Now the majority party, Democrats will inherit an agenda dominated by the war in Iraq when the new Congress convenes Thursday, increasing their exposure to what has mostly been a politically damaging issue for Republicans.

In the weeks ahead, the new Democratic Congress will be confronted with President Bush's new plan for Iraq and a White House request that lawmakers authorize an estimated additional $100 billion to pay for the war.

Democrats also may be asked to support a plan lifting restrictions on reserve deployments to ease the strain on active-duty troops.

While Democrats may try to deflect as much attention as they can toward Bush — citing the president's ownership of the war and congressional limitations on foreign policy — they no doubt will find themselves playing a starring role in a debate that cost Republicans votes in the midterm elections last fall.

"They'll have to show they can govern and govern in a way that will help the executive branch resolve this," said James Thurber, director of American University's Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies.

But resolving Iraq won't be easy, and Democrats run the risk of going too far in criticizing the president. Recent polls show Americans remain frustrated with Bush's handling of the war, but don't think Democrats have offered much of an alternative.

"They will be in the majority, and they will be blamed if they try to block the president from implementing an exit strategy," Thurber said.

The president is thought to be considering a plan to increase the number of forces in Iraq. But the specifics of how many troops will be added to the existing 140,000 force and for how long are not known.

Bush said last week he planned to engage lawmakers before making his announcement later this month. Congressional leaders planned to attend a White House reception expected at midweek.

Foreshadowing the debate to come, Democrats swiftly rallied against the notion of sending more troops, saying Iraqis must take a stronger role in security matters.

"The Iraqis need to understand that the responsibility for the future of that country is theirs," Rep.-elect Jerry McNerney, D-Calif., said Saturday in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

"I have not heard from our military, clamoring for additional soldiers," Rep. Jim Marshall, D-Ga., said upon returning from a trip to Iraq with Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff.

Marshall and Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., who also visited Iraq during the Christmas holiday, reported that some progress was being made in Anbar province where Iraqi security forces and local leaders were collaborating to push out al-Qaida fighters. But, Skelton said, violence in Baghdad has accelerated and additional U.S. troops might not help.

"I will look carefully and with an open mind at any proposal the president may make, but my view remains that removing some number of American troops — however small — would send a more powerful message to our Iraqi partners than raising force levels," Skelton said.

The debate will play out in hearing rooms this month. Skelton and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will head the Senate Armed Services Committee, have invited Defense Secretary Robert Gates to testify. Levin said he would like that hearing to take place Jan. 11.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has promised to testify before his committee after Bush makes his announcement.

Democrats say they also want to hear from independent military experts and members of the Iraq Study Group.

The debate also will play out in Congress's review of the president's spending requests for the war. The Pentagon says it needs an additional $99.7 billion to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan until the end of the current fiscal year in September. That request is expected to arrive on Capitol Hill in February.

Democrats are eyeing ways to attach conditions to war funds that won't hurt troops and may even attract Republican support.

John Podesta, former President Clinton's chief of staff and now president of the liberal Center for American Progress, recommends lawmakers demand in that spending bill that the president seek lawmakers' approval if troop levels exceed 150,000 in Iraq.

Democrats in 2007 may be confronted with another politically sensitive Iraq issue regarding whether to support increased involuntary call-ups of Guard and Reserve troops. In December, Schoomaker warned that the Army will break without adding more active-duty soldiers to the ranks and changing current mobilization policies backed by Pentagon civilians.

The issue of allowing lengthy involuntary deployments is a tricky one for lawmakers who want to reduce the pressure on active-duty forces but also hear from reservists that they too are facing serious hardships.

Biden and other Democrats agree that Iraq will dominate much of their work next year, but contend they must not be blamed for a war run ultimately by the president. "This is President Bush's war," Biden said.

But political experts say the public might not agree.

"When you're in the minority, you don't have to do much more than criticize the status quo that wasn't working," said Norman Ornstein, a scholar with the American Enterprise Institute. "When you're in the majority, people will look to you for leadership."

Activists On The Left Applying Pressure To Democratic Leaders (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

Democratic leaders set to take control of Congress tomorrow are facing mounting pressure from liberal activists to chart a more confrontational course on Iraq and the issues of human rights and civil liberties, with some even calling for the impeachment of President Bush.

The carefully calibrated legislative blitz that Democrats have devised for the first 100 hours of power has left some activists worried the passion that swept the party to power in November is already dissipating. A cluster of protesters will greet the new congressional leaders at the Capitol tomorrow. They will not be disgruntled conservatives wary of Democratic control, but liberals demanding a ban on torture, an end to warrantless domestic spying and a restoration of curbed civil liberties.

The protest will be followed by an evening forum calling for the president's impeachment, led by the Center for Constitutional Rights, antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan and a pro-impeachment group called World Can't Wait.

Those priorities will not be in evidence inside the Capitol, where the newly sworn-in Democratic Congress will immediately begin work on new ethics rules, the reinstitution of federal deficit controls and new policies designed to increase civility in House proceedings. In the coming weeks, Democrats plan to pass bills designed to raise the minimum wage, lower prescription drug costs for Medicare recipients and interest rates for student borrowers, bolster homeland security and boost alternative energy research.

Nowhere in the Democrats' consensus-driven agenda is legislation revisiting last year's establishment of military tribunals and suspending legal rights for suspected terrorists. Nor is there a revision of the civil liberties provisions of the USA Patriot Act, a measure curbing warrantless wiretapping by the National Security Agency or an aggressive confrontation of the president on his Iraq war policies.

To Democratic activists and some lawmakers, the agenda skirts the larger issues that damaged the president's approval ratings and torpedoed Republican control of Congress.

"We've been told for many years, 12 years now, 'Wait until we get in power. Then you'll see things change,' " said Debra Sweet, national director of World Can't Wait, a pro-impeachment group helping to organize the protest. "We'll give them a couple of months or a few weeks to see what they come up with, but if they don't do something very decisive around the war and these other issues, I think there will be trouble."

"If the first 100 hours is going to be characterized by an increase in the minimum wage and improved health and education benefits for Americans, that's fine," said Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), a liberal firebrand who ran for president in 2004 and has announced for 2008. "But then let's talk about the second hundred hours, because we cannot let this war be lost. We cannot abandon the troops in the field to temporizing."

To most Democratic lawmakers, such activism presents a quandary. House Republican leaders spent years trying to placate their conservative base with agendas built around opposition to same-sex marriage, antiabortion votes and tax cuts, said Sen.-elect Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.). The partisan tone enraged Democrats and ultimately alienated moderates and independents, who swept the GOP from power in November after a dozen years in control.

"The Democrats have to be careful not to fall into these traps that I think paralyzed the Republicans," Cardin said.

But Democratic lawmakers -- especially the freshmen who capitalized on voter discontent -- said their core supporters' anger is real and must be acknowledged.

"Those people protesting on Thursday care deeply about their country," said Carol Shea-Porter of New Hampshire, an incoming House freshman who ran as an ardent opponent of Bush and the war. "I think we do need to pay attention. People are begging us to remember the Constitution, what made this country great."

One lawmaker, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of alienating such voters, said wherever he goes, he hears from activists calling for Bush's impeachment. Cutting off funding for the Iraq war comes in a close second.

"For most progressive activists, there is generally speaking, an open mind but also a real fear that the 110th [Congress] will not be as aggressive as many of us want it to be," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way. "On the other hand, there is a lot of pragmatism as we go into the 2008 election season. There's this high-wire act for everybody, not only for the House and Senate leadership but for the progressive community, too."

The high-wire act will be on display almost as soon as the new Congress is sworn in. The first motion from the House floor will be a parliamentary inquiry from Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.) on the disputed election to replace retired Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.). In November's balloting, Republican Vern Buchanan beat Democrat Christine Jennings by 369 votes.

But more than 18,000 ballots that day did not record a vote in the closely contested race, an "undervote" rate of nearly 15 percent, mainly from the Democrat's stronghold of Sarasota County. An academic study, commissioned by the company that made the electronic voting machines, found "that there is essentially a 100 percent chance that Jennings would have won" had Sarasota voters cast their votes with different machines and ballots.

Holt's inquiry will make clear that Buchanan's swearing-in tomorrow should not prejudice or compromise a House investigation or ongoing legal challenges to his election. But that falls well short of activist demands that the seat be left vacant, or even that the House simply seat Jennings.

Holt said he is willing to take the heat for that decision.

"There are some Democrats who say we should seize that seat any way we can," he acknowledged. "But if in a heavy-handed way, we just say we've got the votes and we're going to throw out Vern Buchanan, we would undermine the principle we say we are fighting for."

Will Dems Deliver? (USAT)

By Mario M. Cuomo

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Will Dems deliver? Americans are looking for dramatic ideas and courageous leadership. The party's congressional agenda doesn't seem to rise to the challenge. As JFK did, its leaders need to boldly step forward.

By Mario M. Cuomo

In 1962, President Kennedy succeeded in captivating Americans by explaining the advantages of being the first country to reach the moon and the dangers of allowing another nation to beat us there. As a result, we did beat the Russians to the moon, and every year for the past four decades, we have invested billions of dollars in space exploration with little political or public opposition and produced brilliant success.

(Illustration by Keith Simmons, USA TODAY)

Kennedy's call to arms is frequently cited when we go in search of examples of bold vision and daring leadership in our nation's recent history, probably because there are so few comparable moments and far too many other examples when our nation's leaders have taken the easier path rather than the right, but more difficult, one.

For the first time after six years of GOP rule, the Democrats will take the reins of Congress. Voters clearly want to see what Democrats can do, that Republicans have not. This gives Democrats the chance not only to control Congress but also to elect a president in 2008.

After years of chaos in Iraq, which has led to neglect of many critical domestic issues, voters are looking for dramatic ideas and courageous leadership to deal with the nation's most difficult challenges. Will Democratic leaders step forward with big ideas and seize the opportunity they have been given?

A 'light list'

So far, the Democratic agenda for the 110th Congress, which opens Thursday, offers a laudable but light list of issues, such as increasing the minimum wage, greater stem cell availability, job training benefits and adopting ethics reforms. I doubt that kind of agenda would be enough to keep control of the Congress, let alone to win the next presidency.

DOJ_NMG_0110506

As Kennedy did, prospective Democratic presidential candidates, and the party's leaders in Congress, need to confront the most difficult questions of the day. Here are just a few of the most daunting:

War on terrorism. Not only are we losing control in Iraq, we have lost momentum in the war on terror. Clear evidence of that fact can be seen in Afghanistan and scattered throughout the world. Our ability to re-energize that effort goes beyond enhancing Iraq's military force and police power to injecting economic and social aid into the country and the region to combat the kind of poverty and desperation that invites jihadism.

Economic divide. Our economy continues to be wonderfully rewarding for high-level corporate executives and big stockholders but not for millions of American workers who are falling behind, often, in part, because of a lack of higher education. Further down the ladder, we have more poor citizens than we had five years ago, and about 13 million of these poor Americans are children deemed to be at risk of poverty, illiteracy and abuse.

Despite President Bush's best efforts, many more children are being left behind. Poor children in unstable families require special assistance. Mentors, after-school programs, smaller class sizes, well-trained, adequately paid teachers and longer school years are all essential. So is accountability as featured by No Child Left Behind, but that program requires funds yet to be delivered. Resources to provide higher education in the form of Pell grants and tax deductibility for tuition are also needed.

Energy crisis. We should make the all-out effort on conservation and new forms of energy the same kind of big idea that Kennedy made of the space program. It would provide better jobs, a cleaner environment and freedom from foreign oil. We must develop all useful alternative sources — wind, water, ethanol, clean coal and battery-driven automobiles. We should also take a fresh look at nuclear energy that uses uranium, a fuel that is available, less expensive and cleaner than fossil fuels, which produce dangerous emissions.

Great ideas, you say, but how would we pay for all of this? Well, it can be done. In fact, it has been done in the not-so-distant past. In 1980, Ronald Reagan promised that by the magic of supply side economics, he could cut taxes and increase spending while still producing a balanced budget in three years. George H.W. Bush, then one of Reagan's presidential opponents, called the idea "voodoo economics," and he was right: It was a costly blunder that led to a runaway federal debt.

Don't fear taxes

How did they deal with the problem? Presidents Reagan, Bush and Clinton all raised taxes on the wealthiest taxpayers. After those raises, we had a balanced budget and a potential surplus of more than $5 trillion.

The way to reduce our debt and start providing needed federal investments is by cutting other spending and mitigating President Bush's huge tax cuts. Not the part of the tax cuts that go to the struggling middle class because they will put the money back into the economy by buying things. Instead, I'd repeal the part that goes to the 1.5% who represent the wealthiest taxpayers, and that would provide several hundred billion dollars over a decade.

Spending cuts should be made by reducing Social Security and Medicare benefits for those rich enough not to be injured by any reductions. And we should return to the pay-as-you-go budgeting that was so successful in the '90s.

So the resources are available to finance the investments we need, if we have the intelligence and the boldness to make a new agenda clear to the American people.

Which of our leading Democrats will be the first to do so?

Democrats Pressed To Show Progress In First 100 Hours (USAT)

By Deborah Barfield Berry

USA Today, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democratic leaders will be pressed in coming weeks to move their legislative agenda and show voters they made the right choice in November to shift control of Congress.

"Democrats have an urgent need to show they can make a difference," said Hugh Price, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, adding that Democrats have to "demonstrate to voters that by putting them in charge of Congress that's not a continuation of business as usual."

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker of the House, has vowed to push six key measures during the first 100 legislative hours of the 110th Congress, which begins Thursday.

During the campaign, Democrats touted an agenda that would increase the minimum wage and fund stem cell research. It also included repealing tax breaks for oil companies, cutting interest rates for college student loans, adopting remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and eliminating a ban on government negotiations for lower drug costs.

"It is about the issues that are relevant to the American people's lives," Pelosi, D-Calif., said. "It is a new direction. It is what they sent us here to do, and we will do it first and foremost by making this the most honest and open Congress in a spirit of integrity, civility and bipartisanship and in a way that is fiscally sound."

In a separate move, lawmakers are expected to vote as soon as this week on a measure that outlines rules for the House, including changes to how representatives interact with lobbyists.

"We need to honor those promises right out of the gate," said Kristie Greco, a spokeswoman for Rep. Jim Clyburn, D-S.C., the incoming majority whip. "The American people obviously want a change. We have the momentum."

Political experts, however, question whether the agenda can be accomplished in 100 legislative hours, which could take several weeks. And while several agenda items are not controversial, some will face strong opposition from the administration, experts say.

For example, President Bush would likely veto a stem cell research bill if comes back to his desk, said Thomas Mann, also a senior fellow at Brookings and co-author of The Broken Branch: How Congress Is Failing America and How To Get It Back on Track. The stem cell research bill is the only measure Bush has vetoed in six years.

Mann said any change in Medicare drug price negotiations also could be a veto target.

Still, Mann said, "It is a pretty modest agenda, mostly enjoying broad support among Democrats and some among Republicans."

The expedited process — bypassing committees and hearings — may open Democrats up to the same criticism they launched at Republicans, said Michael Franc, an analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

"The irony is that the only way to make all these bills happen ... is to establish legislative marshal order," Franc said.

But Pelosi said the issues are not new to Congress and that many House committees have already held hearings on many of the topics.

Democrats Plan First 100 Hours, Give Or Take A Speech (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 2 — House Democrats intend to kick off their new regime with a 100-hour legislative blitz that would allow them to post a series of quick victories before President Bush even delivers his State of the Union address toward the end of this month.

But don't pull out that stopwatch to begin the countdown just yet.

Even as Democrats filtered back to Capitol Hill on Tuesday in anticipation of the opening of the 110th Congress on Thursday, there was a bit of confusion about just when the 100 hours would officially begin. Would it be as soon as the new Congress was sworn in and began voting on internal rules changes? Or when the House takes up its first actual legislation next Tuesday?

And since it is 100 hours of strictly legislative activity, the clock would be on pause when House members give their customary one-minute speeches at the start of each day and during the "special orders" at night when members reserve floor time to carry on about their favorite issues for the C-Span audience.

And next Monday is out since the House, despite Democratic pledges of a disciplined five-day work schedule, will not be in session. The day off was scheduled to allow freshman lawmakers time to return from an orientation session — and others to attend the college football national championship game.

At the same time, House Republicans, forced to the Congressional sidelines for the first time in 12 years, were growing increasingly agitated about the Democratic timetable. They said that the rush by Democrats to force through legislation on national security, the minimum wage, student loan costs and energy without a full slate of hearings — and with limits on the ability of Republicans to offer alternatives — undercut the pledges of Democrats to run things in a more transparent, collegial way than the Republicans had when they were in power.

Democrats eventually decided Tuesday that the 100-hour timer would be started next Tuesday, when the House is scheduled to take up H.R. 1, a measure enacting recommendations from the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission that never made it out of the Republican-controlled Congress.

And they brushed aside complaints from the Republicans, saying Democrats campaigned specifically on this initial flurry of legislation, much of which has been considered, run through committee and ultimately rejected by Republicans in the past.

"These are deliverable," Brendan Daly, a spokesman for the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said of the 100-hour topics. "These are things we said we would do if we are in charge and would make a direct impact on Americans' lives."

Under the current Democratic schedule, the Sept. 11 measure would be followed by a vote on increasing the federal minimum wage to $7.25 over two years. Next would come legislation expanding embryonic stem cell research that was vetoed last year by Mr. Bush. Democrats would then move to eliminate a prohibition on federal officials' negotiating with pharmaceutical companies for lower prices for those enrolled in the Medicare drug program.

After that, Democrats are planning to take up a proposal to cut the interest rate on federally subsidized student loans to 3.4 percent from 6.8 percent. Lastly, Democrats hope to wind up on Jan. 18 with legislation that seeks to make sure that oil companies pay adequate royalties on disputed leases, rolls back some industry subsidies from a recent energy bill and creates a renewable energy reserve to try to spur investment in new technologies and conservation.

Before getting to those bills, House Democrats said they would move immediately upon taking control Thursday to pass broad ethics rules including a ban on gifts and meals from lobbyists and restrictions on travel provided by outside groups. On Friday, they will vote on disclosure of earmarks and new budget rules to prohibit deficit spending.

The leadership plans to allow some of the party's freshmen to sponsor changes so they can begin building a record and reputation to defend their seats in 2008.

The pace of activity is to be much slower in the Senate, and passage of any of the legislation by the House does not guarantee that it will be sent to the White House, given the Senate's thin 51-49 Democratic majority.

Leading Senate Republicans have indicated that they could support the minimum wage increase, for instance, only if it is tied to tax relief for small businesses. As a result, that measure is likely to either stall or be changed, leading to negotiations with the House.

The Senate plans to convene Thursday and swear in its new members. But both parties plan to hold retreats on Friday, and aides said the only legislation that could come up for a vote this week would be a resolution honoring former President Gerald R. Ford.

House Republicans, who were not known for giving Democrats much say on legislation when they ran the House, began an orchestrated campaign on Tuesday to pressure Democrats to allow full committee review of the 100-hour legislation.

"As we both know, homeland security is far too important an issue to play politics with, and any new homeland security measure should be given the review and oversight it deserves," Representative Peter T. King of New York, the top Republican on the Homeland Security Committee, wrote to Representative Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the incoming Democratic chairman.

Democrats said the legislation at issue had already been vetted and in many cases voted on in the past. They said Republicans would be given their chance once the 100 hours had elapsed. "After that, we will go back through regular order," said Mr. Daly, Ms. Pelosi's spokesman.

Dems Finalize New Rules (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan And Jackie Kucinich

House Democrats hurried yesterday to put the finishing touches on ethics reforms that would ban lawmakers and staffers from accepting trips, gifts and meals from lobbyists and prevent the new majority from holding votes open to change the outcome.

Democrats will adopt and then amend the House Rules package tomorrow to ban all travel paid for by lobbyists or organizations that employ lobbyists, require the ethics committee to pre-approve travel paid for by outside groups, enact a total gift ban, and require lawmakers to pay the market cost of flying on a corporate jet, said Democratic staffers and officials with government watchdog groups.

And, because they feel they lost the 2003 Medicare prescription drug benefit vote because GOP leaders held it open for three hours, during which they flipped opponents into the "yes" column, Democrats will include a provision in the rules to prevent any sort of repetition, said aides to incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Democrats also will eliminate the practices of changing conference reports after members have signed them and excluding elected members from conference committees.

Until now, Democrats have not had to propose specifics or explain how they would work in practice. The biggest challenge for the new majority has been translating political rhetoric into tightly drafted legal language without loopholes, said Democratic aides. The concern is that language could be exploited for loopholes or yield unintended consequences.

New House rules could take eight weeks or longer to go into effect because the ethics committee (the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct) might be required to clarify and interpret issues, such as how to define a lobbyist and how a pre-approval requirement for travel would function.

State and local government agencies and some foundations, such as AIPAC and the Aspen Institute, want to be exempted from the new rules.

"We're interested in the basic bans on paying for travel, bans on gifts and entertainment and making sure there are no loopholes in the provisions," said Fred Wertheimer, the president of Democracy 21, a campaign-finance watchdog group.

Senior Democratic staffers, who returned to work on a day when the federal government was closed to mourn the death of former President Gerald Ford, planned to make the proposed rules changes public this afternoon at a press conference. Some aides who have jumped from the campaign trail into Congress have, as yet, no computers and only limited access to telephones.

Leadership aides plan today to brief chiefs of staff and press secretaries working for rank-and-file lawmakers.

Meanwhile, GOP Reps. Tom Price (Ga.), Eric Cantor (Va.), and Patrick McHenry (N.C.) plan to introduce a resolution next week modeled on legislation that Pelosi introduced in 2004.

Pelosi's "Minority Bill of Rights" demanded that legislation move through the committee process before reaching the House floor and urged GOP leaders to give lawmakers 24 hours to review legislation before it is considered and voted on by subcommittees or on the House floor.

McHenry expressed concern that excluding Republicans from the legislative process would set a bad precedent. GOP Reps. Buck McKeon (Calif.), Peter King (N.Y.) and Jim McCrery (La.) yesterday urged the Democrats who will chair their committees to conduct hearings on proposals that Democrats will consider in the first 100 legislative hours.

Democrats justified excluding Republicans by saying that the bills had already been discussed in the 109th Congress.

"It is a choice between leading with integrity and leading by force," McHenry said. "To say they are advocating [fairness] is ludicrous on its face by their opening hours of action."

Democrats and political observers rejected the GOP proposal, noting that the Republican majority never considered Pelosi's legislation.

"I think they risk being laughed out of town," said Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.), the incoming chairwoman of the Rules Committee.

Norm Ornstein, a congressional scholar with the American Enterprise Institute, added, "I don't blame them in the slightest for picking it up and introducing it, but the chutzpah is quite remarkable."

Some of Pelosi's proposed changes will be included in the Democratic rules package, said Stacey Bernards, a spokeswoman for Majority Leader-elect Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

Democrats complained vociferously about the House GOP's tactics during the past four years, such as preventing Democrats from offering amendments on the House floor, excluding them from conference committees, and holding votes open for much longer than the traditional 15 minutes.

In response to real and perceived legislative slights, Democratic candidates campaigned against a Republican "culture of corruption" and promised to tighten ethics rules, in part to put distance between lawmakers and lobbyists. Revising ethics rules may prove central to retaining their majority in the House in 2008.

"I think the most important thing we can do to ensure their reelection is to follow through on the commitments the Democrats … made to those voters," Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, told C-SPAN's "Newsmakers" program last week.

Democratic leaders plan to pair three freshman members with more senior lawmakers to lead the debate on the House floor on Thursday and Friday. Rep. Zack Space (D-Ohio), who won the seat vacated by former Rep. Bob Ney (R), will lead debate over new trip and gift rules. Ney has pleaded guilty to crimes stemming from the scandal surrounding Jack Abramoff, the convicted former GOP lobbyist.

The other two freshman Democratic lawmakers who are to play leading roles in the debate have not been chosen, but Democratic leaders are considering Reps. Chris Carney (D-Pa.), Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.) and Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.), said a senior Democratic aide. They each defeated a lawmaker ensnared in ethics controversies.

In addition to revising ethics rules, the Democratic majority on Friday will debate and vote on procedural and budgetary reforms — measures to ensure that members have 24 hours to review legislation, earmark reforms and pay-as-you-go requirements — said senior Democratic aides.

Time spent debating changes to the rules package will not count against Pelosi's 100-hour legislative blitzkrieg, set to begin the week of Jan. 8 and last approximately 10 legislative days, ending when President Bush delivers his State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Grassroots Lobby Girds For Battle (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 3, 2007

As the new Democratic Congress prepares to take up a package of lobbying and ethics rules changes, a coalition of nonprofits and communications firms is renewing the push against new grassroots lobbying disclosure rules and not ruling out a future court challenge to the provisions.

The Free Speech Coalition is now leading the fight against proposals for mandatory reporting by any group involved in paid efforts to stimulate grassroots communications — another term for the proverbial pleas to voters to "contact your congressman" on a particular issue. Led by conservative fixtures such as direct-mail guru Richard Viguerie and Free Congress Foundation chief Paul Weyrich, the coalition is pulling no punches.

"If they pass this, there would be a massive litigation effort, because this bill is much more expansive than the proponents are leading everybody to believe," predicted Mark Fitzgibbons, president of corporate and legal affairs at the Viguerie-led firm American Target Advertising.

Lawmakers supporting grassroots disclosure have aimed their calls for reform at so-called "astroturf" campaigns, funded by corporate interests but portrayed as genuine citizen drives. Sens. Joseph Lieberman (D-Conn.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.) cited fake grassroots groups created by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff during their successful bid to add new disclosure rules to last year's Senate ethics bill. Registration and reporting would shed sunlight on grassroots activities, not curtail them, the senators noted.

But the coalition contends that the new rules would provide a loophole for corporations that confine their grassroots communications to employees and shareholders. Though grassroots disclosure is backed by most leading government watchdog groups, all of which could be affected by the new reporting rules, the coalition has trained its fire on Ralph Nader-founded Public Citizen in a letter that will be forwarded to every member of the new Congress this week.

"This … is a coalition of groups that have a financial stake and are worried that their business might be impacted negatively," said Laura MacCleery, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch division. MacCleery acknowledged the possibility of a lawsuit against the new rules but cautioned the coalition against considering a challenge before legislative language emerges.

The debate on last year's Senate lobbying bill elicited an equally fierce drive against the grassroots provision, mounted by an alliance called LobbySense that included as members senior officials at Americans for Tax Reform, Concerned Women for America and the Family Research Council. Fitzgibbons said LobbySense informed him of the likely resurgence of the grassroots debate, and that he expected the old and new coalitions to join forces in the coming months.

The timeframe for consideration of grassroots lobbying rules could differ sharply between the Senate and House, however. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) plans to call up last year's Senate ethics bill, which contains Lieberman and Levin's grassroots provisions, as a starting point for debate next week.

But the House will take up only internal rules changes on lobbying and ethics this month, sending statutory changes such as the grassroots mandate through regular committee order, said Drew Hammill, a spokesman for House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"We have made an effort to address the concerns of some of these groups as we move along with this," Hammill said.

The conservative blogosphere has lent its heft to the Coalition's campaign against grassroots disclosure, along with past Federal Election Commission Chairman Brad Smith, who was appointed by former President Bill Clinton. Smith also predicted that the grassroots provisions would merit a court challenge if they become law.

"It's a disaster, generally, the notion that the government should be checking up on attempts by citizens to communicate with citizens," Smith said. He argued that lawmakers are seeking the identity of firms paying for constituent calls for purposes of retaliation: "Can you think of any other reason that members of Congress need to know who's running grassroots ads in their district?"

The Senate bill's grassroots language is similar to that in the House Democratic leadership lobbying reform bill that is serving as a model for this year's effort. The provisions would require grassroots lobbying firms to register and report to Congress quarterly, only on communications to more than 500 members of the general public, with exemptions for members of nonprofits as well as corporate employees and shareholders.

MacCleery also singled out the proposal's minimum of $25,000 in grassroots expenses to trigger reporting by the firms contracted for any issue campaign. "That's a substantial amount of money on a grassroots lobbying effort, particularly in the age of the Internet," she said.

As for the coalition's rhetorical combat with Public Citizen, MacCleery characterized the specter of a lawsuit against grassroots rules as an attempt to generate a false opposition to reform.

"It's almost like they're flacks," she added, "like they're good at creating the appearance of controversy where none exists."

Think Twice About Empowering An Office Of Independent Ethics (HILL)

By Lanny J. Davis

The Hill, January 3, 2007

The current congressional-reformer rage is to create an independent office that would investigate and file ethics charges. This is the "solution" to the problem of the inherent conflict of interest in members of Congress investigating their colleagues, much less members of their own party. Such an office, reformers argue, would be "above politics" and avoid that conflict.

Hmmmmm. Seems like déjà vu all over again.

Remember Watergate? In 1978, the same problem of public corruption and the inherent conflict of interest in the executive branch investigating itself led to a similar "above politics" office: the Office of the Special Prosecutor (a few years later called the Independent Counsel). The result: a constitutional monstrosity who couldn't be hired or fired by someone voters elected (in this case, the president); and when he or she abused power, there was no political accountability. Indeed, no accountability at all.

Between 1978 and 1999, when the independent counsel statute was allowed to die with the support of both parties, 25 independent counsels spent over $175 million. In the final analysis, very few public officials were convicted of serious crimes. But dozens of innocent men and women were smeared, with ruined reputations that could not be cleared. In the 1980s, Democrats used and abused the process, forcing the appointment of numerous independent counsels who caused such damage to innocent people. Then in the 1990s, it was the Republicans' turn to play "gotcha" and repeat the same abuses that they had accused the Democrats of in the 1980s (when they had tried to kill the statute).

Let us never forget Ronald Reagan's former Labor Secretary Raymond Donovan. At the behest of Democratic congressional leaders, he was investigated three times by an independent counsel and each time no charges were brought. Finally he was prosecuted by a Democratic, partisan district attorney in the Bronx, N.Y. When he was acquitted, he was asked how he felt. He asked: "[To] which office do I go to get my reputation back?"

So how to learn from the tragic mistake of the independent counsel experience while still overcoming inherent conflicts of interest and strengthening enforcement of congressional ethics? Some congressional reformers would argue that an independent office for congressional ethics would only be able to file the charges, leaving to the ethics committees the determination of innocence or guilt. But that was exactly the power the independent counsel had – to just file charges. And we all now know that the filing of charges itself can have a disastrous effect, even if the accused turns out to be innocent, with little or no consequence for the official who filed the charges.

So when the 110th Congress begins tomorrow, it might be a better idea to limit the independent congressional office to conducting professional investigations of charges filed by members of Congress with the respective ethics committees. That would build political accountability into all parts of the process. The member who files charges that turn out to be groundless would be subject to voter disapproval back home. If the ethics committee chooses to file charges, then there would be a fully transparent process to determine the truth, with due process safeguards available to the accused. If the committee chooses not to bring charges, so too would transparency rules apply — the committee would have to explain fully why the evidence did not support bringing a charge.

In all respects, the ultimate jury, the ultimate supreme court, would be the voters. Us. Not a perfect system. But better than the alternatives.

Poll Shows Support For Democrats' Goals (AP)

By Darlene Superville

AP, January 3, 2007

Two of the Democrats' top goals — a higher minimum wage and federal funding of embryonic stem cell research — enjoy broad public support as the party takes control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years.

An overwhelming majority also supports making it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries.

But the jury is out on incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. Most people say they do not know enough yet to have an opinion of the California Democrat who will be the first woman in that office, an Associated Press-AOL News poll found.

The survey results come as the 110th Congress is set to convene at noon Thursday, with Democrats eager to keep their promises to pass several pieces of legislation in the first 100 hours of business, including the minimum wage increase and stem cell research funding. Voters, exasperated by investigations into the ethics of GOP lawmakers and unhappy with the situation in Iraq, toppled Republican majorities in the House and Senate last November.

Democrats will hold a 233-202 edge in the House and will control the Senate by 51-49.

A boost to the $5.15-an-hour federal minimum wage would be the first since 1997. Democratic leaders have proposed raising it in stages to $7.25 an hour. President Bush has said he supports the idea, along with help for small businesses.

Fully 80 percent of survey respondents favor an increase, too.

Support is strongest among Democrats, 91 percent, while 65 percent of Republicans back the idea. Women, men without college degrees and single women all are especially likely to favor a minimum wage hike.

Nearly seven of 10 adults, 69 percent, favor the government taking steps to make it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries, where some medicines cost significantly less than in the U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0110513

Importing prescription drugs to the United States is illegal, but the Food and Drug Administration generally does not bar individuals from bringing in small amounts for personal use. At the same time, the government has estimated that buying drugs from other countries would do little to influence what they cost at home.

Some 56 percent of adults support easing restrictions on using federal money to pay for research on embryonic stem cells. Supporters say such research could lead to treatments for everything from Parkinson's disease to spinal cord injuries. Bush and other opponents say the embryos from which the cells are extracted are human lives that should not be destroyed in the name of science.

Bush kept a promise in 2001 when he limited federally funded research to lines of embryonic stem cells that had been created by that time. Last summer, he used the first veto of his presidency to reject a bill that would have directed more federal dollars toward embryonic stem cell research.

Democrats have pledged to reverse that outcome, setting up a possible veto showdown with the president.

Achieving the Democrats' goals could help Pelosi raise her public profile.

She is the first woman to lead a party caucus in either house of Congress — she was elected leader of the House Democrats in 2002 — and now will be the first female speaker, second in line to succeed the president.

Yet as much as the 10-term congresswoman has been in the news over the years and, more recently, since the Democratic election rout on Nov. 7, people say they just don't know her.

More than five in 10 adults, 55 percent, don't know enough yet about Pelosi to have an opinion of her. Those with opinions to share were split, with 22 percent viewing her favorably and 22 percent unfavorably.

The telephone survey of 1,004 adults was conducted Dec. 19-21 by Ipsos, an international public opinion research company. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Most Support 2 Of Dems' Top Goals, Poll Says (USAT)

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Americans overwhelmingly support two of the Democrats' top goals — increasing the minimum wage and making it easier to buy prescription drugs from other countries — as the party prepares to take control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years, an Associated Press-AOL Poll indicates.

When Congress reconvenes Thursday, Democrats will hold a 233-202 edge in the House and a 51-49 advantage in the Senate (two senators were elected as independents but will caucus with Democrats).

Party leaders want to boost the federal minimum wage — in stages — from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour. President Bush has said he supports that idea. So do 80% of those polled by AP-AOL.

On prescription drugs, 69% favor making it easier to buy them from other countries — where they may cost significantly less.

The telephone survey of 1,004 adults was conducted Dec. 19-21 by Ipsos, an international public opinion research company. The margin of sampling error: +/-3 percentage points.

FBI notes alleged harsh treatment at Guantanamo

FBI agents and other employees deployed to the U.S. military's Guantanamo Bay prison complex witnessed or were told of more than two dozen incidents of harsh treatment of detainees, documents released Tuesday by the bureau show. They include one case in which an unidentified interrogator was rumored to have dressed as a priest and performed a mock baptism on a Muslim prisoner.

The incidents represent the results of an internal FBI survey of 493 agents or employees who were deployed to Guantanamo since the 2001 terrorist attacks. The FBI review concluded that none of its agents or employees was involved in the questionable treatment, much of which was outlined in news accounts that first appeared in 2004. —Kevin Johnson

Newspaper: Giuliani's plans for White House run leaked

In 140 candid pages that lay out his presidential campaign plans, former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani and his aides include everything from how much money he needs to raise ($100 million this year) to the problems that could scuttle his bid (including being more "liberal" than most Republicans), the New York Daily News reported Tuesday (nydailynews.com).

DOJ_NMG_0110514

The newspaper said it obtained the campaign plan from "a source sympathetic to one of Giuliani's rivals for the White House." It had apparently been left behind at a GOP campaign stop last year.

Giuliani spokeswoman Sunny Mindel told the Daily News that the person who leaked the plan must be worried about "Rudy's poll numbers in New Hampshire and Iowa." She called the leaking "suspicious activity." Giuliani has not formally entered the 2008 race, but notes in the plan show he began meeting with supporters last April, the newspaper reported.

Opposing View: Keep Cameras Focused (USAT)

By Donald Wolfensberger

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Opposing view: Keep cameras focused 'Open House' serves Americans; 'open window' serves Peeping Toms.

By Donald Wolfensberger

Granting C-SPAN free gazing rights on the House floor is a terrible idea. Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi is right to reject the request.

Such free-roaming lens-groping would defeat the original purpose of broadcasting House debates. According to the final Rules Committee report on the issue in February 1978, that purpose "is to provide a complete, uninterrupted, and accurate record of the official proceedings and business of the House — a kind of visual and audio parallel to the Congressional Record."

The report rejected network calls for allowing panning and reaction shots: "The broadcast media's view is attuned to news and dramatic values," and "the way in which they move and focus cameras and cover the proceedings will be conditioned to and colored by that view."

The report concluded, however, that such news aspects of coverage must be subordinated "to the more fundamental need for a complete, uninterrupted, undistracted, unbiased, and completely accurate record of the official actions of the House."

The following June, the full House overwhelmingly affirmed that view by authorizing a House-operated broadcast system under the direction and control of the speaker and by rejecting a network pool arrangement. Speaker Thomas "Tip" O'Neill subsequently directed that the remotely controlled cameras in the galleries show only tight shots of the members speaking. O'Neill had a strong aversion to allowing any reaction shots that could bring ridicule on the House by showing inattentive members chatting, reading, or sleeping.

Today, viewers can get a sense of the overall chamber from wide-angle shots provided in between speakers and during voting periods. But there's a big difference between the "open House" we see on TV today and the kind of "open window" for TV Peeping Toms some would prefer.

The speaker's insistence on preserving the decorum and integrity of House proceedings is not an "anachronism." It is the very essence of a dignified public body.

Donald Wolfensberger is director of the Congress Project at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars and a former staff director of the House Rules Committee.

A Fairer House (WP)

THE NEW Democratic House majority has an ambitious plan for its first 100 hours in power, from increasing the minimum wage to strengthening ethics rules to having the federal government negotiate prescription drug prices. Unfortunately, its plans don't include getting those provisions passed in the democratic fashion that the Democrats promised to adhere to once in the majority. When Republicans took over in 1995, they at least went through the motions of putting their "Contract With America" proposals through the normal committee process. Democrats under Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) have decided not to bother with that, nor to let Republicans offer amendments on the floor, nor even to put a GOP alternative up for a vote. This is exactly the kind of high-handed mistreatment that Democrats complained about, justifiably, when they were in the minority.

Democrats offer various rationales for their about-face. They say the streamlined process is necessary because they've pledged to accomplish so much in their first 100 legislative hours. But what makes living up to that self-imposed deadline -- which will stretch on for weeks, in any event -- more important than living up to their promise of procedural fairness? And why, even if that deadline is sacrosanct, couldn't Republicans at least be offered an opportunity to offer alternatives on the floor?

Democrats also argue that their proposals have been fully vetted and debated, but in fact many of them involve complex policy choices and some are new proposals. Democrats howled when Republicans moved unilaterally to change the rules governing the operations of the House ethics committee; why is it different for them to move unilaterally to change ethics rules? Questions such as whether the minimum wage increase should be combined with tax breaks for small businesses and whether the federal government should be the only party negotiating Medicare prescription prices ought to be put up for discussion and a vote. If that causes a fracture in the Democratic caucus, so be it.

Republicans, who were only too happy to strong-arm and ignore Democrats when the GOP was in the majority, are now, of course, moaning about being abused. In a nice bit of political theater, they plan to offer Ms. Pelosi's own "Minority Bill of Rights" from 2004, which would provide for, among other things, "open, full and fair debate consisting of a full amendment process."

Democrats say that they'll adhere to their previous promises once their first flurry of business is finished. We look forward to that. But if they don't reconsider, they will set an unfortunate precedent that fairness will be offered on sufferance, when the majority finds it convenient, and not as a matter of principle. That would not be a good start for the 110th Congress.

Pentagon Redefines 'Emergency' (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Lockheed Martin Corp.'s new Joint Strike Fighter plane won't be ready to see action for years. But that didn't stop the Air Force from inserting two of the jets into the coming emergency-funding request for operations in Iraq.

The Pentagon's supplemental budgets traditionally pay for war costs such as personnel, equipment repairs and ammunition. But as the Joint Strike Fighter request shows, the coming supplemental is being used by the military services for more than replacing what has been lost in Iraq and Afghanistan. It is being used to acquire future weapons that normally would be funded through the regular Pentagon budget.

The fighter-jet request, which was confirmed by a senior Air Force official, is part of the Pentagon's proposed $99.7 billion war-fighting budget for the current fiscal year, which began Oct. 1. It comes on top of $70 billion in war funds already approved and the regular U.S. defense budget of $436.6 billion. The emergency supplemental budget has been cleared by the Pentagon and is awaiting approval by the Office of Management and Budget, which oversees funding requests for the White House. It is to be formally submitted to Congress after President Bush next month unveils the fiscal 2008 Pentagon budget request, which defense analysts expect to be nearly $470 billion.

An October directive from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England opened the floodgates by allowing the services to request emergency funds to replace equipment and upgrade to newer models for the "overall efforts related to the global war on terror," not just operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"It's a feeding frenzy," says an army official involved in budget planning. "Using the supplemental budget, we're now buying the military we wish we had," he says, referring to former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's 2004 quote about inadequate equipment for troops.

Each year, the president submits his federal budget request to Congress, which in turn makes changes and works to appropriate funds. Supplementals -- which aren't limited to defense spending and have been used for matters such as Hurricane Katrina relief -- move on a parallel track, but are targeted to specific areas. In recent years, they have been treated as emergency funds outside the budget entirely -- which has become a sore point in Congress.

Of the supplemental's total $99.7 billion, $34 billion is slated for weapons procurement. Much of the $47.6 billion for operations and maintenance also will be available to contractors to repair and modernize equipment they supplied. About half of the $9.75 billion slated for Iraqi and Afghan forces is likely to be used to buy weapons and equipment, says James McAleese, a defense consultant in McLean, Va.

About $21 billion in the supplemental is headed to the Army, and several companies stand to benefit. General Dynamics Corp. likely will snare business from $3.9 billion for armored vehicles such as its Abrams tank and $7.4 billion to buy radios. ITT Corp. and Harris Corp. likely will be the biggest beneficiaries of radio purchases. BAE Systems PLC will win work for its Bradley fighting vehicle, while Armor Holdings Inc., AM General LLC and Oshkosh Truck Corp. will divvy up the proposed $5.4 billion for trucks. Lockheed and Raytheon Co. are expected to gain from demand for short-range tactical missiles.

In another boost for combat-vehicle makers General Dynamics and BAE, the Army is requesting $3.67 billion to accelerate the reconfiguration of ground forces into smaller units -- a process normally funded through the regular budget.

Among Air Force requests is $62 million for ballistic missiles, an unusual supplemental-budget item because they are strategic assets that haven't been used in Iraq or antiterrorism operations. The Navy is requesting $3.04 billion for new and repaired aircraft, an amount that likely exceeds battle losses. The Navy appears to be using supplemental funds to secure money ahead of the fiscal 2008 budget, expected next month, when it will face pressure to cut aircraft purchases to free up billions of dollars for a new aircraft carrier.

Lockheed and Boeing Co. stand to gain from Air Force and Navy aircraft requests. The Air Force has budgeted for 17 Lockheed C-130 cargo planes. Boeing, which gained 10 C-17 cargo planes in the most recent supplemental budget, could receive fresh orders for its Navy F-18 fighter jet and V-22 tilt-rotor aircraft, which is made with Textron Inc.'s Bell Helicopter unit and has yet to be used in combat.

It is unclear whether new Defense Secretary Robert Gates will seek to change the supplemental budget, which awaits White House approval. The new largess is a turnaround from two years ago, when the Pentagon tried unsuccessfully to rein in weapons spending. Defense officials say they hope the prospect of defense-industry jobs will help ease passage in Congress. The coming Democratic leadership -- and many Republican members of Congress -- are wary of supplemental budgets because there is less room to review and change the funding. Even the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, criticized this funding method, saying the war should be paid for through the main Pentagon budget.

"The latest supplemental budget is wildly out of synch with the political system, which wants more discipline and oversight," says Loren Thompson of the Washington-area Lexington Institute think tank.

An 'Honest,' 'Open' House, Where Cameras Can't Zoom Out (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The House of Representatives is often called "the People's House." So wouldn't it be nifty if the "people" could see what was going on in their own house?

But those watching on TV really can't. Only tight camera shots of lawmakers speaking on the floor -- or of the presiding officer in the chair -- are allowed. The camera is not permitted to pan the chamber. Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) had promised that the Democrats would have "the most honest, most open and most ethical Congress in history."

So Brian Lamb, the head of C-Span, which got the electronic eye into the House and Senate in the first place nearly three decades ago, thought this would be a great opportunity to improve coverage. (The GOP turned him down in 1985.)

He wrote Pelosi asking for more cameras, saying the current system "does a disservice to the institution and to the public." For example, the fixed camera means "you can never get a reaction shot" during a debate, he told us, so it "takes out of the experience any soul" or sense of the give-and-take.

Not so, Pelosi said in a Dec. 22 letter to Lamb. "I believe the dignity and decorum of the United States House of Representatives are best preserved by maintaining the current system of televised proceedings," she wrote.

"Dignity"? "Decorum"? In a place that folks such as Jim Traficant, Duke Cunningham and Mark Foley used to call home? Okay, she's obviously joking, but still. . . . As The Who sang years ago: "Meet the new boss, same as the old boss."Wind Is Not the Only Alternative Natural Gas

Seems like almost every trade association and nonprofit sends out a new calendar this time of year. Our favorite is one from the American Wind Energy Association. "We hope you will enjoy this visual 'tour' of some of the wind energy products now operating in our country," an enclosed letter says.

One especially exciting picture appears to tout both wind energy and methane. Best to stay upwind if possible.Keep the Empty Seats Out of the Shot

There was a fine turnout yesterday at the National Cathedral for the funeral of former president Gerald R. Ford. Tickets were hard to come by, and latecomers were turned away. Even so, seems there were some empty seats.

Just before the service began, an usher approached a Loop colleague sitting in the cheap seats on the left, the seats where you really are better off watching the monitor if you want to see anything.

"Does anyone want to sit in the center section?" the usher asked. "We need 10 people" to fill in the crowd. So a group of people trooped to the rear of the center section, just in front of the Boy Scouts sitting in the last four rows, to watch from there.From Interior to Big Oil

Remember former interior secretary Gale Norton? She soon will be general counsel for a Royal Dutch Shell division in Denver that's focusing on oil shale exploration in the Rockies. House Democrats plan to investigate Norton's former agency, especially for its cozy relationship with the oil and gas industry.

Enviros naturally criticized Norton's hiring, with one even saying the move would "undermine" Shell's efforts to project an "image as a good environmental steward." Predictably, Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), a senior member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Shell's move was just another example of the "hand-in-glove relationship between Big Oil and the Bush administration's top Interior officials."

Well, maybe Greenpeace wasn't hiring.If Only She Had Some References for the Job

At the United Nations, where there is no U.S. ambassador, idle chatterers are talking about Victoria Nuland, now ambassador to NATO, as a possible choice to succeed John R. Bolton. Nuland, who is a career Foreign Service officer and is married to Robert Kagan, a contributor to the Washington Post op-ed page, was top foreign policy adviser to Vice President Cheney and before that an aide to Clinton confidante Strobe Talbott when he was deputy secretary of state. Well, the bases can't get more covered than that.GSA Earning a Few Admirers Out West

The GSA's fame has spread across the country. This just in from the Austin American-Statesman: "It will be little comfort to anyone who has ever undergone the torture of a building project to know that bigger doesn't mean better -- or easier. U.S. District Judge Lee Yeakel is learning a lot about government construction projects as he helps oversee the construction of the proposed federal courthouse. . . . He notes with a chuckle that he was advised that the U.S. General Services Administration -- the agency in charge of getting the project built -- has a motto: 'We're not happy until you're not happy.' Goodbyes Galore At State Department (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr., The Washington Wire

The Wall Street Journal.com, January 3, 2007

In yet another high-level departure from the State Department, Condoleezza Rice's energetic head of political-military relations, John Hillen, has told his colleagues he is leaving the administration this month. Hillen, a former Army officer and Gulf War veteran, served as the principal link between State and the Pentagon and was leading the administration's effort to build better security ties with Arab allies in the Persian Gulf in a bid to contain Iran's growing influence.

In an email to colleagues the day after Christmas, Hillen said that he and his family decided that it was best not "to commit to being in the administration until 2009." The note suggests that the White House has requested that all top appointees either commit to staying through the end of the administration, or leave as soon as possible. "It was clear that I need to commit more fully to some of the unique and immediate needs of my growing family and give Secretary Rice a chance to give a new [assistant secretary] a full two years to keep the momentum going," Hillen wrote in his email.

Beyond the Hillen departure, Rice has lost her deputy, Robert Zoellick, her United Nations ambassador, John Bolton, and her counselor, Philip Zelikow. No replacements for any of these posts have been announced.

Lawmakers, Others Eager For Part D Enrollment Numbers (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 3, 2007

The sign-up period for prescription-drug coverage under Medicare Part D ended Sunday, and the Bush administration and observers of the program are eagerly waiting to see whether beneficiaries enrolled in plans best suited to their needs.

Encouraging elderly and disabled participants to reevaluate their 2006 plans, which changed in many cases, and compare them to other options on the market was the chief challenge during the second year of the program.

The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS), lawmakers, members of the health-insurance industry, and beneficiaries' advocates widely predicted that most people enrolled in Part D would stick with the coverage they selected during the inaugural enrollment period, between November 2005 and May 2006.

Numerous opinion polls conducted in 2006 indicated that the majority of Part D beneficiaries were generally satisfied with their drug coverage, despite complaining that the program was too complicated.

But the private insurers that provide the drug coverage made numerous alterations to their plans for 2007, including changing premiums, deductibles, cost-sharing obligations and the drugs they cover.

Moreover, with the massive task of establishing a brand-new program completed, the administration scaled back its education and outreach programs for the 2007 enrollment period.

Nevertheless, the administration has expressed confidence that beneficiaries were smart shoppers during the six-week sign-up period.

In a conference call with reporters last week, acting CMS Deputy Administrator Herb Kuhn pointed to the high volume of calls to Medicare's toll-free telephone hotline and of visits to Medicare's website as signs that beneficiaries were not simply succumbing to inertia, even if most of them did not elect to change plans.

According to CMS, the "Plan Finder" website, which allows beneficiaries to compare Part D options, received 30 million page views between Oct. 15 and Dec. 27. Five million calls were made to the hotline.

At the close of 2005 and again when the sign-up period ended in May 2006, CMS experienced a spike in online and telephone inquiries and in enrollment. A CMS spokesman said yesterday that figures regarding how many beneficiaries looked for information or signed up for plans during the final days of this year's enrollment period were not yet available.

An AARP lobbyist who is the group's national coordinator for health issues, Kirsten Sloan, said, "I think you'll find that most Medicare beneficiaries did shop around."

AARP conducted its own multifaceted outreach program, which ranged from waging a national advertising campaign to hosting small educational events with beneficiaries. "There are a myriad of ways to get information," Sloan, who praised CMS's efforts, said.

The AARP famously endorsed the bill that created Part D, to the consternation of many Democratic lawmakers. AARP's affiliated business operation co-sponsors a Part D plan with United Healthcare.

One critic of the program remains concerned that many beneficiaries did not realize that their benefits had changed, although he acknowledged that a final assessment is impossible until CMS releases its enrollment data.

"What portion of the Medicare population was aware of these changes? … We simply don't know," said Ron Pollack, president of the liberal healthcare advocacy group Families USA.

"Most people seemed unable to bear a whole new examination this year," said Medicare Rights Center President Robert Hayes, who has been a fierce detractor of Part D. Hayes predicted that many beneficiaries will get unwelcome surprises as they learn about changes to their benefits later in the year, after it's too late to change plans.

In addition to defending the quality of the benefits themselves, CMS and the health plans have had to answer for problems beneficiaries encountered when signing up for the program and accessing their benefits during the early months of Part D's first year.

These problems generated intense criticism from congressional Democrats and some advocacy groups.

Hayes offered faint praise for CMS's performance during the enrollment period of 2007. "Administratively, CMS is treading water competently," he said. Hayes believes that the structure of Part D is too complex to administer and too difficult for beneficiaries to use.

Although the process appears to have gone substantially more smoothly for the 2007 coverage period, it has not been without problems.

CMS has acknowledged the some health plans, including United Healthcare, took too long to provide beneficiaries with information about alterations to their coverage. Approximately 250,000 people who did not receive an "annual notice of change" document by Oct. 31 will have until Feb. 15 to choose a plan, CMS said last week.

The availability of timely and accurate information on Part D plans, or the lack thereof, has been a recurrent theme in Democratic criticism of the program.

Incoming Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) was one of two Democrats who helped to write the bill that created Part D, but he frequently has expressed dissatisfaction with the administration's and the health plans' performance in disseminating information to beneficiaries.

The problems with the annual notices of change prompted strong words from Baucus. "It is unacceptable that a number of drug plans failed to uphold their fundamental responsibility to give this notice to Medicare beneficiaries," he said in a written statement provided by his spokeswoman.

"We need to make sure that folks are getting all of the information that they need to make decisions during the open enrollment period," Baucus said.

Baucus also reiterated his vow to pursue changes to Part D to make it "more consistent and simpler for seniors to use."

Clyburn Leads Southern Blacks' Ascent To Top Posts In Congress (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In this time of change in Congress, Rep. James Clyburn, a minister's son from South Carolina, takes his place tomorrow as the House Majority Whip -- the No. 3 Democratic post and highest ever held by an African-American from a Southern district.

The 66-year-old Mr. Clyburn, who was 25 before the Voting Rights Act was enacted, symbolizes the rise of a set of Southern black lawmakers, shaped by the region and with a distinctive approach to politics separate from that of black leaders representing urban Northern districts.

Georgia Rep. John Lewis, a sharecropper's son who won national fame in the civil rights movement, will be chairman of a panel within the House tax-writing committee. Rep. Bennie Thompson, once a Mississippi alderman, becomes chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. Rep. Mel Watt moves up in the Financial Services panel important to a Charlotte banking industry just miles from where he grew up in poverty in North Carolina.

"We have come from a part of the country where it was legal for people to treat people differently because of their color," Mr. Thompson says. "In many instances you find a passion for making sure that our systems are fair and equitable. On the other hand you find a greater interest in community."

Their often rural roots and the black educational and religious institutions that sustained them through segregation still influence their politics. "It's like the turtle on the fence post: he didn't get there by himself," says Rep. Sanford Bishop (D., Ga.) "I come from a district that believes in God, country, work, family and guns, and not necessarily in that order. For rural blacks, a shotgun was just another tool on the farm and a way to protect you from the Klan."

Southern black lawmakers also tend to be more conservative than their Northern counterparts on social issues. Political necessity has required them to reach out to business and agricultural interests to gain white support. And growing up under segregation put a premium on personal relationships, with both blacks and whites, that can make them adept at building coalitions in the new Congress.

"I fish in a lot of ponds." Mr. Clyburn says, emphasizing his willingness to work with different factions. "I'm basically a manager. I've been managing something since I was 24 years old."

In Congress, that has meant fostering ties to departing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.), with whom Mr. Clyburn worked on tax legislation in 2000 important to depressed rural areas. Even as he did so, Mr. Clyburn was confronting then-Sen. Jesse Helms (R., N.C.) by persuading a reluctant President Clinton to make a recess appointment of an African-American to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Mr. Clyburn, one of 13 black freshmen elected to the House in 1992 from the South, is a strong labor Democrat. But he admires former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin for "sticking to his guns" in a recent standoff with party liberals; in 2003, Mr. Clyburn himself broke with his party to support a ban on late-term abortions.

Mr. Clyburn has built upon a set of extended family relationships from the region -- and across racial lines. "I Too Am a Southerner" is the working title of a book he is writing about his life. He says racial injustice continues today in cases of white individuals manipulating property values for rural black homeowners. But this is also a man who has served on the board of a prominent South Carolina bank and maintains a friendship with a Washington oil lobbyist, whose white grandfather built a bowling alley for blacks in Charleston in the '60s and then hired Mr. Clyburn to teach black customers the game.

Segregation fostered its own competitiveness. "Your parents told you, you had to be 'twice as good' and that's simmering in all of us," says Elijah Rogers, a Clyburn friend from their years at South Carolina State, an historically black college in Orangeburg, S.C. "Still today we correct each other if there is a slip in grammar."

Biblical verses are spliced into conversation: "Whither thou goest, I will go," Mr. Clyburn says, invoking Ruth's pledge to Naomi. After taking over the Democratic caucus chairmanship in the last Congress, Mr. Clyburn, an African Methodist Episcopal churchgoer, insisted on beginning party meetings with a prayer: "I was always taught: You lead by precept and example. ... I thought it would be sinful to lay out precepts if I were not going to be an example."

As Congress prepares to write a new farm bill this year, Mr. Clyburn plans to read a prayer for farm workers at an event tomorrow. And amid the outcry for ethics standards, he served on a special panel that investigated his friend, former Rep. Earl Hilliard, a black Alabama Democrat who lost his seat after being reprimanded for misusing campaign funds in support of private companies in which he or his family had an interest.

"It was one of the hardest things I ever had to do," says Mr. Clyburn, who remains friends with Mr. Hilliard. "I sat with him, just as I'm sitting with you, and I told him I'm sorry, you screwed up, and this is the best I can do."

That record could help him as Democrats try to move their own rules changes this week to address ethics and lobbying abuses. And on their agenda next week is a minimum-wage increase, a key issue for Mr. Clyburn's district, which includes many of the poorest communities in South Carolina.

The decade-long freeze at $5.15 an hour has made it harder for low-wage workers to qualify for the child tax credit, which was indexed to inflation in the same period. And he has little sympathy for Republican demands that Democrats must bring their bill -- seeking a $2.10 hourly increase -- through committee and not directly to the floor.

"Sometimes it's good to be smart, sometimes it's good to be symbolic," he says. "I think we ought to bring that bill straight to the floor. The old leadership refused to bring it to the floor and we're going to bring it."

Segregation's mark is clear in his protective reserve. "He is guarded.... Emotionally you never throw that off," said Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.).

"I wasn't born this way," Mr. Clyburn says. "I taught myself to be as reserved as I am in order to survive."

As a boy, Mr. Clyburn dreamed of being in politics, despite warnings from older blacks to keep his ambitions in check. The civil-rights movement thrust him forward in college, when he was arrested several times for demonstrations. In an early case, the late Rev. I. DeQuincey Newman, a mentor and South Carolina civil-rights activist, picked him to take the stand at the trial after Mr. Clyburn and other black students were arrested during an Orangeburg, S.C., demonstration.

It was common then for Southern newspapers to print the names of black student protesters on the front page, inviting retaliation against their families. Rev. Newman argued that in a white society the Clyburn family was safe from economic retribution: "Your daddy is a minister and he ain't preaching to no white people. Your mother is a beautician and she's fixing no white folks' hair. You're independent of the system. Nobody gets fired. So you're it."

Mr. Clyburn says, "It was my parents. It was because of them I was picked out of the crowd. Wherever it is you are, you don't get there on your own."

John West, an early progressive among South Carolina governors, tapped him to be the first black staffer to a sitting governor in modern times. Their friendship grew and Mr. Clyburn became the state's human rights commissioner soon after, a post he kept for more than 17 years.

DOJ_NMG_0110521

He twice failed in statewide races, but his efforts in South Carolina's Sixth District helped to oust a conservative Democrat in the 1970s who had won until then by playing to white tobacco interests and ignoring the black population. And when lines were redrawn to create a majority black district in the early '90s, Mr. Clyburn won a crowded primary without a costly runoff.

And with Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill), an African-American considering a presidential run in 2008, Mr. Clyburn's annual fish fry in April is a must-attend session because of South Carolina's early primary.

"Don't tell me things don't change," Mr. Lewis says. "Walk in my shoes; walk in Jim Clyburn's."

Ethics Panel Closes Conyers Probe (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

The Republican-led House ethics committee -- in possibly its last action before Democrats take over Congress -- closed the three-year investigation of Rep. John Conyers Jr. after he agreed to stop using staffers for campaign work and personal errands.

Mr. Conyers, a Michigan Democrat, acknowledged a "lack of clarity" in his dealing with the taxpayer-financed staffers, who reportedly worked on political campaigns and performed other nonofficial jobs, including baby-sitting Mr. Conyers' children and tutoring his wife.

The case against Mr. Conyers was closed without punitive action or a letter of reproval from the Committee on Standards of Conduct, the ethics panel, which is comprised of five Democrats and five Republicans.

Some Republican lawmakers and congressional watchdogs say the "slap on the wrist" for Mr. Conyers raises doubts about new ethics rules that Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, promises for the first 100 hours of the 110th Congress that convenes tomorrow.

"It's a slap on the wrist, but the fact that they did anything is a big deal for [the ethics committee]," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

She did not expect the committee to be any tougher under Democratic control.

"It is always hard for the party in power to deal with congressional corruption," she said.

Last month, the ethics committee decided not to take action against Rep. Jim McDermott, despite finding that the Washington Democrat broke ethics rules in 1997 by giving reporters illegally taped telephone calls involving House leaders.

A Republican lawmaker familiar with both cases said Democrats on the committee blocked punitive action against their colleagues.

"It certainly brings into question the Democrats being strong on ethics," said the lawmaker, who did not want to be identified discussing ethics cases. "In this case [against Mr. Conyers], they are clearly not willing to sanction their own Democratic members."

Promises of ethics reforms were key to Democratic wins in the midterm elections that gave the party the majority in Congress, but ethical concerns have dogged House Democrats as they prepare to take leadership.

Mrs. Pelosi weathered criticism for backing Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, in his ill-fated run for majority leader. Mr. Murtha was tainted by involvement in the Abscam scandal of the early 1980s.

Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat who stepped down from the ethics committee last year because he was the target of a federal corruption probe, is slated to head the subcommittee that oversees the Justice Department budget.

Mrs. Pelosi did not return a call seeking comment. House Democratic leaders will present the ethics legislation today.

Lawmaker To Take Seat Provisionally (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

A Florida Republican who narrowly won a disputed election will take his place with the new House tomorrow, but Democrats will continue to fight in the courts for a new election.

Rep. Rush D. Holt, New Jersey Democrat, will stand on the chamber floor and ask House leaders to recognize a court challenge against Rep.-elect Vern Buchanan from Florida's 13th Congressional District.

DOJ_NMG_0110522

"Mr. Holt's action will make clear that the swearing in of any member does not prejudice the legal case or the congressional investigations," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's spokeswoman, Jennifer Crider.

Mr. Holt has advocated that electronic voting machines be accompanied by a paper trail. The Florida election used electronic machines with no paper record.

Christine Jennings, who lost to Mr. Buchanan by 369 votes, is fighting in court the results of the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris, the former secretary of state who played a decisive role in the 2000 presidential election, and has filed a notice of contest with the House Administration Committee.

Mrs. Jennings is appealing a judge's ruling last week that denied her access to the electronic voting machines used in Sarasota County. The court battle in Florida will drag on, likely for months.

About 18,000 ballots, out of a total of about 238,000, recorded no preference in the race between Mr. Buchanan and Mrs. Jennings.

Mrs. Jennings has said that the large number of "undervotes" is likely the result of computer malfunction.

"There are some very serious questions about what happened," Miss Crider said.

Mr. Buchanan has said that state tests verified the reliability of the voting machines.

"Mr. Buchanan believes that the machines performed perfectly," said Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbets.

Republican leaders say the matter should be dropped.

"There is a time for politics, and there is a time for governing. The time for politics has passed," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam , Florida Republican, who chairs the House Republican Conference.

One Republican official, who was present at the recount performed in Florida, said there was "no question" that some votes were lost.

"But to the extent there were undervotes, there were just as many on the Republican side as there were on the Democrat side," the official said.

The House committee could begin an independent investigation by the end of this month, if the new chairman, Juanita Millender-McDonald, California Democrat, decides to pursue it.

The committee does have the power to dismiss Mrs. Jennings' notice of contest, to declare the seat vacant, or to remove Mr. Buchanan and install Mrs. Jennings in his place, said George Shevlin, the Democrat staff director on the committee. The full House must approve any committee report.

Since 1933, House records show that only three out of 105 contested elections have gone in favor of the challenger.

Wage Bill Will Iron Out An Abramoff Wrinkle (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

House Democrats led by Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) are aiming to undo a controversial vestige of the Jack Abramoff era in the first 100 hours of the 110th Congress. Miller plans to include language raising wages in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in a broader bill increasing the U.S. minimum wage.

In the past few years as the scandal involving Abramoff has unfolded, former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) have been scrutinized for their ties to Abramoff and their alleged efforts to block legislation aimed at raising labor and immigration standards in the islands.

The Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands (CNMI) hired Abramoff in 1994 to work with GOP leaders to prevent the extension of the federal minimum-wage and immigration laws to the islands. The government canceled its lobbying contract with Abramoff in 2002 amid over-billing concerns.

The Marianas economy relies heavily on garment factories where laborers, many from China and the Philippines, are paid far less than the U.S. minimum wage to make clothing eligible to carry a “Made in the U.S.” label.

Miller has been trying to extend U.S. federal minimum wage and immigration laws to the islands since 1996 and clashed repeatedly with DeLay on the issues. In the past, Miller also called on the then-GOP-controlled House Resources panel to investigate Abramoff's work for the islands, to no avail. Former Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) was then serving as chairman of the panel. He lost his reelection in November after a bruising race that highlighted his ties to Abramoff and DeLay.

Now that Democrats control the House and Senate, Miller finally may get his way. Last year, House Democrats attached to a spending bill an amendment that would have raised the minimum wage and extended it to the Marianas. That bill eventually stalled. The current language would increase gradually the islands' minimum wage from $3.05 an hour to the federal level, which is now $5.15 an hour but would increase to $7.25 if the umbrella U.S. minimum-wage hike passes.

"People are being exploited in the Marianas Islands and they deserve to have a minimum-wage increase," Miller's chief of staff, Daniel Weiss, said.

"The bottom line here is anyone who works under the American flag deserves to be paid a fair wage," incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) spokesman, Drew Hammill, said.

The CNMI government, however, strongly opposes any increase in wages, arguing that local businesses may shut down as a result. In late December, a spokesman for the islands' current governor, Benigno Fitial, told the Marianas Variety that a wage increase could cause business closures, higher unemployment, and decreased tax revenues.

Indeed, changes to international trade law that have eliminated or reduced quotas and duties from other textile-producing companies have taken a toll on the islands' garment industry, which faces increased competition from China and Vietnam. In late December a large garment factory employing more than 1,000 workers shut down, the 12th to close in last few years.

The value of CNMI shipments of garments to the U.S. dropped more than 16 percent between 2004 to 2005, to $677 million from about $807 million, down from a 1999-2000 peak of $1 billion, according to U.S. Department of Commerce data cited in a December Government Accountability Office report.

A Democratic aide blamed the islands' weakened garment industry on changes to international trade laws brought about by the World Trade Organization's actions, noting that Congress has "no jurisdiction" to change those laws. House Democrats can try to end "slave labor" practices and that's what they're trying to do, the aide said.

Fitial will have a difficult time fighting the wage increase. He has a long history with Abramoff, DeLay, and the islands' garment industry. He has called Abramoff a "close friend" and has long opposed Miller's efforts to raise labor and immigration standards on the islands. Fitial served in CNMI's House, where DeLay aides helped him win the speakership. He also has served as vice president of Tan Holdings, a family conglomerate that owns numerous clothing factories on the islands and one of the firms that made up the Saipan Garment Manufacturer's Association, an Abramoff client.

When Abramoff was scheduled for sentencing last year, Fitial was one of 260 people who wrote a letter asking the judge for leniency. In it, Fitial called Abramoff a "personal friend and political champion" of the "beleaguered" Pacific islands.

"He was a natural crusader and political activist, with great sympathy for our un-represented Commonwealth," Fitial wrote.

In late December, a spokesman for the CNMI governor's office said it is looking for a strong lobbying voice in Washington to oppose the minimum wage hike. Dan Mattoon, a former aide to Rep. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), had represented the Saipan Garment Manufacturers Association in 2005, but that contract ended last year.

Now that Democrats are in control, the political tide has turned and the governor's office may have a hard time finding a firm willing to take on its agenda, especially considering the islands' history with Abramoff and the tough campaigns many of its champions in Congress faced last cycle.

Doolittle's Marianas record became an issue in his tough reelection campaign when his opponent attacked him for tolerating "forced abortion and sex slavery" by supporting Abramoff in his defense of the islands' garment industry. A former Doolittle aide, Kevin Ring, worked for Abramoff heading up the CNMI contract in 2001.

Doolittle defended himself, claiming that he had no knowledge of the abuses, and blasted his opponent for running a desperate, negative campaign. Doolittle won reelection by just three percentage points.

Doolittle's office was closed yesterday and his press secretary did not return a call for comment.

But It's Thomas Jefferson's Koran! (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

DOJ_NMG_0110524

Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress, found himself under attack last month when he announced he'd take his oath of office on the Koran -- especially from Virginia Rep. Virgil Goode, who called it a threat to American values.

Yet the holy book at tomorrow's ceremony has an unassailably all-American provenance. We've learned that the new congressman -- in a savvy bit of political symbolism -- will hold the personal copy once owned by Thomas Jefferson.

"He wanted to use a Koran that was special," said Mark Dimunation, chief of the rare book and special collections division at the Library of Congress, who was contacted by the Minnesota Dem early in December. Dimunation, who grew up in Ellison's 5th District, was happy to help.

Jefferson's copy is an English translation by George Sale published in the 1750s; it survived the 1851 fire that destroyed most of Jefferson's collection and has his customary initialing on the pages. This isn't the first historic book used for swearing-in ceremonies -- the Library has allowed VIPs to use rare Bibles for inaugurations and other special occasions.

Ellison will take the official oath of office along with the other incoming members in the House chamber, then use the Koran in his individual, ceremonial oath with new Speaker Nancy Pelosi. "Keith is paying respect not only to the founding fathers' belief in religious freedom but the Constitution itself," said Ellison spokesman Rick Jauert.

One person unlikely to be swayed by the book's illustrious history is Goode, who released a letter two weeks ago objecting to Ellison's use of the Koran. "I believe that the overwhelming majority of voters in my district would prefer the use of the Bible," the Virginia Republican told Fox News, and then went on to warn about what he regards as the dangers of Muslims immigrating to the United States and Muslims gaining elective office.

Yeah, but what about a Koran that belonged to one of the greatest Virginians in history? Goode, who represents Jefferson's birthplace of Albemarle County, had no comment yesterday.Love, Etc.

Sala's Choice (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Sala Galant Lipschultz Burton made two critical decisions during her lifetime, the full meaning of which could not have been apparent to her at the time she made them. The first, in the early 1950s, was to marry a young lawyer and Democratic activist named Phil Burton, who was to become the single most important member of the House of Representatives in the '60s and '70s.

As a leader of the California Young Democrats and a rising force in San Francisco politics, the young Phil Burton had already won a reputation for his political brilliance -- and for his explosive temper. Nobody worked harder for liberal causes. Nobody demanded more of his associates and staffers: If they didn't match his crazy hours, his ability to count votes or his understanding of the art of the deal, they'd be subjected to eruptions from the Burton volcano.

Throughout his career, in fact, the biggest obstacle to Burton's success was his rage. That he accomplished as much as he did was due in part to Sala. The late John Jacobs, whose 1995 biography of Burton, "A Rage for Justice," is one of the great political biographies of the past quarter-century, reported that Sala was Phil's confidante, co-strategist and champion, but that was only the beginning. "She cleaned up his messes," Jacobs wrote, "soothing and placating those he insulted or abused. She alone could intervene in a conversation to shut him up."

Phil Burton was first elected to the House in 1964. In his 19 years as a congressman -- he died of a ruptured aorta in 1983 -- he was responsible for the legislation that established Supplemental Security Income (SSI) for the aged, blind and disabled; created black-lung compensation for coal miners; increased the minimum wage; made strikers eligible for food stamps; greatly expanded the size and number of national parks; and abolished the House Un-American Activities Committee. More broadly, he broke the power of the old Dixiecrat barons in the House by subjecting committee chairmanships to secret ballot elections within the Democratic caucus. He engineered reapportionments of California that were greatly to his party's benefit, and he steered contributions to the Democratic candidates who needed them most.

When he died, Sala succeeded him in a special election. Just four years later, in January 1987, Sala herself lay dying of cancer. She asked Phil's brother, John Burton, who had represented an adjoining congressional district in San Francisco, to come to the hospital and told him that she wanted "Nancy" to succeed her. For a moment, John Burton was unsure which Nancy she was referring to, but as she explained to family and friends at her bedside, the woman in question was the former California Democratic Party chair Nancy Pelosi.

Pelosi had been associated with the Burtons since shortly after she and her husband had moved to San Francisco in the years when Phil's star was rising. The Pelosis had a large, attractive house, and the first thing she recalls Phil saying to her was, "We'll use this for fundraisers." But Phil's appreciation of Pelosi wasn't confined to her abilities as a hostess. He saw in her a commitment to progressive values and a clear political sense of how to turn those values into laws. When John stepped down from Congress in 1982, Phil asked Pelosi to stand for election to replace him, but she declined, saying her children were too young. Five years later, Sala, on her deathbed, evidently saw in Pelosi the same qualities that Phil had seen.

This time, her children older, Pelosi said yes, and in April she won a squeaker of a special election.

In the House, Pelosi has continually sought the counsel of another Burton protege, George Miller, whose district is right across the Bay from hers. Appointed early on to a seat on the Appropriations Committee, she demonstrated, says the committee's new chairman, Wisconsin's David Obey, that she was "operational" -- a Burton word meaning able to steer difficult measures to enactment.

When the Newt Gingrich Republicans swept to power in 1994, political almanac authors Michael Barone and Grant Ujifusa termed it "the collapse of the House that Phil Burton built." Nancy Pelosi, as smooth as Phil Burton was rough, is far more open to openness in the legislative process than her sometimes secretive mentor was. Politically, she understands the limits of the possible and that she can expand them only as far as the American people are willing to go. But she also knows that the American people want Congress to do any number of things that were stubbornly, and, in the end, suicidally resisted by the now-collapsed house that Newt Gingrich built.

The Burtonistas -- with different causes and methods for a new era, to be sure -- are back. Score two for you, Sala.

OTHER NEWS:

A Final Farewell To President Ford (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0110526

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 2 — In a soaring tribute to a modest man, Gerald R. Ford was remembered on Tuesday as bringing the ordinary virtues of decency, integrity and humility to mend a broken government after the pain of war and scandal.

Gerald R. Ford was remembered at his funeral Tuesday in Washington as bringing decency, integrity and humility to government. Betty Ford, lower left, was escorted by President Bush as three former presidents, George Bush, Bill Clinton and Jimmy Carter, looked on. Pages A14-15.

"Amid all the turmoil, Gerald Ford was a rock of stability," President Bush told the gathering of generations of Washington's powerful at Washington National Cathedral. "And when he put his hand on his family Bible to take the presidential oath of office, he brought grace to a moment of great doubt."

The cathedral's grand setting and the pomp of a state funeral provided a counterpoint for the unassuming character praised by the eulogists.

President Bush's father called Mr. Ford "a Norman Rockwell painting come to life"; Tom Brokaw, the former television anchor, described "Citizen Ford" as a "champion of Main Street values"; and Henry A. Kissinger said the man he served as secretary of state "had the virtues of small-town America."

When the cathedral's limestone arches echoed, it was with the drums and brass of Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man," and the ushers directing the capacity crowd of 3,700 to their seats were uniformed Boy Scouts, a tribute to Mr. Ford's youthful achievement of the rank of Eagle Scout. Among the hymns was "Eternal Father, Strong to Save," known as the Navy Hymn, a particular favorite of Mr. Ford, who served in the Pacific during World War II.

President Bush, overseeing a deeply unpopular war in Iraq and perhaps pondering his own legacy, lauded Mr. Ford's "firm resolve" in sending the Marines to rescue the crew of the American merchant ship Mayagüez when it was seized by Cambodia. He suggested that some acts widely condemned during Mr. Ford's administration in the 1970s had come to look wiser in historical perspective, including his pardon for his immediate predecessor, Richard M. Nixon.

In addition, Mr. Bush noted that Mr. Ford was criticized for signing the Helsinki Accords, the 1975 agreement that ratified borders in Soviet-dominated Eastern Europe while also setting new standards for human rights.

"History has shown that document helped bring down the Soviet Union as courageous men and women behind the Iron Curtain used it to demand their God-given liberties," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Ford's coffin arrived at the cathedral by motorcade from the Capitol, a final journey through the city where he served as 13-term congressman, vice president and finally president, the only person to hold the nation's top two offices without being elected to either.

After the 90-minute Episcopal funeral service, Mr. Ford's body was flown from Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington to his hometown, Grand Rapids, Mich., for a burial service on Wednesday in a plot beside the museum that bears his name.

In Washington, the Gothic cathedral where Mr. Ford helped dedicate the nave in 1976, became for the morning a crossroads of the capital's past and present, with Supreme Court justices and members of Congress in the south transept facing scores of foreign ambassadors and former foreign leaders in the north transept.

Across an aisle from the diplomats sat Mr. Ford's honorary pallbearers, including in the front row Mr. Kissinger; Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served as defense secretary to both Mr. Ford and the current President Bush; Alan Greenspan, the former Federal Reserve chief who was Mr. Ford's top economic adviser; James A. Baker III, who ran Mr. Ford's unsuccessful 1976 campaign for president; and Brent Scowcroft, Mr. Ford's national security adviser.

Facing the altar, where Mr. Ford's coffin, draped by a flag, sat, were Mr. Ford's widow, Betty, who was escorted in and out of the cathedral by President Bush, and the Ford children, Steve, Jack, Mike and Susan.

Across the nave from the Ford family sat President Bush and Laura Bush, and Vice President Dick Cheney, who served Mr. Ford as chief of staff, with his wife, Lynne; several current cabinet members and three former presidents — the elder Mr. Bush with his wife, Barbara; Jimmy Carter and his wife, Rosalynn; and Bill Clinton and his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, and their daughter, Chelsea. With them was Nancy Reagan, the former first lady.

Like much of the outpouring of affection for Mr. Ford since he died at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif., on Dec. 26 at the age of 93, the service focused on what President Bush called the "calm and healing" the former president brought to "one of the most divisive moments in our nation's history." Mr. Ford, the House minority leader, succeeded first Vice President Spiro T. Agnew and then President Nixon after both men were forced from office by scandal.

"Gerald Ford brought to the political arena no demons, no hidden agenda, no hit list or acts of vengeance," said Mr. Brokaw, who explained that Mr. Ford had asked him to address the funeral as a representative of the press corps. "He knew who he was, and he didn't require consultants or gurus to change him."

Mr. Kissinger in particular emphasized the substantive achievements of Mr. Ford in foreign policy, saying the "deserved commentary" on Mr. Ford's character "has sometimes obscured how sweeping and lasting were his achievements." In remarks perhaps intended to reflect on his own record as well as Mr. Ford's, he credited the former president with keeping ethnic conflicts in Cyprus and Lebanon from spiraling out of control, producing the first peace agreement between Israel and Egypt and presiding over "the final agony of Indochina with dignity and wisdom."

Historians, Mr. Kissinger added, will find "that the cold war could not have been won had not Gerald Ford emerged at a tragic period to restore equilibrium to America and confidence in its international role."

A few hours after the service, the plane carrying Mr. Ford's body circled over the University of Michigan football stadium, where he had been a standout center and linebacker, then landed at the airport named for him in Grand Rapids. The university's marching band, which arrived on a red-eye flight from California after the Rose Bowl game on Monday, solemnly played its fight song, "The Victors."

About 200 friends and local dignitaries invited by Mr. Ford's family attended the brief ceremony before the 13-mile motorcade to his presidential museum in downtown Grand Rapids, passing thousands of residents who lined the streets, some holding signs that said "Welcome home." Billboards around the city declared "Gerald 'Our' Ford: 1913-2006."

Despite a fierce, bitter wind blowing off the Grand River, Tim Micho waited with his video camera and 7-year-old daughter, Tessa, for two and a half hours to watch the motorcade pass by.

"She'll probably never get to see something like this again," Mr. Micho, 43, said. "It's so moving to see this many people out here to support him."

A single bagpiper played "Amazing Grace" as Betty Ford and the rest of the family made their way slowly behind the coffin into the museum, a geometric, glassy structure along the water. Inside, they held a brief service for family and honored guests, including former President Carter.

Like many along the streets in Grand Rapids, Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm spoke of Mr. Ford's deep roots in the region.

Here, Ms. Granholm said, Mr. Ford had learned from his family "some good Midwestern values like hard work and sportsmanship and integrity and honesty." Here, he had played high school football (with a few men, now frail, in attendance on Tuesday), had married and had been elected to Congress.

"Welcome home," Ms. Granholm said, "to the people that you reflected so well when you were in Washington."

Country Honors Ford (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The last hurrahs of the nation's capital rang out Tuesday for Gerald R. Ford, honoring a common man with uncommon decency and humility who ran a brief but consequential presidency at a time of great political turmoil.

Eulogists from President Bush to former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger praised the nation's 38th president for using old-fashioned Midwestern qualities to cool the nation's Watergate passions.

But in their laudatory remarks at Washington's National Cathedral, there also appeared to be an undercurrent of unspoken regret that such values have become rarer in America's politics. Indeed, analysts have criticized a higher degree of nastiness and lack of authenticity in today's politics.

"Gerald Ford assumed the presidency when the nation needed a leader of character and humility, and we found it in the man from Grand Rapids," President Bush said in his eulogy, also citing Ford's "courage and common sense."

The president's father, former President George H.W. Bush, said: "As Americans, we generally eschew notions of the indispensable man, and yet during those traumatic times, few if any of our public leaders could have stepped into the breach and rekindled our national faith as did President Gerald R. Ford."

In some respects, Ford was different because he was an anomaly in the White House. He rose to power in Congress, where compromise is a way of life, and never aspired to be president. Only through the resignations of Vice President Spiro Agnew and then President Richard Nixon was he thrust into the office in 1974 during the middle of the Watergate scandal.

Former NBC television anchor Tom Brokaw said Ford came to office with "no demons, no hidden agendas, no hit lists, no acts of vengeance" that he implied other presidents might have had. Brokaw said Ford knew who he was and didn't require consultants or gurus to change him. And, he called Ford "the most underestimated" president.

The senior Bush added, "To know Jerry was to know a Norman Rockwell painting come to life, an avuncular figure quick to smile, frequently with his pipe in his mouth."

The comments weren't always this kind when Ford was in office. There were questions about his qualifications, his intelligence and his inability to appear "presidential"—that is, imperialistic or official or regal. And, on television, he was lampooned for being a stumbler.

Yet, on this day, he was honored as a man with many achievements not generally recognized at the time, a man who presided over the end of the Vietnam era and played a big role in the international arena. The president had declared a national day of mourning. The government and the financial markets were closed.

Kissinger cited a number of Ford foreign-policy initiatives, including in the Middle East and in adoption of an international human-rights standard that he said helped bring about the demise of the former Soviet Union.

"Few [historians] will dispute that the Cold War could not have been won had not Gerald Ford emerged at a tragic period to restore equilibrium to America and confidence in its international role," Kissinger said.

The sun was bright but the wind was stiff as official Washington—and former Washington officials—paid their last tribute to Ford, who died a week ago Tuesday at the age of 93. Later in the day, his body was flown to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich., where he will be buried on Wednesday.

Tuesday's ceremony had some of the same pomp and circumstance common to state funerals of other fallen heads of state, but the Ford family—true to the late president's wishes—had trimmed some of the more elaborate touches here in Washington, such as a horse-drawn carriage and a military fly-over.

Clinton, sitting next to his wife Hillary, now a senator and likely presidential candidate, could be seen wiping away a tear during the ceremony.

Though there were many young people in the audience, the crowd included many political figures that Ford either appointed or influenced in their careers—Vice President Dick Cheney, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, former Secretary of State James Baker, and former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan.

For the most part it was a solemn service, but President Bush's father added a touch of humor that brought laughter to the audience, including Mrs. Ford and her family.

The senior Bush said he and Ford shared a love for golf and that Ford's play was suspect. Bush reported that Ford told friends that "I know I'm playing better golf because I'm hitting fewer spectators."

Bush said that Ford could laugh at those who mimicked him, and then added: "I remember that lesson well, since being able to laugh at yourself is essential in public life. I'd tell you more about that, but as [comedian and Bush mimic] Dana Carvey would say, 'Not gonna do it. Wouldn't be prudent.'"

At the ceremony, Ford's son, Jack, and his daughter, Susan Ford Bales, read scriptures from the Bible. It was a traditional Christian funeral with music provided by military bands and, in one case, by opera star Denyce Graves, who sang "The Lord's Prayer."

DOJ_NMG_0110529

Ford's body was brought to Washington on Saturday from California, and there was a service Saturday night in the Capitol Rotunda. Thousands visited the Capitol to view the coffin over the holiday weekend.

On the way to the cathedral, the motorcade rolled down Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House, and then it passed by the vice president's residence on Massachusetts Avenue a short distance away.

It was a long Washington farewell for the man from Michigan. As he closed his eulogy, Brokaw said: "Farewell, Mr. President. Thank you, citizen Ford."

In State Funeral, A Farewell To Ford (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Gerald Rudolph Ford, the Boy Scout, football star and congressman thrust by history rather than ambition into the presidency at a fateful moment for his nation, was bidden farewell by Washington in a regal state funeral yesterday and taken home to Michigan for burial.

As cannons boomed and bells pealed and 10,650 organ pipes echoed through the cavernous Washington National Cathedral, Ford received a sendoff he could hardly have imagined as a young Midwestern boy abandoned by his father shortly after birth 93 years ago. A "Norman Rockwell painting come to life," as one successor put it, Ford was honored as a man of little pretense whose impact extended beyond his 895 days in office.

"Gerald Ford assumed the presidency when the nation needed a leader of character and humility, and we found it in the man from Grand Rapids," President Bush told 3,772 heads of state, justices, lawmakers, military officers, Cabinet secretaries, diplomats and other mourners. "President Ford's time in office was brief, but history will long remember the courage and common sense that helped restore trust in the workings of our democracy."

Betty Ford, 88, endured the fifth straight day of official ceremony with grief playing out on her face, and yet the former first lady never lost her composure and even smiled wistfully as Bush recounted funny stories from the early days of her 58-year marriage. She and her family then headed to Andrews Air Force Base, boarded one of the presidential jets that serve as Air Force One and took her husband's body to Grand Rapids, Mich., where it will be interred today in a hillside tomb at his presidential museum as 21 aircraft fly overhead in a missing-man formation.

The day's events brought together all four living presidents and leaders of both parties for Washington's second state funeral in 2 1/2 years. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) shook hands and sat behind outgoing Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), while former presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush cheerfully renewed their friendship. But as Democrats assume control of Congress tomorrow, the bipartisanship that many extolled in Ford appears little more than a testimonial to the past. Just minutes before Ford's casket was brought into the cathedral, the office of House Republican leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) e-mailed reporters a statement assailing Democrats for being partisan in their plans for the new Congress.

Ford knew what it was like to be in the minority. A lawyer who served in the Navy during World War II, the Republican was elected to the House in 1948 and over the course of a quarter-century rose to be minority leader in a chamber long dominated by Democrats. His greatest aspiration was to be speaker, but his fate changed when his party was engulfed by scandal.

President Richard M. Nixon appointed him vice president in 1973 to replace Spiro T. Agnew, who was forced from office by corruption allegations, and then on Aug. 9, 1974, Ford succeeded Nixon, who was forced from office by Watergate. In the process, Ford became the first commander in chief never to have been elected president or vice president.

His pardon of Nixon for any crimes he may have committed became Ford's signature decision, one that may have cost him the 1976 election but over time has come to be seen as an act of statesmanship that saved the nation the wrenching ordeal of putting a former president on trial. Ford's eventful presidency also saw the ignominious end of the Vietnam War, a stubborn recession at home, a Middle East cease-fire, a daring raid to rescue a merchant marine crew captured by Cambodians, and treaties with the Soviet Union.

"In recent days, the deserved commentary on Gerald Ford's character has sometimes obscured how sweeping and lasting were his achievements," former secretary of state Henry A. Kissinger said in a eulogy at the cathedral.

The state funeral was a classic Washington affair, soaked in power and pageantry even if not quite as elaborate as the one held for Ronald Reagan in June 2004. For two hours before it began, many of the men and women who have run the country for the past three decades flowed into the vaulted cathedral.

Boy Scouts stood at strategic points holding up signs reading "SS" and "Green" to indicate sections where guests were supposed to sit, according to a peculiar Washington hierarchy that distinguishes between political rock stars and the merely powerful. The south transept was for congressional leaders and Supreme Court justices, including John Paul Stevens, the oldest member of the court and Ford's only appointee. The north transept was for the diplomatic corps and the honorary pallbearers.

In front of the altar sat the honored guests: the Ford family and the former presidents. Before the service began, Jimmy Carter, sitting in the front row with his wife, Rosalynn, leaned back over his chair to chat with Clinton, as Chelsea Clinton talked with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. When the elder Bushes arrived, Barbara headed straight to her seat, while the 41st president stopped to shake hands with former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres.

As Carter, Clinton and the elder Bush greeted one another, it served as a reminder that the world's most exclusive club has shrunk considerably in the past few years. Nancy Reagan, last at the cathedral to memorialize her own husband, arrived wearing dark glasses. When former NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw forgot to mention her as he greeted the first families in his eulogy, she whispered to Rosalynn Carter, then made a slight, sardonic wave in Brokaw's direction.

Ford's Washington farewell began at the Capitol, where his casket lay in state over the weekend. About 36,000 people came through the Rotunda to pay respects, a considerable showing but a fraction of the estimated 200,000 who showed up for Reagan. The casket, initially brought to the House doors to remember his time there, was moved yesterday morning to the Senate doors to mark his service as vice president and Senate president.

Draped in a flag and borne aloft by a nine-man military honor guard, the casket left the Capitol to a 21-gun salute, and the motorcade paused by the White House en route to the cathedral, where it was welcomed to the strains of "Hail to the Chief." As the organ played "America, the Beautiful," President Bush escorted Betty Ford down the center aisle, her eyes focused forward, never glancing at the crowd.

She stood in the front row amid her children, Susan, Jack, Michael and Steven, as the honorary pallbearers entered, including Vice President Cheney, former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, former national security adviser Brent Scowcroft, former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, all Ford administration veterans. The honor guard brought in the casket and lay it on a catafalque before the pulpit.

Jack Ford recited a passage from Isaiah and Susan Ford Bales from James. Her voice quavered a bit as she read. The elder Bush lightened the atmosphere, telling stories illustrating the former president's less serious side. Ford, he said, understood the value of laughing at himself. Bush said he could elaborate but would not, then imitated comedian Dana Carvey imitating Bush: "Not gonna do it. Wouldn't be prudent."

Brokaw likewise mixed seriousness and humor, joking that some of Ford's 1970s-era jackets should be "eligible for a presidential pardon." But he praised him as "the most underestimated" president. "Gerald Ford brought to the political arena no demons, no hidden agenda, no hit list or acts of vengeance," Brokaw said. As he finished, he turned to the casket: "Farewell, Mr. President. Thank you, Citizen Ford."

In his homily, Ford's pastor from California, the Rev. Robert G. Certain, recalled that the former president shortly before his death raised with him the subject of the Episcopal Church schism over the consecration of a gay bishop and the blessings of same-sex unions. "He said that he did not think they should be divisive for anyone who lived by the great commandments and the great commission to love God and to love neighbor," Certain said.

After two hours, the casket was brought out of the cathedral and the bourdon bell tolled 38 times for the 38th president as the cortege made its way to Andrews for the final trip home. Accompanying the family was Jimmy Carter, who defeated Ford in 1976 but later grew to be a close friend. At Ford's request, Carter will speak at today's service.

In contrast to the Washington pomp, Ford's return to Grand Rapids took place on a more personal scale. The casket was greeted at Gerald R. Ford International Airport by the marching band from the University of Michigan, where Ford was a football star, playing the school's rousing fight song.

As thousands of Michigan residents lined the streets near the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum on a cold, windy afternoon, a sign in Beaner's Coffee read, "Gerald Our Ford." Outside the Gerald R. Ford Federal Building, a young fan wore a Michigan football jersey and draped a school flag over his shoulders in Ford's honor. Dozens of Boy Scouts from the Gerald R. Ford Council saluted as the hearse passed. Lines snaked out of the museum, where his casket was set for an all-night viewing.

"Michigan's president," he was called by the state's Democratic governor, Jennifer Granholm. A man of intellect and achievement, she said, "in a plain brown wrapper."

'Sincere' Ford Honored (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

The humble yet extraordinary life of Gerald R. Ford was heralded yesterday in a solemn and sometimes humorous service at the National Cathedral that brought together four presidents, dozens of Cabinet secretaries and lawmakers and some of the former president's friendly foes members of the Washington press corps.

With 3,000 mourners packed into the massive church, and strains of "Fanfare for the Common Man" still wafting in the air, eight U.S. service members carried a flag-draped casket down the long aisle, their crisp steps echoing in the silent nave. Betty Ford, 88, and her children, along with Ford grandchildren and great-grandchildren, looked on as the body of Mr. Ford, who died Dec. 26 at 93, passed by.

Throughout the 90-minute service, speakers praised the humility and constancy of the former president, who once said his lifelong ambition was to become speaker of the House, not president.

"When he thought that the nation needed to put Watergate behind us, he made the tough and decent decision to pardon President Nixon, even though that decision probably cost him the presidential election," President Bush said in his eulogy.

"In President Ford, the world saw the best of America, and America found a man whose character and leadership would bring calm and healing to one of the most divisive moments in our nation's history."

Other speakers recalled Mr. Ford's "sincerity, serenity and integrity," as former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger put it, but each returned to the theme that the humble Midwesterner nearly single-handedly saved the presidency by pardoning Mr. Nixon a month after he took office to end what he called "our national nightmare."

Former President George Bush said that just the swearing-in of Mr. Ford as president "instantly restored the honor of the Oval Office and helped America begin to turn the page on one of our saddest chapters."

"Jerry Ford's decency was the ideal remedy for the deception of Watergate. For this and for so much more, his presidency will be remembered as a time of healing in our land," the elder Mr. Bush said.

In his eulogy, Mr. Kissinger, who served under Mr. Ford, countered the notion that the man who held the office for just 29 months served only as a caretaker president with no real achievements in office. Mr. Kissinger said Mr. Ford quelled violence in Cyprus and Lebanon, presided stoically over the end of the Vietnam War and played a key role in the Cold War that ended 15 years after his presidency.

"Historians will debate for a long time over which president contributed most to victory in the Cold War. Few will dispute that the Cold War could not have been won had not Gerald Ford emerged at a tragic period to restore equilibrium to America and confidence in its international role," Mr. Kissinger said.

Mrs. Ford, who was married to the former president for 58 years, kept her eyes closed through most of the service, which included biblical readings, performances by the Armed Forces Chorus and the U.S. Marine Orchestra, and a homily by the Rev. Robert Certain, the rector at the Fords' California parish.

Former Presidents Jimmy Carter, who defeated Mr. Ford in the 1976 election, and Bill Clinton did not speak at the funeral. But former NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw was asked last year by Mr. Ford to deliver a eulogy. The newsman said the White House changed the day Mr. Nixon left.

"In Gerald Ford, the man he was in public, he was also that man in private. Gerald Ford brought to the political arena no demons, no hidden agenda, no hit list or acts of vengeance," Mr. Brokaw said. "We could be adversaries, but we were never his enemy, and that was a welcomed change in status from his predecessor's time."

In the crowd, reporter Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, whose coverage of the Watergate scandal helped bring down Mr. Nixon's presidency, nodded as, nearby, Sam Donaldson, former White House correspondent for ABC News, looked on.

In a moment of levity, Mr. Brokaw noted that Mr. Ford had the unfortunate fate to be president in the 1970s, when "we were all trapped in what passed for style with lapels out to here, white belts, plaid jackets."

"The rest of us have been able to destroy most of the evidence of our fashion meltdown, but presidents are not so lucky. Some of those jackets I think that they're eligible for a presidential pardon, or at least a digital touch-up," he said to laughter.

The elder Mr. Bush, 82, also broke up the crowd when he observed that Mr. Ford, a college football standout and avid sportsman, was parodied as a stumbling buffoon, especially by "Saturday Night Live" star Chevy Chase.

"On the lighter side, Jerry and I shared a common love of golf and also a reputation for suspect play before large crowds. 'I know I'm playing better golf,' President Ford once reported to friends, 'because I'm hitting fewer spectators,'" he said.

Among the attendees at yesterday's service were former Secretaries of State Colin L. Powell and James A. Baker III, former Vice President Al Gore, Supreme Court Justices John G. Roberts Jr. and Clarence Thomas, Nancy Reagan who mourned her husband, Ronald, at the cathedral in 2004 and former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Vice President Dick Cheney, who was Mr. Ford's chief of staff, was one of the honorary pallbearers and, at the end of the ceremony, walked alone behind the casket as the service members carried it out of the cathedral.

Former Defense Secretary and Ford Chief of Staff Donald H. Rumsfeld and Bob Dole, Mr. Ford's 1976 running mate, also were in attendance.

Mr. Ford was the only former Eagle Scout to become president. Decorated Eagle Scouts served as ushers at the funeral.

The cathedral bells that had tolled 38 times as the 38th president's cortege arrived on a brisk day were silent as his hearse pulled away, en route to Andrews Air Force Base. Along the route, spectators stood by the road, some waving flags, others with their hands on their hearts, one woman holding a sign that said simply "Thank You."

At the base, the casket was lifted aboard a presidential Boeing 747 amid the strains of "Going Home" and flown to Grand Rapids, Mich., Mr. Ford's final resting place. The marching band from the University of Michigan his alma mater, where he played center on the football team that twice won national championships greeted the plane, which carried members of his family and others in the funeral party, including Mr. Carter and his wife, Rosalynn.

In Grand Rapids, which the Nebraska-born Mr. Ford adopted as his hometown and represented in Congress for a quarter century, Mr. Ford's presidential museum was opening its doors for an 18-hour public viewing, stretching overnight, before his burial this afternoon.

Former President Ford Remembered For His Decency (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON - Washington's political elite and ordinary citizens said goodbye to Gerald R. Ford on Tuesday at a final state funeral at Washington National Cathedral, fondly remembering the 38th president as a common man who guided the country through the uncommon times of Watergate and the end of the Vietnam War.

The service at the majestic cathedral highlighted a day of pageantry and poignancy, in which Washington's old guard, three former presidents and a host of foreign luminaries assembled to pay tribute to the humble Midwesterner who aspired to be speaker of the House of Representatives but wound up occupying the Oval Office instead.

"In President Ford, the world saw the best of America, and America found a man whose character and leadership would bring calm and healing to one of the most divisive moments in our nation's history," President Bush told the 3,000 invitation-only mourners who packed the hilltop cathedral.

Eulogizing Ford, the current and former Presidents Bush and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger spoke of a good man whose word was solid, whose politics were principled and whose heart was devoid of lust for power.

"In his understated way he did his duty as a leader, not as a performer playing to the gallery," Kissinger said. "Gerald Ford had the virtues of small-town America: sincerity, serenity and integrity."

Former President George H.W. Bush recalled Ford as "a Norman Rockwell painting come to life, an avuncular figure quick to smile, frequently with a pipe in his mouth," and someone with "a heart as big and open as the Midwest plains on which he was born."

He was one of several speakers who suggested that Ford's unassuming manner may have resulted in his being underappreciated, if not an underrated president. The elder Bush equated Ford's leadership after Richard Nixon's Watergate resignation as one of history's great presidential moments.

"History has a way of meshing man and moment," he said. "Just as President Lincoln's stubborn devotion to our Constitution kept the union together during the Civil War, and just as FDR's optimism was the perfect answer to the despair of the Great Depression, so, too, can we say that Jerry Ford's decency was the ideal remedy for the deception of Watergate."

Kissinger noted that Ford left office with a thick portfolio of international accomplishments, including the first political agreement between Israel and Egypt, helping to keep ethnic conflicts in Cyprus and Lebanon from igniting into a regional war and helping to establish the modern human-rights movement by backing the Helsinki Accords of 1975.

At the time, Ronald Reagan and other conservatives criticized that agreement as a land giveaway to the Soviet Union, despite a provision forcing Moscow to recognize human and religious rights.

"History has shown that it helped bring down the Soviet Union, as courageous men and women behind the Iron Curtain used it to demand their God-given liberties," the current President Bush said.

The elder Bush lightened the solemn service by recalling Ford's sense of humor and his approval of comedian Chevy Chase's stumbling, bumbling imitation of him on NBC's "Saturday Night Live," even though Ford was, in fact, a superb athlete.

Bush said Ford taught him to laugh at himself. The former president wanted to tell more but, breaking into an imitation of "Saturday Night Live" alum Dana Carvey imitating him, said, "Na gonna do it. Wouldn't be prudent."

If Ford was underappreciated in life, he's been viewed with reverence and purpose since his passing Dec. 26 at age 93. Thousands lined up to view his flag-draped casket as it lay in state at the Capitol Rotunda over the weekend.

In a solemn ceremony Tuesday, the casket was moved from the Capitol to a hearse as Army gunners fired a 21-gun salute and a military band played "Hail to the Chief." A slow motorcade left the Capitol and made a brief pass by the White House, which Ford occupied from Aug. 9, 1974, to Jan. 20, 1977.

The Right Rev. John Bryson Chane, the Episcopal bishop of Washington, greeted Ford's casket at the cathedral steps and said a prayer over it.

Inside, President Bush escorted a frail but stoic widow Betty Ford down the long central aisle to the front pew, which housed the rest of the Ford family.

All three living former presidents - the elder Bush, Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton - attended the service, as did three former secretaries of state: Kissinger, Colin Powell and James A. Baker III. Former Republican New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y. - each a possible presidential candidate - also attended.

Former Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., who was Ford's vice-presidential running mate in 1976, served as an honorary pallbearer, along with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Vice President Dick Cheney, former National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft and members of Ford's Cabinet.

After the service, Ford's body was flown aboard a presidential 747 to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he was raised. His remains were moved to the Gerald Ford Presidential Museum, where they were to lie in repose for public viewing until Wednesday.

A private family funeral is scheduled for Wednesday, followed by private burial at the Ford museum.

Nation Honors Gerald R. Ford (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writers

WASHINGTON — The nation's capital bade a stately farewell today to Gerald Rudolph Ford, the nation's 38th president, at a formal state funeral where he was lauded by the current president as "a good and decent man" whose affability cloaked a "firm resolve."

"Gerald Ford assumed the presidency when the nation needed a leader of character and humility, and we found it in the man from Grand Rapids," President Bush told the august crowd in Washington's National Cathedral, gilded by former presidents and first ladies and serenaded by a half-dozen choirs and orchestras.

"President Ford's time in office was brief," Bush said, "but history will long remember the courage and common sense that helped restore trust in the workings of our democracy."

The funeral culminated four days of ceremonies in Washington that reflected the character and career of the man: the earnest Midwestern House member, the high-minded congressional leader and the accidental president who led the country through one of its most turbulent periods.

"History has a way of matching man and moment," said former President George H.W. Bush, comparing Ford to other presidents who ruled in dark times. "And just as President Lincoln's stubborn devotion to our Constitution kept the union together during the Civil War, and just as FDR's optimism was the perfect antidote to the despair of the Great Depression, so too can we say that Jerry Ford's decency was the ideal remedy for the deception of Watergate."

After the services at Washington's imposing National Cathedral, Ford's body was flown aboard Air Force One to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich., where his presidential library is located and where he will be buried Wednesday.

It was the second presidential funeral in less than three years for the nation's capital, which pulled out all the stops for a regal sendoff for Ronald Reagan in 2004.

By contrast, while Ford's funeral had all the military trappings accorded a former commander-in-chief — multiple 21-gun salutes, honor guards, military choruses — there were also notes of the ordinary. Ford's children greeted members of the public who came to pay their respects as their father lay in state in the Capitol Rotunda. Ford's casket was carried from the Capitol to the cathedral in a conventional hearse instead of a horse-drawn caisson. At Andrews Air Force Base, a troop of Boy Scouts, one in blue jeans, saluted to say goodbye.

And when Ford's casket was unloaded in Michigan, the marching band from the University of Michigan — where he had been a star football player — struck up a somber version of the Michigan fight song. As president, Ford had preferred that tune to the usual fanfare of "Hail to the Chief."

Former NBC anchorman Tom Brokaw, whom Ford had asked to deliver his eulogy, praised him for bringing "Main Street values" to the White House.

"Once there, he stayed true to form, never believing that he was suddenly wise and infallible because he drank his morning coffee from a cup with the presidential seal," Brokaw said.

The funeral for a transitional president came during another time of transition in the nation's capital, as political leaders prepared for this week's transfer of congressional power from Republicans to Democrats.

Ford's Funeral Draws Array Of Politicians And Dignitaries (NYT)

By RACHEL L. SWARNS

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 2 — Scores of politicians and dignitaries from across the political spectrum poured into Washington National Cathedral on a clear and blustery Tuesday to mourn President Gerald R. Ford at his funeral service here.

Skip to next paragraph President Bush, who escorted Mr. Ford's widow, Betty, into the church, addressed the invited guests. Three former presidents — Bill Clinton, George Bush and Jimmy Carter — also came to pay their final respects, accompanied by their wives, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York; Barbara Bush; and Rosalynn Carter. Nancy Reagan, the widow of President Ronald Reagan, whose funeral was held in the cathedral in 2004, also attended the service.

The mourners included Shimon Peres, the former Israeli prime minister, and several members of Congress, including Representatives Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming House speaker, and J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the outgoing speaker. John G. Roberts Jr., the chief justice of the United States, took his seat in the cavernous cathedral as did Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York City. Adrian M. Fenty, who was sworn in as mayor of Washington on Tuesday morning, also attended.

For many former Ford administration officials, the service was a somber reunion. The honorary pallbearers included Vice President Dick Cheney and Donald H. Rumsfeld, former defense secretary, who both served as chief of staff to Mr. Ford; Henry A. Kissinger, former secretary of state; Brent Scowcroft, former national security adviser; and Alan Greenspan, who led Mr. Ford's council of economic advisers years before he became chairman of the Federal Reserve.

The prominent guests included:

BUSH ADMINISTRATION OFFICIALS Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates; Secretary of the Treasury Henry M. Paulson Jr.; Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency; Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; and Robert S. Mueller III, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

SUPREME COURT JUSTICES Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Anthony M. Kennedy, John Paul Stevens and Clarence Thomas.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS Senators Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts; Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona; Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan; Richard G. Lugar, Republican of Indiana; Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania; and Representatives Steny H. Hoyer, incoming House majority leader and Democrat of Maryland; and John A. Boehner, incoming House minority leader and Republican of Ohio.

EX-LAWMAKERS George Allen, former senator, Republican of Virginia; Newt Gingrich, former Republican House speaker; Alan K. Simpson, former senator, Republican of Wyoming; and Fred Thompson, former senator, Republican of Tennessee.

EX-WHITE HOUSE OFFICIALS Colin L. Powell, former secretary of state; John R. Bolton, former United States ambassador to the United Nations; Madeleine K. Albright, former secretary of state; and Dan Quayle, former vice president.

OTHER DIGNITARIES Rudolph W. Giuliani, former mayor of New York; Vernon E. Jordan Jr., Washington lawyer and prominent Democrat; and Anthony A. Williams, former mayor of Washington.

Congress Says Goodbye To The Late President Gerald R. Ford (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich And Kelly Mccormack

Capitol Hill's memorial ceremonies for former President Gerald Ford ended yesterday as members of his family and many of Washington's elite silently watched his flag-draped casket being carried down the Senate steps.

Under clear skies on a cold, bright day, eight members of the honor guard slowly carried the coffin to the hearse down a line of official mourners, including Vice President Dick Cheney, former Secretaries of State James Baker and Henry Kissinger, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.).

Betty Ford and other family members huddled together against the wind, which whipped around the Capitol.

Before Ford's coffin was driven from Capitol Hill to the National Cathedral, the former president was given a 21-gun salute and the military band played "Hail to the Chief."

After the memorial service at the cathedral, Ford's body was driven to Andrews Air Force Base and then flown to Michigan for further ceremonies.

Ford's coffin had been on display to the public since Saturday evening after a ceremony in the Capitol Rotunda. The casket had arrived on Saturday to the sound of an artillery salute that sent slight tremors through building. The United States Army Band played "The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

Saturday's service was interrupted briefly when former Michigan Rep. William Broomfield (R) collapsed. He was treated by outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and the attending physician, and transported to George Washington Medical Center.

Outgoing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and Cheney recalled Ford in speeches at the service.

"In judgment, he was sober and serious, unafraid of decisions … calm and steady by nature … always the still point in the turning wheel," said Cheney, who served as Ford's chief of staff in the White House. "He answered courtesy with courtesy; he answered discourtesy with courtesy."

Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.), talking to reporters, choked up as he recalled his interactions with the former president, whose congressional seat he now holds.

"He was exactly what we needed at the time of Watergate," Ehlers said. "People finally are starting to realize what he did for this country."

Ford represented his Michigan district for nearly 25 years, and for eight of them was minority leader, before being chosen by President Richard Nixon to replaced Vice President Spiro Agnew in 1973. The following year, in the aftermath of the Watergate scandal, Ford became president under the 25th Amendment to the Constitution.

Throughout his tenure in the House, Ford was well-liked and respected on both sides of the aisle. He "quickly became popular" because of his "positive outlook," according the House Historian's Office. "He was mostly soft-spoken, modest, and, as he described himself to be, 'a moderate in domestic affairs, an internationalist in foreign affairs and a conservative in fiscal policy.'"

Though he was asked to run for Senate and governor of Michigan in the 1950s, Ford declined because "his true ambition was to someday become Speaker of the House," the House Historian's Office said.

In 1961 Ford became ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee's Defense Subcommittee and received the special award of "Congressman's Congressman" for his work on military budgets, the House Historian's Office said. The same year, Ford defeated Rep. Charles Hoeven (R-Iowa) to become chairman of the House Republican Conference.

In 1965 Ford narrowly defeated Rep. Charles Halleck (R-Ind.) to become minority leader.

Incoming House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.), who served with Ford in the early 1970s, remembered him as "a very decent human being who helped make the institution work and recognized that [working across the aisle] would make the country a better place.

"He didn't think it was a mortal sin to pass legislation from the other side of the aisle."

Stained Glass And Strained Egos (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Washington

It was a scene that Mary McCarthy could have written the devil out of: a funeral for a fine, bland fellow that filled everybody with unfine, unbland thoughts. The formal serenity of the service, disguised, but only barely, the virulent rivalries and envies and grudges and grievances that have roiled this group for many decades.

None of the eulogists noted the irony that the man who ushered out one long national nightmare had ushered in another, the one we're living in now. It was Gerald Ford, after all, who gave America the gift of Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld — the gift that keeps on taking.

The two former Ford officials, who doomed Iraq to civil war and despoiled American values, were honorary pallbearers yesterday, as was that other slippery and solipsistic courtier, Henry Kissinger.

The Group was even more on edge because of a remarkable trellis of peppery opinions that had tumbled out of the man in the coffin, posthumously. The late president, hailed as the most understated and decent guy in the world, had given a series of interviews on the condition they be held until his death — a belated but bracing smackdown of many of his distinguished mourners.

It was impossible not to wonder what the luminaries were truly thinking, as they sat listening to fugues of Bach and Brahms and encomiums to the ordinary-guy leader.

Nancy Reagan's imperturbable expression behind her big square sunglasses did not disguise the gloating words visible in the bubble over her head: "And they call this a funeral?"

It could not compare, of course, to the incredible Princess of Wales treatment that her husband had for his state funeral. And Nancy, hypersensitive to any slights to her Ronnie, would not have been pleased with Mr. Ford's interview with Michael Beschloss published in Newsweek, in which he blamed Ronald Reagan for costing him the 1976 election by challenging his nomination and then failing to hit the trail for him.

It was good of Mr. Ford to bring 41 and 43 together in a solemn respite from their uneasy competition over Iraq.

"Told you so, you sons of guns — we were right to stop at Safwan and stay out of Baghdad," the father's bubble read, as he watched Rummy and Henry the K, both of whom had treated Poppy with such veiled contempt, as though he were a feather duster. "Those vicious Moktada-loving Shiites dancing around Saddam's dead body prove that Brent and I were right."

Lynne Cheney glared at Poppy as he gave his eulogy, knowing that he privately thinks that the vice president has destroyed not only Iraq and American foreign policy, but the Bush family name. Her storm cloud of a bubble is expurgated.

Hillary's bubble was full of mockery for another New Yorker in the National Cathedral: "You think you're so smart, Rudy, but you leave your entire presidential battle plan in a hotel room for your rivals to find? The victim role doesn't suit you." Condi's bubble was as opaquely dark as Hillary's was risibly light — drooping with the inchoate fear that her nearby erstwhile mentor, Brent Scowcroft, had been right about Iraq after all.

As Poppy spoke from the altar, praising Mr. Ford's generosity, he must have been mulling that his predecessor was ungenerous in spitting on him from the grave. Mr. Ford told Mr. Beschloss that Bush Sr. had sold out the party to the hard right and had taken a phony, pandering position on abortion.

Poppy had to have enjoyed watching Dr. K get up and lavish praise on his old boss, after Mr. Ford had sniggered to Bob Woodward that the "coy" Bavarian diva had "the thinnest skin of any public figure I ever knew."

W. graciously walked Betty Ford down the aisle, even as he must have curdled inside about her husband's telling Mr. Woodward that it had been "a big mistake" on the part of W., Dick Cheney and Rummy to justify the Iraq war with nonexistent W.M.D. "I just don't think we should go hellfire damnation around the globe freeing people, unless it is directly related to our own national security," he said.

Ex-presidents weren't supposed to criticize sitting presidents. Adding insult to injury, Woodward himself was in the cathedral. How did he manage to get all these deathbed confessions, W. had to wonder. "Jeez," his bubble read, "does he have an interview with my old man in the can?"

Rummy's pop-up was as cocky as ever: "Golly, I've been gone three weeks and things are really looking up in Iraq."

James Baker's secret thoughts were as bright as his tie: "I tried to help you out, son, but you're too dang stubborn. Or 'resolute.' Stubolute. A clear case of TMC — too much Cheney."

Dick Cheney's bubble was trouble: "I'm surging, I'm surging, I'm surging."

The Respectful Eyes Of America (WP)

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Television can still rise to the occasion when the occasion warrants.

Yesterday's coverage of the funeral of former president Gerald Ford found network correspondents and technicians on their best behavior for the most part, the solemn beauty of the ceremony at Washington National Cathedral virtually forcing them to exercise restraint and good taste.

What might be called TV's networks of record -- ABC, CBS, NBC and cable's CNN -- covered the proceedings from early morning, following the casket from the Capitol, down the Senate steps, along Pennsylvania Avenue, past the White House and then to the cathedral, where "eulogizers," as CBS's Katie Couric called them, paid tribute to the well-liked 38th president.

As the big and more established networks conveyed a kind of official aura, NBC's quirky cable outfit MSNBC offered more flavorful and colorful, but still respectful, coverage. Chris Matthews, anchoring with Keith Olbermann, at one point told viewers -- as cameras scanned the famous faces of those gathered in the cathedral -- "These are Washington people. For better or for worse, this is the Establishment you're looking at right here. This is the A-list of the people who run this city."

Matthews dares to say what other people are thinking but refrain from saying -- for better or for worse.

Couric and many of her colleagues on the big networks committed the common error of talking over scenes that did not require any talking -- or, to the contrary, called for quiet. When the choir and band performed "America" and other patriotic songs, Katie and crew kept up fairly constant chatter. Over on NBC at the same time, presidential historian Michael Beschloss unfortunately was directed to yak away, ignoring the music in the cathedral.

ABC anchor Charles Gibson showed the most tact and discretion, limiting his remarks to things viewers actually might need to know. Gibson, of course, has more authority and experience behind him as anchor and correspondent than either Couric or NBC's Brian Williams. Not that Williams lacked for intelligent comments; he just perhaps made too many of them.

Incredibly, CBS cut away from the ceremony in the cathedral to show viewers excerpts from an interview that President Ford had given correspondent Phil Jones -- in 1984! Ford, discussing widespread protests erupting in the country when he took office, said he hoped "voices were lowered" under of his calming influence. Bob Schieffer then quoted the "voices lowered" remark -- while the chorus and orchestra played "America the Beautiful."

All this talk of lowered voices could lead a viewer to talk back to the correspondents and anchors: "Lower yours, for heaven's sake."

Worst of all was an NBC commentator who interrupted the choir singing "America the Beautiful" to repeat a story he'd read in the New York Times -- about the Fords' dog having pooped on a White House carpet. "There are so many stories like that," the reporter said -- and so many more opportune times to tell them.

The CBS coverage was marred by a director's or producer's insistence on dividing the screen up in boxes, with a large amount of space taken up by "The Death of a President," the title CBS gave its coverage. The network seemed to be waving its own flag in viewers' faces, while ABC tried to keep its logo and other extraneous material to a minimum.

The pictures, after all, were beautiful as the sun poured down on the city. The honor guard, lined up in two columns on the Senate steps, cast dramatic, striking shadows in the early-morning light. Later, the cathedral looked regal and imposing in a master shot of it sitting on a high point in the city.

Throughout the coverage, anchors and reporters marveled at the poise and stamina of Betty Ford, the president's widow, who had been through hours and hours of memorial activities even before the trip from the Capitol to the cathedral began. She entered the cathedral on the arm of President Bush and then sat among, and seemed supported by, her children -- son Steven on one side and daughter Susan on the other. It was a moving portrait of family solidarity.

One realized what a tremendous impression the Fords had made on the country in spite of the fact that Ford was in office a relatively short time after Nixon's resignation.

Television was a presence at the event in more ways than one. Former president George H.W. Bush brought up the '70s lampooning of Ford on NBC's "Saturday Night Live," with Chevy Chase portraying him as physically bumbling even though Ford was, many commentators said, the most athletic president of his century.

Bush also did an impression of Dana Carvey doing an impression of him ("Not gonna do it, wouldn't be prudent"), a reminder of how influential "Saturday Night Live" has been in American pop culture. In the interest of propriety, though, it might have been better if the elder Bush had stuck to the topic of Ford and not mentioned his own experience with the show. He might also have mentioned that Ford took the ribbing so good-naturedly that he taped a "live from New York" opening in the Oval Office for use on the program.

The current president praised Ford for making an unpopular decision -- the pardon of Nixon -- and sticking to it. That was also a theme of Bush's most recent radio address. Some reporters saw it as Bush's thinly veiled attempt to compare his own unpopular pursuit of the Iraq war with Ford's action -- and a way of saying both men were courageously standing on principle.

The eulogy by former NBC anchor Tom Brokaw was not memorable. Brokaw said Ford asked him last year to be part of such a ceremony whenever it was held, although Brokaw said modestly that Ford made the request because "I think he wanted to be sure the White House press corps was represented" -- not because he thought Brokaw was a brilliant orator. Brokaw, who seemed to smirk throughout his remarks, ended with a banal "Farewell, Mr. President. Thank you, Citizen Ford."

Cameras kept panning the faces in the cathedral -- an auspicious assemblage that included former presidents Bill Clinton, Jimmy Carter and Bush and their first ladies. CBS relied too much on what might be called Coffin-Cam, long and steady shots of the flag-draped casket, which, after all, didn't do anything but sit there, as was to be expected. Viewers would rather have seen the faces of the famous and celebrated.

CBS coverage overall was disappointing, and ABC's was probably the best of the major networks.

On CNN, meanwhile, Wolf Blitzer took the strange step of interrupting the coverage to apologize for a goof made the previous day on his "Situation Room" show. According to a media-watchdog Web site, Blitzer said he "just wanted to make a correction" and continued: "We had a bad graphic. We were doing a piece on the hunt for Osama bin Laden in this new year, 2007. Unfortunately, instead of saying, 'Where is Osama?' it said, 'Where is Obama?' I'm going to be calling Sen. Barack Obama to make a personal apology."

Yes, you do that, Wolf.

If not all the speeches praising Ford were unusually eloquent, the music in the cathedral was. During the singing of "O God Our Help in Ages Past," a camera caught Betty Ford mouthing the word "beautiful" to her daughter. After the services, Matthews raved about Denyce Graves's singing of the Lord's Prayer. It was a breathtaking performance.

Chimes rang outside the cathedral, and Olbermann, Matthews's on-air partner, said gratuitously, "Ask not for whom the bell tolls." Matthews pronounced the ceremony "sublime" and said he thought President Bush's eulogy was better than his father's, an opinion not likely to be widely shared.

As Ford's body was taken to Andrews Air Force Base, the major broadcast networks signed off and rushed back to the cacophony of regularly scheduled commercial programming. Cable news networks stayed with the story.

It was a memorable morning, a national gathering by television, and a reminder that for all the talk about blogs and YouTube and MySpace, there are still moments and events that only the networks can adequately convey.

This, obviously, was one of them.

Widow, Children Face Grief Together (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — Her marriage was only three weeks old when she became a political wife. Fifty-eight years later, surrounded and strengthened by her family, former first lady Betty Ford performed one of her last official acts in that role.

Appearing fragile but stoic, Betty Ford, 88, blinked back tears and managed an occasional smile during a series of tributes Tuesday to her late husband, to her and to their enduring partnership.

President Bush said during an emotional memorial service at Washington National Cathedral that former president Gerald Ford was "still counting himself lucky to have Betty at his side."

Sitting between daughter Susan and son Steven at the cathedral, Betty Ford could be seen bowing her head or dabbing at her eyes with a handkerchief.

Before she headed to Grand Rapids, Mich., where the former president was to be buried, Betty seemed to break down briefly during a cannon salute at Andrews Air Force Base. Her military escort leaned over in concern and patted her arm.

The sisterhood of first ladies was out in force at the cathedral: Laura Bush, Barbara Bush, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Rosalind Carter, Nancy Reagan. Only Lady Bird Johnson was missing.

Betty Ford is known for going public with her battles against breast cancer and addictions to alcohol and prescription drugs.

Tom Brokaw, a television journalist who covered the Ford White House for NBC, praised the Fords for drawing attention to problems that needed it.

"Was there a more supportive husband in America than when his beloved Betty began to speak out on issues that were not politically correct at the time?" he asked during the memorial service.

Many scenes Tuesday showed the closeness of the Ford family: Betty's smile as Susan whispered in her ear, and her sons' care as they escorted her in and out of cars and buildings. In a windy morning chill, the children and grandchildren clustered around her, forming a human wall of comfort and warmth as they waited for the late president's casket to be carried down the U.S. Capitol steps.

Sheila Weidenfeld, Betty Ford's former press secretary, told MSNBC her ex-boss "understands exactly what her duty is. … She's always been somewhat fragile. To be outside at her age in the weather is not the easiest thing, but you'd never know it looking at her. She is doing what she knows she wants to do and what she must do."

It wasn't all grim duty. Betty Ford grinned when Brokaw recalled the fashion "meltdowns" of the 1970s — "trousers so patterned that they would give you a migraine" and jackets that should be "eligible for a presidential pardon."

Bush evoked general laughter when he described Gerald Ford's "idea of a honeymoon" — driving his bride to Ann Arbor the day after their wedding for brunch before a Michigan-Northwestern game.

Bush also quoted Ford's tribute to Betty on the day he took the presidential oath of office: "I am indebted to no man and only to one woman, my dear wife."

A Final Public Service By A Steadfast First Lady (WP)

By Neely Tucker

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Betty Ford, observed in these days of national mourning:

Frail. Determined. Quiet. Tired.

She was 88 and clearly exhausted.

She was resting on the arm of the president of the United States when she emerged from the darkness of Washington National Cathedral into the weak January sunlight yesterday, following her husband's coffin. She did not speak during the service, except to turn to her daughter, Susan, and mouth the word "beautiful" after a moving rendition of "O God, Our Help in Ages Past." She was surrounded by family, including her three sons.

She will bury her husband today on a hillside back home in Michigan.

Then, three decades after leaving the White House, she will finally be relieved of the duties of being first lady, a job that comes with no description but endless expectations. The final duty is burying one's husband under the glare of public attention. This has become a de facto job requirement in the past century, when first ladies began to routinely outlive their husbands.

"This is a very frail woman, and by God, she's in charge," says Dick Capen, a longtime family friend, a newspaper publisher and diplomat who visited with Betty Ford at the family's private service in Palm Desert, Calif. "You could see it in her face. She's 88 years old, and she wasn't going to sit down. She's an incredible lady."

"She's been great," says Melvin Laird, the former congressman and defense secretary, and a close family friend for nearly half a century, speaking by phone from his Florida home. "Jerry always worried about her, but she was the one who really took over, really watched out for him."

Though Betty Ford has spoken no public word since her husband died (her statement announcing his death was a written release) she has nonetheless had a public role to play. First ladies leave the White House, but they never leave the job. They become the public face of the nation's grieving when their spouses die. Their role blends public duty and private emotion, but the public is expected to hold sway.

"When I reflect upon my Washington career I wonder how I ever faced it," Grace Coolidge observed late in life, after burying her husband. "There was a sense of detachment. This was I, and yet not I -- this was the wife of the president and she took precedence over me; my personal likes and dislikes must be subordinated to the consideration of those things which were required of her."

When Woodrow Wilson suffered a massive stroke in office, paralyzed but not yet dead, his wife, Edith, virtually took over. She refused to let people see him, becoming the intermediary through which the nation dealt with its president. It caused a crisis and a furor. She was unmoved: "I am not thinking of the country now, I am thinking of my husband."

This is understandable but not practical: The love of one's spouse must take second place to national need.

It is the consensus among historians that Jacqueline Kennedy, in her bloodstained dress while Lyndon B. Johnson took the oath of office in Dallas, is the model image of this. She walked into the White House as the Queen of Camelot and walked out as a woman whose dignity helped hold together a shocked nation.

DOJ_NMG_0110541

The Lincoln assassination a century earlier proves the point via an opposite example. Mary Todd Lincoln, already unstable of emotion and personality, dissolved after her husband was shot. She offered the nation no such grace note.

Since the Civil War, only three presidents have outlived their wives.

"The first lady is not a private person grieving, they're a public icon, and we look to them for strength and how to behave," says Myra Gutin, professor of communications at Rider University and author of "The President's Partner: The First Lady in the Twentieth Century."

She says it has left one constant:

"If they cry, it seems like they did it privately, not on the public stage," she says.

Betty Ford spent her last official weekend in Washington with her family at the Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, a few blocks from the White House. She walked, resting on arms of a family member, a military official, the vice president, the president. She kept her gaze level, her eyes steady. She attended services at the Capitol Rotunda, the cathedral, the landmarks of official Washington.

Her lips were pursed, save for offering a quiet smile to family or friends. She shed no public tears.

She was being strong; maybe for the nation, maybe for herself.

Then, yesterday afternoon, the plane lifted her and her family up into the bright blue sky, heading north, heading home.

One last funeral, and then no more.

Leaving the pages of history must sometimes be an answered prayer.

Remembering A Leader And The Party That Was (WP)

By Dan Balz And David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The honorary pallbearers who walked slowly up the aisle at Washington National Cathedral yesterday at the funeral of former president Gerald R. Ford were as familiar as when they served the 38th president, symbolizing continuity through four decades of Republican administrations.

The names included Cheney, Rumsfeld, Baker, Greenspan and Scowcroft, officials who have served multiple Republican presidents. But their presence masked a far different reality, which is that the Republican Party that spawned Ford and his brand of Midwestern conservatism barely exists today.

It was a tribute to Ford's character that the speakers at yesterday's funeral devoted their remarks largely to personal attributes -- honesty, integrity and modesty -- that they said helped stabilize the country after the traumas and divisions of the Watergate scandal and the end of the Nixon presidency.

But in sharp contrast to the commentary after the death of former president Ronald Reagan, there were no remembrances of Ford as an architect of modern conservatism or a force behind the GOP's ascendance. The Republican Party has turned away from Ford's conservatism, moving sharply to the right ideologically and to the South and West geographically.

The names ascribed to those changes include Reagan, Barry Goldwater, Newt Gingrich and George W. Bush. But not Ford. His passing served not only to highlight how the party has changed, but how he felt increasingly estranged from some elements of the party's new doctrine. Ford was long uncomfortable with the party's shift to the right on issues such as abortion and made that plain in many interviews. As is now known from an interview published posthumously, he also harbored great doubts about Bush's Iraq policies.

"It is a lot different party now," said Vin Weber, a former Republican House member from Minnesota. "I have enormous regard for Jerry Ford. He campaigned for me in my first election, and it made a great difference. But he was the last of the old order. When he picked [Nelson] Rockefeller [as vice president], it reverberated very strongly with younger Republicans as an effort to undo everything we'd worked for since Barry Goldwater."

As a World War II veteran, Ford came into politics as an internationalist. As a Midwesterner, he practiced a fiscal conservatism that was grounded in balancing budgets and controlling spending. The Bush administration has adopted a different model for dealing with the world, one that has relied on a go-it-alone strategy in the battle against terrorism, and for much of the past three decades, Republicans have embraced tax cuts over controlling spending as the foundation of their economic policy.

Gingrich believes that Vice President Cheney and former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, alumni of the Ford administration and now emblematic of the Bush administration's foreign policy, have changed because the world has changed. "Cheney and Rumsfeld have experienced a different world than Ford experienced and are genuinely frightened, and their policies are born out of this fear," he said. "They just don't know how to communicate to the country."

No one would seem to represent a break with Ford's Republican Party more than Gingrich, whose brash style and disruptive tactics upset the GOP's old guard in the 1980s but ultimately helped usher in a Republican congressional majority in 1994.

Ironically, he attributes to Ford the model he and Weber and other young Turks used to help transform the party in the 1980s and 1990s. In his younger days, Ford was an insurgent who helped depose then-House Republican leader Charles Halleck. Rumsfeld was part of that younger, hard-charging cadre.

"We literally modeled the Conservative Opportunity Society after them," Gingrich said. "They were doing all sorts of things that irritated the old guard. . . . But in many ways, they represent a pre-Reagan, pre-Goldwater party."

Clarke Reed of Mississippi, the veteran party leader who at the 1976 Republican National Convention helped deliver his state's delegation to Ford over Reagan and preserve Ford's nomination, remarked yesterday that the party was then "just on the cusp of going Southern." Reagan's conservatism, he said, brought a new emphasis on social issues and religious values that was distinctly different from Ford's more moderate conservatism.

The midterm elections have brought a round of soul-searching among Republicans, who wonder whether they have become too conservative, too Southern, too indebted to the religious right. Ford's Republican Party may never return, but what replaced it has begun to show its limits.

Yesterday's tributes to Ford also served to underline that he will be forever tied to Richard M. Nixon -- first, as Nixon's choice to succeed the disgraced Spiro T. Agnew as vice president and then as Nixon's successor and the author of Nixon's controversial pardon.

In every eulogy to Ford's honesty, openness and trustworthiness, there was a contrast drawn with his predecessor. In some respects, they are the two sides of the Republican heritage. It carries over to the present day. Bush was helped to two terms in the White House in part by the public belief that he is a plain-spoken man. But Republicans paid a high price in November's elections for the "culture of corruption" in Congress, which the Democrats exploited.

Something else has been lost in the Republican Party, according to Kenneth M. Duberstein, who served in both the Ford and Reagan administrations: what he called "the sweet bipartisanship of Jerry Ford." That pattern "died in the last 12 years," and he sees little prospect of its reviving.

Words Show Iraq Fraying 'Code Of Silence' (USAT)

WASHINGTON — The war in Iraq has fractured even the fraternity of presidents.

After they exit the Oval Office, presidents generally limit criticism of their successors, at least in public. When President Bush and predecessors Jimmy Carter, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton gathered Tuesday at the National Cathedral for President Gerald Ford's funeral, it was a show of solidarity and affection for one of the few who knew firsthand how difficult the job can be.

The three former presidents smiled and shook hands as they waited for the memorial to begin, their first time together since a similar farewell for President Reagan 2½ years ago.

The tradition of what historian Robert Dallek calls "a code of silence" among presidents has been strained by the escalating violence in Iraq, however. The war has divided the international community, the American public, members of Congress.

Ford joined that debate, albeit after his death.

He criticized Bush's justification for the war in an interview conducted in 2004 and released when he died last week, joining critiques by Clinton and Carter. Their views underscore Bush's isolation on the war as he prepares to address the nation as early as next week on a strategy to turn around the deteriorating security and political situation in Iraq.

Ford's death and accounts of his life have competed in newspapers and TV broadcasts with a grim milestone: the 3,000th U.S. death in Iraq.

Criticism by former presidents is rare, says Richard Shenkman, a historian at George Mason University and author of Presidential Ambition. Most ex-presidents, recalling their travails in office, are reluctant to add to the burdens of successors, he says.

"It's a fine line that they walk," he says, but one that sometimes has been crossed. Dallek says periods of national "difficulty and frustration" can prompt former presidents to speak out.

In July 2004, Ford told The Washington Post that he "very strongly" disagreed with Bush's justification for the war and would have pursued sanctions and negotiations rather than order an invasion. "I don't think I would have gone to war," Ford said in an interview with Bob Woodward.

The former president also faulted two former aides who became architects of Bush's Iraq strategy: Vice President Cheney, once Ford's White House chief of staff, and Donald Rumsfeld, who served as Defense secretary for Ford and the younger Bush.

Clinton generally has tempered his public comments about Iraq, but in November he told students in Dubai that the United States made "a big mistake" by invading, in particular by underestimating the difficulty of uniting the country.

Carter has been the most outspoken. In a CNN interview in November, he predicted that the invasion of Iraq was "going to prove, I believe, to be one of the greatest blunders that American presidents have ever made."

White House spokesman Tony Snow declined to comment on the former presidents' remarks. "We're remembering Gerald Ford today," he said.

For one former president, there has been not a hint of disapproval.

The elder Bush has rejected criticism of his son. His remarks as one of four eulogists for Ford — the current president, former secretary of State Henry Kissinger and Tom Brokaw of NBC were the others — focused on Ford's character, not current events.

Even so, when he paid his respects on Monday to Ford in the Capitol Rotunda, the elder Bush was accompanied by two old friends, former secretary of State James Baker and former Wyoming senator Alan Simpson. Both are members of the Iraq Study Group, which last month issued a scathing report that recommended drawing down U.S. troops.

In some ways, the division over Iraq is reminiscent of the friction between Ford and Reagan when both sought the GOP presidential nomination in 1976.

Then-president Ford warned that Reagan's hard-line attitude toward the Soviet Union was dangerously provocative. Reagan, a challenger who would lose the nomination but win the presidency four years later, accused Ford of failing to take a tough enough stand against Moscow.

Kissinger's eulogy recalled those days with words that could apply to Iraq, although he didn't cite it directly. The former secretary of State — who in November told the BBC that military victory in Iraq was no longer possible — said Ford's "prudence and common sense kept ethnic conflicts in Cyprus and Lebanon from spiraling into regional war."

He praised Ford for persistence in pursuing diplomacy with the Soviet Union and in the Middle East.

The rift between Ford and Reagan over disputes on détente, the Panama Canal treaty and the Helsinki Accords "never completely healed," says Craig Shirley, author of a book on the 1976 campaign entitled Reagan's Revolution; The Untold Story of the Campaign That Started It All. Shirley, a Republican consultant, called the practice of presidents faulting one another relatively new and probably unwise.

"It's better for ex-presidents to remain silent and let history judge them."

The Ex-Presidents' Club Bids A Member Goodbye (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And John M. Broder

WASHINGTON, Jan. 2 — In a moment of presidential empathy, former President George Bush recalled a skill he had learned from Gerald R. Ford: how to handle being ridiculed on "Saturday Night Live."

"I remember that lesson well, since being able to laugh at yourself is essential in public life," Mr. Bush said in his eulogy for Mr. Ford on Tuesday. "I'd tell you more about that, but as Dana Carvey would say: 'Not gonna do it. Wouldn't be prudent.' "

As the 82-year-old former president imitated his own impersonator, there were only three people in the audience who knew exactly how it felt to be ridiculed, as a sitting president, on late-night television. Former President Bill Clinton responded with a hearty laugh from his seat in the Washington National Cathedral, while former President Jimmy Carter, in a neighboring pew, looked on with a smile. Seated nearby was President Bush, who has been relentlessly skewered by TV comics as well.

With Mr. Ford's death last week, the group of living former presidents has shrunk to three, down from five in the early 1990s. Since 1994, Richard M. Nixon, Ronald Reagan and, now, Mr. Ford have left the stage, while Mr. Clinton has joined the ranks of former chief executives.

The dynamic among the former presidents is perpetually evolving, as people age, rivalries fade and former political opponents discover they share more similarities than differences.

The current club has at its core two presidents in different parties — Mr. Clinton, 60, and the elder Mr. Bush — who have become companions in traveling and fund-raising for causes around the world. The two at times appear more friendly than Mr. Bush is with his son, or than Mr. Clinton is with Mr. Carter, 82, a fellow Democrat. And on Tuesday it was Mr. Carter, not either of the Bushes, who accompanied Mr. Ford's coffin back to Grand Rapids, Mich., for burial.

Though Mr. Ford and Mr. Carter squared off in the 1976 election, they became friends after both were out of office. On a flight home from Cairo in 1981, after the funeral of the Egyptian leader Anwar el-Sadat, they found common ground discussing their presidential libraries.

Similar kinship has grown between Mr. Clinton and the first President Bush, in contrast to the rocky relationship between Mr. Clinton and Mr. Carter. Though the two Southern Democrats are from similarly humble backgrounds, they have been at odds repeatedly over the years.

In 1993, Mr. Carter said he was "very disappointed" in the Clintons for sending their daughter, Chelsea, to private school rather than public school, as the Carters had done with their daughter, Amy. After the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Mr. Carter said he had been "deeply embarrassed by what occurred." In more recent years, the Clinton-Carter relationship has had a tinge of rivalry, as both men have sought to become global statesmen.

The funeral also provided a stage for those thinking about the politics of tomorrow, as well as those of yesterday. Along with the three former presidents sat several of those who may aspire to the job, including Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York and Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio.

And it was a reminder that while the nation elects only the president, the White House becomes home to a whole family whose members have to cope with the spotlight. At the cathedral on Tuesday, Rosalynn Carter was seen talking intently with Nancy Reagan. One row behind them, Chelsea Clinton spoke animatedly with a fellow Stanford University alumna, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Tom Brokaw, the former NBC News anchor, said in his eulogy that when Mr. Ford brought his family to 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, "he brought the humanity that comes with a family that seemed to be living right next door."

For neighbors of the Fords in Alexandria, Va., from the 1950s until they moved into the White House in 1974, they were in fact the family next door, with four independent-minded children whose public indiscretions Mr. Ford sometimes had to confront.

His son Jack admitted in a newspaper interview in 1975 that he smoked marijuana and lived a rowdy bachelor's life. His daughter, Susan Ford Bales, was a headstrong teenager when her father became president and was married for a time to a Secret Service agent who had been assigned to guard the family.

Mr. Ford and Ms. Bales, now middle-aged, walked hand in hand down the center aisle of the cathedral before the service, and each read a passage from the Bible.

Ms. Bales's reading came from James 1:19-25, chosen by the family to help illuminate the former president's humble approach to the bitter times in which he served.

DOJ_NMG_0110545

"Therefore rid yourselves of all sordidness and rank growth of wickedness, and welcome with meekness the implanted word that has the power to save your souls," Ms. Bales read. "But be doers of the word, and not merely hearers who deceive themselves."

Ford 'The Best Of America' (USAT)

By Judy Keen And Bill Nichols

USA Today, January 3, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. — Gerald Ford's hometown welcomed him back to his beloved Midwest for the last time Tuesday, hours after a final and affectionate farewell in the nation's capital.

Ford will be buried Wednesday on a hillside at his presidential museum, ending a week-long national tribute to the 38th president. Thousands of silent people lined the streets of this city of 194,000 to watch the passage of the hearse carrying Ford's body.

Thousands more lined up to pass by Ford's casket during visitation inside the museum through the night.

"He was quite a guy, quite a man," said Grand Rapids barber Jim Jazwinski, 70.

Former president Jimmy Carter, who defeated Ford in the 1976 election, will speak at a private service today.

Washington bid its own goodbye Tuesday with a stately funeral for Ford, a man President Bush called "one of America's most beloved leaders."

Ford, who died Dec. 26 at the age of 93, was remembered by Bush and other dignitaries as a plain-spoken son of the Midwest who calmed a divided nation in the wake of Richard Nixon's resignation in 1974.

"We are here today to say goodbye to a great man," Bush said in his eulogy under the soaring arches of the Washington National Cathedral. "In President Ford, the world saw the best of America."

More than 3,000 guests filled the majestic cathedral, including former presidents Carter, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, as well as Cabinet members, members of Congress and justices of the Supreme Court.

Ford's widow, Betty, 88, sat stoically with the couple's four children, holding hands with daughter Susan Ford Bales. At one point, Ford whispered to her daughter, "Beautiful."

Speaker after speaker focused on a central theme: the innate decency and impeccable character embodied by Ford. He "was a Norman Rockwell painting come to life," former president Bush said. Ford had "a heart as big and open as the Midwest plains on which he was born," Bush said.

Before the service, Ford's remains were placed outside the U.S. Senate chamber, and the casket was led down the steps of the Capitol, where Ford served as a House member before Nixon selected him to replace disgraced vice president Spiro Agnew in 1973.

Outside, hundreds of people spilled down the steps of the Russell Senate Office Building and lined Constitution Avenue to watch the funeral cortege.

Alan Gibby of California, in town for a son's wedding, remembered shaking Ford's hand when he was 18 years old. "It was one of the greatest days of my life," Gibby said. "I just had to come and pay my respects."

George W. Bush And The Media: Final Words And Last Laughs (WP)

By Dana Milbank

What will be President Bush's chicken-head moment?

During yesterday's funeral services at the Washington National Cathedral for Gerald Ford, retired anchorman Tom Brokaw recalled how the press corps' affection for the late president could be seen in the acquisition, by New York Times reporter Jim Naughton, of a mock chicken head that had caught Ford's attention at a campaign rally. "Giddy from 20-hour days and an endless repetition of the same campaign speech, Naughton decided to wear that chicken head to a Ford news conference in Oregon, with the enthusiastic encouragement of the president and his chief of staff, Dick Cheney," Brokaw recalled.

"When the president called me last year and asked me if I would participate in these services," Brokaw continued, "I think he wanted to be sure that the White House press corps was represented: the writers, correspondents and producers, the cameramen, photographers, the technicians -- and the chicken."

For Bush, it must have been a jarring moment. The current president would probably have Hugo Chavez deliver his eulogy before he would bestow the honor on a member of the White House press corps.

Even if Bush were inclined to allow a journalist to orate, which contentious moment with the press would be recounted? Would it be when Bush, in Paris, called NBC's David Gregory "intercontinental" for asking the French president a question in French? Or when Bush attempted to leave a quarrelsome press conference in China but discovered the door was locked?

Equally tricky: Which reporter would be Bush's Brokaw? To help Bush choose, several current and former White House correspondents, though in no way encouraging the president to shuffle off this mortal coil, yesterday offered sample eulogies they would be willing to give many years from now.

Richard Wolffe of Newsweek invoked the days after Bush called Adam Clymer of the New York Times a "major league a------" and Cheney replied, "Big time" -- all captured on the microphone at a campaign rally. "Halloween of 2000," Wolffe remembered. "Several of us obtained Bush masks and printed up a series of baseball shirts for a fictional team called the Major League A's. We lined up at the foot of his plane stairs like an honor guard and he posed for photos with us. Chuckled with his shoulders the whole way through."

A major league entry. But here's one from Clymer himself, who provided a touching footnote: "He made a cheerful video tribute for the Washington Press Club Foundation dinner in 2001, with Cheney echoing his every sentence with 'big time.' A couple of months later, he sent me a very gracious sympathy letter on the death of my mother."

One candidate unlikely to become a finalist for eulogy honors is Julie Mason of the Houston Chronicle, who recalled the president falling off his scooter in Kennebunkport. "Toward the end of his presidency, Bush fretted openly about how history would judge him. He needn't have worried. Patting his wife's bottom in church and dropping Barney on the tarmac were not the defining moments of his presidency. Falling off the Segway was."

Nor should Bob Kemper wait by the phone. The former Chicago Tribune reporter, now with the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, recalled Bush's visit to the British Embassy to see his sister-in-law perform in a play. "Obviously worried that a theater critic had infiltrated the travel pool, the White House banned the pool from the embassy and drove us instead to Cactus Cantina," Kemper eulogized. "The pool ate as it often does -- under armed supervision of the Secret Service, which, to ensure that no one snuck off and tried to see 'The Spider's Web,' required the entire pool to go to the Little Reporter's Room together under armed guard."

A likelier candidate, but still a dark horse, is Olivier Knox of Agence France-Presse. He offered a moving tribute about the time "a foreign journalist asked the president after a roundtable interview to autograph a copy of 'A Charge to Keep.' The president called out to the U.S. reporters sitting behind him, 'Why don't you folks ever ask me to do this?' One of them shot back: 'Maybe when it's in paperback, sir.' "

Judging from yesterday's entries, Bush's self-deprecation will play a role in any eventual funeral. James Rosen of Fox News remembered a White House Christmas party when the CIA leak scandal was at its height. Rosen introduced Bush to his father, a personal-injury trial lawyer of the variety Bush disparaged on every campaign stop. "I could probably use a good lawyer," Bush allowed.

Not bad. But probably the most promising chicken-head story was provided by Dick Keil, the former Bloomberg News reporter Bush called "Stretch." The 6-foot-5 Stretch recalled a 2001 news conference on the Bush ranch in Texas, when an unusually talkative Bush exhausted all questions and was finally asked what he had done that day. Recalled Keil: "He noted that he had begun his morning by spending some 'quality time with the first lady.' Following a dramatic pause for effect, he got that wry grin, and said, 'Usually, I go running.' "

Manufacturing Could Signal Trouble Ahead (WSJ)

By Justin Lahart

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

If manufacturers seem downbeat as the new year starts, it's partly because they were too upbeat at the beginning of the old one.

Gross domestic product grew at a 5.6% annual rate in the first quarter of 2006, slowed to 2% by the third quarter and is estimated to have slowed a bit more in the final three months of last year. The run from hot to cold means manufacturers produced more stuff than needed and are now suffering the consequences.

When the Institute for Supply Management releases its monthly report on manufacturing activity today, that unhappy message is likely to come out clearly. The ISM's manufacturing index -- based on surveys of purchasing managers -- dropped sharply through the fall and by November hit its lowest level in more than three years. At 49.5, the index had dipped into terrain that signals a manufacturing contraction and was lower than comparable indexes in other countries.

Economists polled by Dow Jones peg today's report for December's ISM at 50 -- essentially a "we're-still-on-vacation-here" forecast of no change.

Part of the problem is the housing slowdown and auto production cutbacks proved more severe in 2006 than manufacturers appear to have expected. That left them with more wallboard and windshields than needed. Even outside of housing and autos, companies seem to have expected stronger demand than they got as 2006 unfolded.

Some manufacturers also built up raw material inventories to beat price increases and when commodity prices dropped, the excess inventory turned into excess baggage.

Goldman Sachs economist Jan Hatzius notes inventories have been rising more than shipments, which could force companies to cut production even more to work down stockpiles.

Mr. Hatzius doesn't think this means a broader recession, but he says it probably does mean overall growth will remain sluggish in early 2007. That will keep interest rates low, but could lead to earnings disappointments, a perilous scenario for stock investors.

... And Dow Transports Could Confirm It

Dow Theory is an old market barometer many investors have forgotten. Ignoring it now might be a mistake.

The theory holds that the 30-stock Dow Jones Industrial Average, which includes stocks like International Business Machines and Alcoa, and the 20-stock Dow Jones Transportation Average, with stocks like FedEx and JetBlue, should move in tandem to confirm bull or bear markets. That means when industrials rise and transports don't, the market could falter.

Don't look now, but transport stocks have turned south as the industrials have hit records. The transportation average is off 6.6% since mid-November, thanks to slumping cargo traffic and disappointing earnings outlooks from companies like FedEx. The softness mirrors manufacturing weakness showing up in the monthly ISM reports.

Skeptics say Dow theory -- which traces back to this paper's co-founder, Charles Dow -- is passé because the economy has changed so much. Proponents say transport stocks still send important signals. In the late '90s the transports dipped long before the broader market meltdown.

Given the red flags waving in manufacturing, Mr. Dow's ideas might be worth a fresh look.

December Auto Sales Look Weak (WSJ)

By John D. Stoll

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

DETROIT -- As auto makers report December U.S. sales on Wednesday, a decline in fleet sales to rental agencies and significant weakness at Ford Motor Co. are expected to fuel an overall market pullback for the month. The slide may be a prelude to a difficult year ahead for car sales and domestic vehicle production.

Analysts forecast that December industry sales will slide as much as 6%, aided by what could be a double-digit percentage decline at Ford, despite heavy year-end sales incentives and an expected uptick in luxury car sales. Other domestic auto makers are seen posting nearly flat sales for the month, while recent sales gains are expected to continue for Asian auto makers such as Toyota Motor Corp. and Honda Motor Co.

Even with December's expected slide, full-year auto sales are seen reaching about 16.5 million vehicles in 2006. While the result is down more than 2% from the 16.9 million sold in 2005, the volume still represents historically strong demand, according to trade publication Ward's Automotive Reports, which tracks U.S. auto sales.

But demand for new light vehicles may hit headwinds this year amid a continued housing market slump, and as U.S. auto makers back away from unprofitable practices that helped pump up demand in prior years. Ford and General Motors Corp., for example, have both laid out plans to reduce fleet sales and lessen their reliance on incentives, such as discounts and rebates.

In a research note released to investors last week, Merrill Lynch auto analyst John Murphy forecasted that auto sales will sink to about 16 million vehicles in 2007, an outlook mirrored by many other auto analysts. Sales in the low 16 million range would represent the lowest annual sales tally of the decade.

"The slowdown in new vehicle sales observed in the past few months appears now likely to persist well into" 2007, Lehman Brothers Inc. auto analyst Brian Johnson said in a recent note to investors.

Comerica Bank Chief Economist Dana Johnson said that car sales in particular will be harder to produce in the first half of 2007. "Cars are a big ticket item and sometimes people take equity out of their houses to finance a down payment and there has been less of that available," the economist said.

Dana Johnson predicted that auto sales will speed up in the second half of the year as overall economic growth begins to rebound.

Merrill Lynch's Mr. Murphy said that the relative profitability of vehicle sales could also fade in 2007 as consumers continue to move away from sport-utility vehicles and pickups in favor of more fuel-efficient passenger cars and crossover models. Light trucks rake in a higher profit margin for auto makers.

Comerica's Mr. Johnson said Detroit's auto makers may be able to better handle lower sales volumes in 2007 thanks to the severe job cuts that were executed in 2006. Ford and GM will dismiss as many as 72,000 hourly workers in the U.S. by September via recently staged accelerated attrition programs. DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group is expected to announce additional job cuts in February.

Mr. Johnson said fewer workers for the Big Three means it should be less costly to shut down or slow assembly lines. GM, Ford and Chrysler cut production in 2006 and cutbacks are expected to continue through at least the first half of 2007.

Lehman's Mr. Johnson estimates that 2007 North American auto production will fall 100,000 vehicles, or 7%, below 2006's "already low" level of 15.3 million vehicles. He said Big Three production will fall 5% in 2007, following a 7% decline last year, as Detroit's market share continues to fade.

The Big Economic Worry (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The start of a new year is a good time to take stock, and there are few better indicators of our long-term economic prospects -- and also our prospects for political and social peace -- than productivity. As anyone who's taken basic college economics should know, productivity is simply jargon for efficiency. It's also what most people think of as economic progress. The good news is that productivity has been growing strongly; the bad news is that it may be moving to a much slower path.

To see why that matters, consult a fascinating government report, "100 Years of U.S. Consumer Spending." A century ago, Americans spent 43 percent of their incomes on food and 14 percent on clothing. By 2002, those shares were 13 percent and 4 percent. Meanwhile, family incomes (after inflation) had exploded. Filling the spending gap are all the things we take for granted -- cars, TVs, travel, telephones, the Internet. Home ownership has zipped to almost 70 percent of households.

This triumph of mass consumption is usually credited to technological breakthroughs, from the assembly line to computer chips. But the whole process is also described as productivity improvement. In 1900, 41 percent of Americans worked on farms. If mechanization, new seeds and fertilizers hadn't meant that fewer people could produce more food, we'd still be paying two-fifths of our income to eat. Labor productivity is measured as output per hour worked. Whatever enables people to produce more in a given time (machinery, skills, organization) boosts productivity.

That in turn raises our incomes -- or gives us more leisure. It also promotes domestic tranquility by muffling the competition between government and personal spending. Slow productivity growth virtually ensures a collision between the heavy costs of retiring baby boomers -- mostly for Social Security and Medicare -- and younger workers' living standards. Higher taxes will bite deeply into sluggish incomes. The reason: What seem to be tiny productivity shifts have huge consequences.

Consider: In 2005, the U.S. economy produced $12.5 trillion of goods and services, or gross domestic product (GDP). Per capita income -- the average for individuals -- was $35,000. If productivity growth averages 2.5 percent a year, the economy reaches $34 trillion in 2035 (in constant 2005 dollars), estimates Moody's Economy.com. Per capita income rises to $73,000. Now, suppose productivity growth averages 1 percent annually. Then GDP in 2035 is only $23 trillion, and per capita income is $48,000. That $13,000 gain ($48,000 minus $35,000) may look large, but it occurs over three decades, and part of workers' gain would be taxed away to pay baby boomers' retirement costs. Typical take-home pay would rise less than 1 percent annually.

Unfortunately, productivity growth seems to be decreasing. In the past year it's been only 1.4 percent. By contrast, it averaged about 3 percent from 2000 to 2005. The fall-off partly reflects a mature business cycle. As the economy slows, so do productivity gains. But some long-term forecasts project that the poor performance will continue. In Moody's Economy.com's outlook, productivity growth averages 1.4 percent a year from 2005 to 2035. The main reason: stunted business investment in new machinery, technologies and buildings, says chief economist Mark Zandi.

"We don't save much as a nation, and we've gotten away with it so far because overseas investors have been willing to finance our investment," he says. But he doubts that will continue. As global investors shift to other markets, big federal budget deficits will compete increasingly with private companies for credit. Higher interest rates will crowd out some business investment. Productivity will suffer.

Maybe. But Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke has suggested that the post-1995 trend (2.5 percent or higher) might persist for years. In truth, economists have a dismal record in anticipating and explaining productivity shifts. A big slowdown in the early 1970s remains a mystery. Productivity gains averaged 1.5 percent for a bit more than two decades, down from about 2.5 percent in the 1950s and 1960s. The post-1995 rebound was first attributed to computers and the Internet. But its continuation after 2000 -- when high-tech investment peaked -- suggests that other forces contributed. It's unclear what they were.

The great frustration is that something so critical is also so elusive. Productivity ultimately encompasses a society's entire economic culture: its technologies, management, workers' skills and motivation, schools, entrepreneurial spirit, work ethic, ambition and risk-taking, the competitive pressure on companies, government policies, financial markets. Everything counts -- and connects with everything else.

Therein lies a caution to the Democratic Congress and the Bush administration. Although government can't easily dictate higher productivity, its policies may perversely favor lower productivity. What's politically expedient today -- a dubious tax break, a lazy budget deficit, an expensive regulation -- may be economically corrosive tomorrow. Don't ditch the future.

Best Of The Law Blog As Two Firms Look To Tie Up, Some Partners Head For Exits (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Dewey or Don't We?

DOJ_NMG_0110550

Two major law firms have been talking marriage, but partners are leaving before the firms reach the altar. Dewey Ballantine has lost at least nine partners since the news last fall of its plans to merge with San Francisco's Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe. A defection this week is a biggie: Michael Aiello, a top Dewey mergers-and-acquisitions partner and a member of the management committee, joined Weil, Gotshal & Manges. Already, the Dewey-Orrick merger vote had been postponed as the two sides attempt to iron out differences on management authority and other topics.

Read more about law, business and the business of law at WSJ.com's Law Blog2, updated every business day.

Orrick has wanted to join forces with Dewey in large part because of Dewey's strong M&A practice, but in December, Jack Bodner, another former Dewey M&A partner, left for Covington & Burling in New York. Messrs. Aiello and Bodner were considered two of the top deputies to Morton Pierce, the head of Dewey's M&A practice.

Also in December, Pierre Hubert, a former IP litigation partner in Dewey's Austin, Texas, office, left for McKool Smith, a Texas-based firm.

A Dewey spokesman wished all of the departing lawyers well.

Ford's Legal Legacy

Based on the past week's tributes, the late President Ford won't be best known for his legacy to the law, but perhaps he should be.

At a 2005 symposium, Mr. Ford sent a letter saying, "I am prepared to allow history's judgment of my term in office to rest (if necessary, exclusively) on my nomination 30 years ago of Justice John Paul Stevens to the U.S. Supreme Court." While Justice Stevens has, in recent years, perhaps been the court's most consistently liberal justice, Mr. Ford vouched for his old friend's approach to the law, endorsing his views on a variety of issues, from the "secular character" of the Constitution's religion clauses to securing procedural safeguards for criminal defendants.

The selection of Justice Stevens was pressed by Edward Levi, whom Mr. Ford tapped to be U.S. attorney general in 1975. Today, the appointment of Mr. Levi, who also served as president of the University of Chicago, is widely viewed as helping to restore the reputation of the Justice Department after form President's Nixon's attorney general, John Mitchell, was convicted of perjury and other crimes.

In 2000, Mr. Ford eulogized, "With each passing year it becomes more and more self-evident -- Ed Levi is the attorney general against whom all others are measured."

Milberg Weiss Gets a Zinger

Last month U.S. Magistrate Judge Steven Pepe in Detroit ruled that plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss & Bershad shouldn't be appointed lead counsel in a suit involving Ford Motor. In light of the May indictment of Milberg Weiss on kickback charges, which was followed by a slew of attorney departures, the judge questioned whether the firm would have the resources to devote to the case.

The opinion wasn't the first to rule that Milberg Weiss might not be the best choice to serve as lead counsel for plaintiffs. But it was perhaps the most pointed.

Judge Pepe chastised Milberg lawyer Lori Feldman for saying the attorneys litigating the case hadn't been accused of wrongdoing but failing to note that an indicted former partner was listed on the complaint.

"We are bewildered as to why the opinion is so cutting," said Ms. Feldman, who noted that the former partner was on leave when Milberg sought to be appointed lead counsel. "We don't want anything to happen to this firm....It's not a mausoleum. We're able to work." But, she added, "if we continue to get decisions like this, it'll be tough."

The Apprentice, Esq.

When the latest installment of "The Apprentice" debuts Sunday night on NBC, it will have a distinctly legal flavor. Of the 18 candidates competing for a job in the Trump Organization, six are practicing lawyers, including one from the firm of class-action lawyer William Lerach.

"Why so many lawyers?" we asked Mr. Trump.

"A lot of it has to do with lawyers' high levels of education and the fact that many of them are intelligent," he said. "Now, I'm not saying all lawyers are intelligent because I've seen many lawyers that aren't."

Leaked Giuliani Memo Details Goals, Hurdles (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R) has been exploring a run for president for just over a month, but the planning behind a national candidacy has been going on much longer, according to an internal strategy memo.

The 140-page document, which was leaked to the New York Daily News by a rival 2008 campaign, provides a broad look at Giuliani's prospects for the Republican nomination -- including the potential hurdles of his stormy personal life and his association with disgraced former New York City police commissioner Bernard B. Kerik. "All will come out -- in worst light," says the document as quoted by the Daily News.

The memo also details a fundraising plan for Giuliani that includes raising $100 million this year, including $25 million in the first three months alone, according to the Daily News. At present, Giuliani finds himself slightly behind Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) in the race for commitments from key donors who can contribute their own money and also harvest thousands more from their well-heeled friends.

Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Giuliani, alleged that the memo was obtained through a series of "political dirty tricks." According to Mindel, a staffer's bag containing the document was lost during one of Giuliani's campaign trips this fall after being removed from a private plane. The bag was returned several days later after "repeated requests" by Giuliani's staff. "Because our staffer had custody of this document at all times except for this one occasion, it is clear that the document was removed from the luggage and photocopied," Mindel said.

Polling continues to show Giuliani running at or near the front of the 2008 Republican field -- a result of the national name recognition he carries from his handling of the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Despite those surveys, many within the party are skeptical that Giuliani's liberal social positions will withstand the scrutiny of conservative primary and caucus voters.Romney to File Campaign Papers

Speaking of Romney, he'll let one of the least well-kept secrets of the 2008 campaign out of the bag today when he formally registers a presidential exploratory committee with the Federal Election Commission.

The filing of the paperwork is largely formulaic, as Romney has long been expected to run for president and has been putting into place a national organization to prepare for such a bid. Romney's latest hire is Carolyn Weyforth, who most recently served as press secretary for outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Weyforth will be Romney's deputy communications director.

Romney will spend much of today preparing to hand over power to Gov.-elect Deval Patrick (D), who will be sworn in tomorrow, and is scheduled to make the "lone walk" -- the ceremonial departing descent down the steps of the Massachusetts State House -- this evening.

On Jan. 8, Romney will begin his exploratory committee in earnest with a fundraiser in Boston to benefit his presidential aspirations.

Among Republicans, Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.), Rep. Duncan Hunter (Calif.), former governors Tommy G. Thompson (Wis.) and James S. Gilmore III (Va.), as well as McCain and Giuliani, have established exploratory organizations.

Political Paper Stolen, Giuliani Camp Says (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Advisers to former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani said yesterday that someone infiltrated the Giuliani camp last fall and stole a document about his presidential prospects and political liabilities. It was then leaked, they said, as a “dirty trick” to embarrass Mr. Giuliani and highlight such headaches as his controversial former aide, Bernard B. Kerik, and one of his ex-wives, Donna Hanover.

The Daily News was given the 140-page document recently by someone “sympathetic to one of Giuliani’s rivals for the White House,” The News said in an article published yesterday. According to the article, the document proposes a $100 million fund-raising effort for 2007, names an array of potential donors, and warns that Mr. Giuliani might face "insurmountable" problems, including questions about Mr. Kerik and Ms. Hanover.

Mr. Giuliani is expected to decide over the next few months whether to run for president, his advisers say, and he has already formed an exploratory committee to raise money.

A Giuliani spokeswoman, Sunny Mindel, said yesterday that the document belonged to a staff member and did not reflect official strategy, but "simply someone's ideas which were committed to paper over three months ago." Ms. Mindel said the document was apparently stolen from a piece of luggage during a Giuliani political trip last fall, then photocopied and replaced in the luggage. Ms. Mindel said she did not know if her office would seek a criminal investigation of the alleged theft.

The public disclosure of the document is potentially damaging for Mr. Giuliani, not least because since 9/11, he has built a business as a private consultant on security issues while creating an image as a political leader capable of combating terrorism. Indeed, an adviser to one of his possible rivals in 2008, Senator John McCain of Arizona, half-joked yesterday that it was interesting that Mr. Giuliani's businesses included security consulting.

"I'm surprised that something like that would ever leave the custody of a campaign, and that such raw and frank information would be around the countryside," said the McCain adviser, John Weaver. "That said, a lot of the information was predictable."

The document outlines a fund-raising effort to bring in at least $25 million by the end of March, and to spend more than $21 million this year. The News said it included notations that named Mr. Giuliani's chief fund-raiser, Anne Dickerson, and a senior political aide, Anthony Carbonetti; Ms. Mindel would not say to whom the document belonged.

Among the sections that appear outdated are the prospective donor lists. The document proposed New Jersey fund-raisers Lewis M. Eisenberg and Larry Bathgate, financier Henry R. Kravis, and FedEx executive Fred Smith. The first three men were named last month as leaders of Mr. McCain's fund-raising operation, and Mr. Smith is expected to join the roster shortly.

Assessing the document, which includes printed text, handwriting and spreadsheets, The News drew the conclusion that Mr. Giuliani appeared torn between seeking the White House and continuing his business endeavors, which include consulting on leadership and security issues, a law practice and an investment concern.

One page in the document, according to The News, says Mr. Giuliani might "drop out" of the race as a result of "insurmountable" personal and political concerns.

On that page was a list of bullet points that seem to highlight those concerns: Mr. Giuliani's consulting practice; his former police commissioner, Mr. Kerik, who has struggled with personal and professional controversies; Ms. Hanover, with whom he had a stormy breakup; his third and current wife, Judith Nathan Giuliani; and "social issues" — apparently a reference to his support for abortion rights, gay civil unions, and gun control, some or all of which are opposed by many Republican voters.

"All will come out — in worst light," the document stated. "$100 million against us on this stuff," it continued, apparently a reference to likely efforts by Giuliani opponents to draw public attention to his liabilities.

It also suggests that Mr. Giuliani would categorize and honor his donors with terms from baseball. While President Bush referred to his best financial supporters as "Rangers" and "Pioneers," Mr. Giuliani would call them "Team Captains," "MVPs," "All-Stars," and "Sluggers." He would focus his fund-raising operations in New York, Washington, and California, the document indicates.

Ms. Mindel called the document "very outdated," but at least some of the ideas reflect current strategy discussions in the Giuliani camp, according to Republican Party figures who are familiar with the discussions and who spoke to The New York Times recently on condition of anonymity. Specifically, these Republicans say, Giuliani advisers believe that he is broadly popular enough to be able to raise money quickly for a presidential bid, and that he would need more than $100 million by the end of 2007.

According to Giuliani advisers, the document was a notebook compiled by one staff member whose luggage was not immediately located after a private plane flight last fall. They said it was not an official dossier that all Giuliani political aides shared.

"Voters are sick and tired of dirty tricks," Ms. Mindel said. Referring to the document, she added: "It's about as relevant today as a grocery list written in early October — in pencil."

Romney Eyes 2008 Bid, Sets Sights On Conservative Base (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who today will file papers forming a committee to explore a run for president in 2008, has spent recent months moving steadily to try to occupy the conservative ground in the Republican presidential field.

His entry into the ranks of Republicans officially exploring a run for the presidency underscores the strange nature of the field at this point [-] there is no candidate able to claim the position of the clear conservative standard-bearer, so all of the candidates think they can win a sizable chunk of those all-important primary voters.

"The case that he's going to make is that Mitt Romney has a record of governing that demonstrates an extraordinary level of accomplishment that will lead the country toward success," said a Romney aide familiar with the governor's decision to announce the exploratory committee.

With the first presidential caucuses and primaries scheduled for 12 months from now, Mr. Romney and the other potential candidates are staking out political positions and trying to show their prowess for fundraising and organization.

It's a rough-and-tumble game that was underscored this week by a report in the New York Daily News of internal documents from Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York mayor who formed an exploratory committee for the Republican nomination in November.

The 140-page dossier lists fundraisers Mr. Giuliani hoped to recruit to his presidential bid, but many of them have already been snatched up by his rivals for the nomination -- chiefly Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican whom many analysts say is the man to beat.

The newspaper said it received the document from a source "sympathetic" to one of Mr. Giuliani's rivals, though the paper didn't say which one. In it, Mr. Giuliani's team sets a goal of raising $100 million to $125 million in 2007, and $25 million to $30 million of that during the next three months.

Mr. Romney will take the first step to gauge how much he can raise when he holds his first finance event next week. He has asked his top supporters to bring their lists of contacts and they will hunker down in the Westin Boston Waterfront hotel Sunday night and Monday morning to begin making their fundraising pitch.

John C. Fortier, a research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, said the mantle of the conservative candidate is open after other Republicans, particularly Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Bill Frist of Tennessee, saw their chances collapse with November's election results.

"In a normal field, I think there would also be a more traditional Republican candidate. Looking at the field now, there is not a strong candidate in that role," Mr. Fortier said.

He said that has left an opening for Mr. Romney, who early in his governorship seemed to stake out moderate positions but moved toward the conservative side later in his single term.

"There's a lot of mystery here because he's got a lot of ways he could go, but politically the place to go in the Republican field is to the right of McCain, to the more traditional part of the Republican Party," Mr. Fortier said.

In trying to win those voters, Mr. McCain has shed his 2000 campaign image of the maverick opposed to President Bush. Instead he has recruited many of the operatives and fundraisers that helped Mr. Bush win election in 2000 and 2004.

For his part, Mr. Giuliani has the star power to earn him an audience with conservatives, even though he is seen as a pro-choice, anti-gun-rights candidate.

Mr. Romney, whose Democratic successor will be sworn in tomorrow , took steps in the final days to shore up his credentials as tough on illegal immigration. He signed an agreement with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement giving state troopers trained for the job the ability to enforce federal immigration laws.

He also gave interviews to National Review Online and Human Events last month in which he tried to clarify his positions on abortion and his position on marriage and civil unions.

National political polls of Republicans and Republican-leaning voters put Mr. McCain and Mr. Giuliani well ahead of the rest of the candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0110554

A Gallup poll taken Dec. 11 to 14 showed Mr. McCain and Mr. Giuliani at 28 percent each, and Mr. Romney in fourth at 4 percent, also trailing Condoleezza Rice. An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll put Mr. Romney fourth behind Mr. McCain, Mr. Giuliani and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Political analysts say Mr. Romney's experience as a governor is an asset because voters in recent years have seemed to prefer candidates with executive experience.

He is not the first governor to enter the Republican contest -- former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III announced last month he has formed an exploratory committee -- but Mr. Romney is well ahead of Mr. Gilmore in organizing and fundraising.

Another governor, Arkansas' Mike Huckabee, is considering a run.

Mr. Huckabee told the Associated Press that if he runs, he would appeal to "true conservatives for whom conservatism doesn't mean they're angry at everybody."

"I would be the kind of Republican who doesn't scare the living daylights out of people who are in the center or slightly to the left," he said.

Effect Of Obama's Candor Remains To Be Seen (WP)

By Lois Romano

Long before the national media spotlight began to shine on every twist and turn of his life's journey, Barack Obama had this to say about himself: "Junkie. Pothead. That's where I'd been headed: the final, fatal role of the young would-be black man. . . . I got high [to] push questions of who I was out of my mind."

The Democratic senator from Illinois and likely presidential candidate offered the confession in a memoir written 11 years ago, not long after he graduated from law school and well before he contemplated life on the national stage. At the time, 20,000 copies were printed and the book seemed destined for the remainders stacks.

Today, Obama, 45, is near the top of polls on potential Democratic presidential contenders, and "Dreams From My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance" has regularly been on the bestseller lists, with 800,000 copies in print. Taken along with his latest bestseller, "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream," Obama has become a genuine publishing phenomenon.

Obama's revelations were not an issue during his Senate campaign two years ago. But now his open narrative of early, bad choices, including drug use starting in high school and ending in college, as well as his tortured search for racial identity, are sure to receive new scrutiny.

As a potential candidate, Obama has presented himself as a fresh voice offering a politics of hope. Many say he offers something new in American politics: an African American with a less-than-traditional name who has so far demonstrated broad appeal. What remains to be seen is whether the candor he offered in his early memoir will be greeted with a new-style acceptance by voters.

It was not so long ago that such blunt admissions would have led to a candidate's undoing, and there is uneasiness in Democratic circles that "Dreams From My Father" will provide a blueprint for negative attacks.

Two decades ago, Judge Douglas H. Ginsburg of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit was forced to withdraw as a nominee for the Supreme Court after reports surfaced that he had used marijuana while he was a law professor. As a presidential candidate, Bill Clinton thought marijuana use could be enough of a liability in 1992 that he felt compelled to say he had not inhaled. And President Bush has managed to deflect endless gossip about his past by acknowledging that he had an "irresponsible" youth but offering no details.

Through his book, Obama has become the first potential presidential contender to admit trying cocaine.

"I believe what the country is looking for is someone who is open, honest and candid about themselves rather than someone who seems endlessly driven by polls or focus groups," said Robert Gibbs, Obama's spokesman. Gibbs said yesterday that Obama was not available for an interview.

Presidential aspirants tend to write more sanitized books for use as campaign tools. "Faith of My Fathers" by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) depicts his family's history of military service. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) has reissued "It Takes a Village," which offers her views about child-rearing in contemporary society. In fact, Obama's latest book, "Audacity of Hope," lays out his policy positions.

But "Dreams From My Father" is not like that. Obama wrote the highly personal book when he was in his early 30s, after being approached by a publisher when he became the first black person elected editor of the Harvard Law Review.

"This is not the kind of book you would ever expect a politician to write," said GOP consultant Alex Vogel. "Anyone who has a career in politics has to be concerned with what's in their past, but there is no question that Americans have an appetite for redemption."

In fact, Bush himself has been a beneficiary of those sympathies. He has suffered little criticism from his conservative base after acknowledging that he drank too much in the past and is now a teetotaler.

Obama's partisan opponents and experts said it is too early to know whether the admissions will be a liability because the public seems to be enthusiastically embracing his openness at this point. What's more, they note that it is better for a politician to disclose his own transgressions, rather than be put on the defensive by revelations.

A senior Republican strategist who will be advising a GOP presidential candidate in 2008 said he did not see anything in the book that would be a "disqualifier," but he cautioned that Obama has not yet gone through an intense vetting process and that a problem could arise if there is more to his story than he has chosen to share. The strategist, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, also suggested that there will be high tolerance for marijuana use among voters because many baby boomers probably tried the drug in the '60s.

"Who's going to cast that first stone?" asked Anita Dunn, a veteran Democratic political consultant, who has advised Obama's political committee.

Rhodes Cook, a independent political analyst, said that Democratic primary voters, who are typically more liberal, would be more understanding of his drug use -- "and if he makes it to a general election, it will be old news."

Obama's supporters said his admissions in the book could work to his advantage.

"I think it will be received as refreshing," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Obama's fellow Democrat from Illinois. "If you compare similar books, many of us in the political business tend to have selective memories."

Obama writes extensively about his struggle to come to terms with being a black man whose African father returned to Kenya when he was 2, leaving him to be raised by his white Kansas-born mother and grandparents in Hawaii. He describes an identity crisis arising from his realization that his life was shaped by both a loving white family and a world that saw in him the negative stereotypes frequently ascribed to young black men. He recounts a search of self that took him from high school in Hawaii to Columbia University, and then to the streets of Chicago as a community organizer.

"We were always playing on the white man's court . . . by the white man's rules," he writes. "If the principal, or the coach, or a teacher . . . wanted to spit in your face, he could, because he had the power and you didn't. . . . The only thing you could choose was withdrawal into a smaller and smaller coil of rage.

"And the final irony: should you refuse this defeat and lash out at your captors . . . they would have a name for that too. Paranoid. Militant."

Obama has not expressed any regrets for his candor. In a preface to the new edition, he says that he would tell the same story today "even if certain passages have proven to be inconvenient politically."

In the book, Obama acknowledges that he used cocaine as a high school student but rejected heroin. "Pot had helped, and booze; maybe a little blow when you could afford it. Not smack, though," he says.

In an interview during his Senate race two years ago, Obama said he admitted using drugs because he thought it was important for "young people who are already in circumstances that are far more difficult than mine to know that you can make mistakes and still recover.

"I think that, at this stage, my life is an open book, literally and figuratively," he said. "Voters can make a judgment as to whether dumb things that I did when I was a teenager are relevant to the work that I've done since that time."

Barack Obama Can Be Whatever He Wants To Be (HILL)

Those who deride Sen. Barack Obama's (D-Ill.) lack of experience and criticize the broad generalities and banalities that festoon his best-selling book miss the key point: His inexperience is an asset because he enters national politics as a blank canvas on which he can paint whatever he chooses. With only two years in the Senate, he is less like a politician running for president than like a general — think Eisenhower in 1952 or even the abortive candidacy of Colin Powell in 1995 — or a businessman, like Ross Perot in 1992.

It's not that he doesn't have a record. It's that the record doesn't really matter because it is so short. His Senate tenure is so abbreviated that he can be whatever he says he is, not just as a political contrivance to get elected, but genuinely to articulate a philosophy and make it his guiding principle both while seeking office and serving in it. He's that virginal.

So far, Obama seems very conscious that his liberal, party-line voting record is not a good foundation for his national ambitions. He seems aware that the country wants more of a post-partisan, embodying the consensus to which Americans have come over these recent dangerous and bitter years.

American politics alternates between periods in which we welcome partisan debate and those in which we demand consensus and conclusion. Confronted by new issues we turn to the left and to the right and ask each side to develop its ideas and flesh out its alternative for our consideration. During these times, moderates and synthesizers are doomed to defeat since they seem to ignore the problem, while polarizing figures take over. But once the debate has run its course, we make our collective national decisions and are no longer in the mood for unending debate. We want our will to be done by our elected officials with no more quarreling or sniping.

Obama has the opportunity to embody the emerging consensus, a broad national agreement reached from observation of trial and error over the past half decade. The bloody futility of our efforts to build a nation in Iraq have left us still committed to aggressive efforts to hunt down terrorists but determined to extricate ourselves from the mire. The effectiveness of our homeland security efforts and our concomitant horror at instances of mistaken imprisonment and unnecessarily intrusive government investigations have led us to demand a balance between aggressive investigation and protection of civil liberties. We want terrorists caught, interrogated, and locked up, but not tortured or sadistically humiliated.

Obama's book reflects an intuitive grasp of this emerging consensus even if his voting record does not signal his agreement with it.

But if the Illinois senator decides to articulate this synthesis, the question will be whether he can find sufficient traction on the center-left to give his candidacy viability. He will have to compete for that ground with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), but her reputation for strident advocacy and take-no-prisoners partisanship will likely give him an edge in going after Bill Clinton's former constituents among the New Democrats. And Obama enjoys an ethnic and demographic base that can augment his converts among moderate white Democrats.

John Edwards, for all of the eloquence of his announcement statement, is ultimately running on the issue of national poverty against a woman and an African-American. That's not going to work. His campaign might have gained traction against another field of candidates, but it is unlikely that he can get it on track against these two particular opponents.

So we wait for Barack Obama to define himself. If he runs to the left, he will be a worthy successor to Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton. If he runs to the center, he might be a successor to Bill Clinton and George W. Bush. He might just make it to the White House.

The Audacity Of Nope (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The setting: Late January, outside a Chicago housing project where Sen. Barack Obama once worked as an organizer. The will-he, won't-he debate about the Illinois Democrat has reached a fever pitch.

DOJ_NMG_0110557

In the grip of Obama-mania, the networks are poised to break into live programming to cover the announcement. Flanked by his wife and two young daughters, the 45-year-old Obama steps to the microphone.

"My fellow Americans. There's been a lot of talk about whether I'll be a presidential candidate in 2008 -- some of it encouraged by me. I've made my decision, and I won't be running."

Boos and yells of "No!" from the crowd. Obama raises his hands to quiet them.

"Please. I understand your disappointment. To tell you the truth, a part of me is disappointed, too.

"Now that I've gotten the headline out of the way, and let these folks file their leads" -- here Obama gestures to a throng of reporters --"let me tell you a little bit about my thinking.

"First, I have to say how overwhelmed I have been by the reaction of people like you, who had faith enough in me to urge me to run, and faith enough in the American people to believe that I could win. You made it awfully tempting."

Obama flashes a wide smile, pauses. Shouts of "Give in!" and "You can still change your mind!" from the crowd.

"I could tell you the usual: that I decided not to run because I wanted to spend more time with my wonderful wife and children -- that I wanted to be there for my daughters in a way that my father never was for me.

"That would be true, but it wouldn't be the whole story.

"The truth is I don't feel ready" -- another smile and pause-- "right now."

Shouts of "2012! 2012!"

"Of course, no one, deep inside his or -- another smile-- her soul, truly feels ready to be president, and no one truly can be completely prepared for the job. I've spent my life -- as a community organizer, as a civil rights lawyer, as a state senator, in the United States Senate -- working for the same goals that would motivate me as president.

"But the question I kept coming back to was this: Would I be the best president I could be if I were elected in 2008? Or would I be a better president if I waited and learned and served and ran at some point down the road?"

Shouts of "2012! 2012!"

"Maybe that point will come; maybe it won't. In the meantime, I can promise you this: I will work my heart out for you, for the Democratic Party and for whoever is the Democratic nominee in 2008."

Shouts of "Obama! Obama!"

Â·

Let me acknowledge: This isn't the speech I expect Obama to give. Every indication is that he's planning to run. But this, or something like it, is the speech that I'd love to hear.

This is against professional interest: A Democratic race with Obama would be a lot more interesting. And Obama isn't any less experienced than, say, John Edwards was four years ago, after a career as a trial lawyer and just a few more years of experience in the Senate than the Illinois Democrat has now.

But I do think that Obama would be a better candidate, and ultimately a better president, in 2012 or 2016 than in 2008. He will have learned more -- about the world, about domestic policy, about how to maneuver successfully in Washington.

Yes, more years in the Senate offer more chances for individual votes to be deployed against him in 30-second TV ads, but they also offer the opportunity that Obama hasn't yet had: to set out and achieve legislative goals. Teaming up with Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) to bring transparency to government spending through a searchable database is nice, but it's no platform for a presidential campaign.

The main argument for Obama to run in 2008 involves the shelf-life theory of politics: that the Obama magic might fade, that an opportunity this good might never present itself again. Maybe, but I think that Obama has more promise than that, more staying power and more self-knowledge.

"My attitude about something like the presidency is that you don't want to just be the president," he told Men's Vogue. "You want to be a great president."

If so, Obama should ask himself: Wouldn't he be more likely to achieve that goal if he had the self-confidence -- the audacity, really -- to choose to sit it out in 2008?

Four Speeches To Set Priorities For Governor's Second Term (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0110558

By Peter Nicholas, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

Schwarzenegger's focus in the next week will be on infrastructure, healthcare insurance and the environment.

SACRAMENTO — Over the next seven days, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, new crutches close at hand, will give a series of speeches that lay out his policy ambitions for the next four years: broader access to healthcare coverage, cleaner skies and improved roads.

The governor, still recovering from a broken right leg suffered in a holiday skiing accident, will deliver his inaugural address outlining a long-term vision for California when he is sworn in for a second term Friday. He is also expected on Monday to put forward his plan for revamping the state's healthcare system.

The next day, he will make his annual State of the State speech, and his budget proposal is scheduled the day after.

In these four speeches, Schwarzenegger will offer his most concrete proposals yet for insuring the millions of Californians who lack healthcare coverage, the centerpiece of his 2007 agenda. But he also hopes to establish a legacy as a builder on a par with former Gov. Pat Brown.

Schwarzenegger wants to trigger another round of public construction, on top of the $43-billon bond program that voters approved in the November election. He will try to resurrect pieces of the construction package that he rolled out a year ago when he initially released his infrastructure plan: new prisons, courts and water storage. The Legislature said no to those projects.

"The governor proposed a series of infrastructure improvements last year, some of which were acted upon, some not," said his communications director, Adam Mendelsohn. "We still have water storage issues that need to be addressed. We still have a great deal of transportation issues that need to be addressed."

Normally an icon of fitness, Schwarzenegger begins his new term in the early phase of a convalescence expected to last two months. He had surgery on his broken right leg Dec. 26 and was released Saturday from St. John's Health Center in Santa Monica.

The governor said then in a statement that he was "feeling good" and planned to "tackle important issues like making healthcare more affordable, investing in and improving our infrastructure and protecting our environment."

Hoping to assuage concerns of Republican lawmakers worried about the state's mounting debt, Schwarzenegger wants private industry to pick up part of the construction tab through partnerships with government.

For example, business groups eager to speed the flow of goods might cover the costs of new roads if the state, in turn, gets the projects built more quickly.

And prisons would be a huge investment. The governor has already announced that he wants to ease rampant overcrowding by adding 78,000 new beds, at a cost of $10.9 billion.

After halting attempts to cast himself as a reformer, Schwarzenegger is determined to reinvent himself as a champion of spacious new freeways suited to a swelling population. For inspiration, he has been reading speeches that Brown gave as governor in the 1960s.

California added college campuses, built thousands of miles of freeway and expanded its water storage capacity on Brown's watch.

None of what Schwarzenegger is planning would be easy to pull off. The state's financial picture is grim.

Though unexpected revenues have shrunk the record shortfalls that California faced under former Gov. Gray Davis, the state still spends more than it takes in. It is estimated that when the new fiscal year begins July 1, the deficit will be $5.5 billion.

Aggressive borrowing in the Schwarzenegger era has also boosted California's debt. By 2009 the state will have borrowed so much that 8.4% of the budget will go toward paying off debt. Wall Street experts say the figure should not exceed 6%.

Elizabeth Hill, the Legislature's nonpartisan budget analyst, wrote in a November report: "California should be running projected operating surpluses instead of deficits."

And the governor confronts a dicey political climate.

His fellow Republicans want him to cut the deficit. They also say they will oppose any plan that saddles business with new healthcare costs or drains the state budget to cover millions of the uninsured.

"We have to be very cautious and go slow," said Michael Villines (R-Clovis), leader of the Assembly's Republicans.

Though Democrats control the Legislature, Schwarzenegger must win support from his fellow Republicans to reach the two-thirds majority needed to pass the state budget.

As the governor ingratiated himself with Democratic leaders last year, many Republicans stewed silently, aware that open insurrection might undermine his reelection prospects. Now that the race is over, the fissures are more visible. Assemblyman George Plescia of San Diego was ousted as GOP leader two days after the election, in part because Republicans wanted someone in the job who would stand up forcefully to the governor.

"Republican attitudes toward him are hardening," said Mike Schroeder, former chairman of the state Republican Party. "In many respects, the Assembly and Senate Republican caucuses are going to become the opposition party" to the governor.

Senate leader Don Perata (D-Oakland) predicted that Republican "restiveness" would be Schwarzenegger's biggest challenge.

"It will not be the Democrats; it will be how to corral the Republicans," he said.

As a guide to Schwarzenegger's intentions, the State of the State speech has proved prophetic. In his 2005 address, the governor took a combative tone, warning the Legislature that if he didn't get his way, he would take his proposals directly to voters in a special election. That is how events played out, but his appeal to voters failed.

Last year, a humbled Schwarzenegger gave a speech spelling out his intent to collaborate more with legislators.

What followed was widely seen as a productive legislative session in which Schwarzenegger signed bills raising the minimum wage, tamping down greenhouse gas emissions and offering discounted medicine.

This year, aides said, Schwarzenegger will cleave to a similar script. In his appearances during the next week, he'll promise to work in a bipartisan way, they said.

Apart from all the brick-and-mortar projects, he'll urge development of new energy sources, including bio-fuels, staking out a centrist path in an effort to reconcile business development and environmental protection.

"If things go well for him in the next term," said Daniel Mitchell, professor of management and public policy at UCLA, "that would give him a strong place to run for senator."

Schwarzenegger's Gay Marriage Misstep (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

IT COULD have been different. If Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had signed a bill in 2005 legalizing same-sex marriage instead of vetoing it, the California Supreme Court would have been spared the task of deciding, as it probably will this year, whether a voter-approved ban violates the state Constitution's guarantee of equal protection under the law.

But Schwarzenegger said he had to respect Proposition 22, approved in 2000, which states: "Only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California." Whether committed same-sex couples will be relieved of second-class status now depends on the state Supreme Court. And as Superior Court Judge Richard A. Kramer's ruling notes, the state Constitution trumps any ballot question and entitles same-sex couples to what he called "the last step in the equation: the right to marriage itself."

In other states, including Massachusetts, courts have focused on the "incidents" of marriage — such as joint ownership of property, shared custody and survivors' benefits. Kramer, however, placed the emphasis where it should be: on the word "marriage."

There's the rub for many Californians who are otherwise willing to accept domestic partnerships or civil unions. Political operatives have a term for this position: ABM, or "anything but marriage." The fixation on the M-word is more emotional than logical, and no doubt reflects the fact that the word "marriage" refers to both a civil partnership and a religious rite.

The M-word certainly makes the politics more difficult. Massachusetts is the only state where same-sex civil marriage is legal — and even there, the Legislature took the first step Tuesday toward allowing a popular vote on a constitutional amendment banning it. At the federal level, Congress enacted the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, defining marriage as between a man and a woman and saying that states need not recognize same-sex marriages contracted elsewhere. Forty-five states prohibit same-sex marriage in their laws or constitutions; seven passed anti-gay-marriage referendums in November.

Given the political appeal of ABM, it's remarkable — and praiseworthy — that California legislators voted to extend to same-sex couples both the symbolic and practical advantages of marriage. But Schwarzenegger's veto requires the state Supreme Court to consider the different question of whether ABM is constitutional.

This procedural history gives lie to the claims of opponents of same-sex marriage who insist that it is the invention of "activist judges." It should also guide the state Supreme Court to a decision to adopt Kramer's view that California's previous acknowledgment of same-sex unions "points to the conclusion that there is no rational state interest in denying them the rites of marriage as well."

Jay P. Lefkowitz? (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

During his first summer in the White House, a month before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that would shape his presidency, President Bush went on prime-time television to announce that he would allow federal money to pay for a limited amount of research on stem cells from human embryos.

The architect of that policy, navigating ethically and politically treacherous terrain, was a litigator named Jay P. Lefkowitz who was working as general counsel in the White House's Office of Management and Budget. Eight months later, Bush would promote Lefkowitz to deputy assistant to the president overseeing domestic policy. Many White House watchers expected that the cerebral neoconservative, whose judgment the president so clearly trusted, would rise further still.

Instead, Lefkowitz decamped from the White House -- and Washington -- in 2003. And although he is reluctant to discuss it, he has twice since then declined to return to top West Wing jobs.

Lefkowitz moved his family to New York, his wife's home town, where they enrolled their three children in a yeshiva, an intensive Jewish school, and became heavily involved in the Orthodox community.

He went back to his old law firm, Kirkland & Ellis, where he has a partnership and an eclectic mix of cases. He has been representing a large generic-drug manufacturer in lawsuits against the Food and Drug Administration (he beat the government twice); a criminal defendant in a massive tax-shelter fraud case the Justice Department is bringing against the accounting firm KPMG; and corporations such as Verizon and General Motors in commercial litigation.

"I am as engaged right now in the litigation that I'm involved in as I was when I was dealing with immigration issues or stem cell issues or helping to set up the 9/11 Victim Compensation Fund," Lefkowitz said.

He has had to weigh his two worlds. "He's at least twice been approached and asked to go back," said a former administration official who knows Lefkowitz and is close to the White House. The first time would have been as deputy chief of staff after Joshua B. Bolten moved from that job to budget director. The official, who spoke about personnel matters on the condition of anonymity, said the second would have been another senior West Wing position after Bolten became Bush's chief of staff last spring.

Lefkowitz still has a part-time role in government -- and the president's ear. He said he was in Jerusalem during Passover in the spring of 2004 when his cellphone rang. It was Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asking whether he would be interested in becoming the president's special envoy on human rights in North Korea.

Devoting about one-fifth of his prodigious working hours to the task, he reports to Rice but has, he said, met with Bush "several times."

After The Rip Van Winkle Years (NYT)

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

The mood at Eliot Spitzer's Jan. 1 inauguration was exuberant, and that was hardly surprising. Few politicians are offered the opportunity that greets Mr. Spitzer as he becomes New York's 54th governor.

Mr. Spitzer, who has built his career on reform, is arriving in a state capital that desperately needs it. The comptroller was forced to resign after pleading guilty to a felony. The Senate majority leader is being investigated by the F.B.I. for his outside consulting work. Another state senator is charged with stealing state money, and it took a state judge to force legislators to reveal how they spend hundreds of millions of dollars a year in taxpayer money.

New York's government has slipped from a beacon for other states into a cautionary tale. So when Mr. Spitzer spoke of change in his inaugural address — an end to government "that works for those who hold office, not those who put them there" — he hit precisely the right note. With a passion and energy that Albany has not seen in years, this governor has promised to wake what he has labeled the "Rip van Winkle" government of the last decade.

Mr. Spitzer started on the right foot by issuing five executive orders to upgrade the ethics of the executive branch with rules that should go without saying, but in Albany never do — like not using state property or personnel for personal use, and not taking gifts from people who do business with the state.

By cleaning his own house first, Mr. Spitzer will have the moral high ground as he does battle to get New York's recalcitrant lawmakers to do the same. After years of mostly dozing off, they require a long list: redistricting reform, campaign finance reform, ethics reform, and budget reform, including more sunlight on how $114 billion a year is being spent.

Getting reform through the Legislature will be hard enough, but Mr. Spitzer faces equally tough challenges in dealing with budget deficits and education needs and keeping the state's high taxes in check. In his inaugural address, he pointedly said that he does not believe in "government as a heavy hand that can cure all our ills," a sign that some of his Democratic allies might not have as much clout as they are expecting.

Mr. Spitzer began setting his new tone on day one, with his "people's inauguration." The official swearing-in was outdoors, public invited. He threw open the governor's mansion for the first time since most people waiting in line could remember. Instead of a fancy ball for fat-cat contributors, he spent the night of his inauguration at a free concert by James Taylor and other crowd favorites.

For the first time in years, we see a figure poised to rattle Albany's do-little establishment, to air out a dark, closed government and to try to convert New York's Legislature to the higher purposes of public service. New Yorkers can only hope Mr. Spitzer makes it all happen.

Keep The Steel Rising (WSJ)

By Brian M. Carney

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Eliot Spitzer has been telling us for -- well, it seems like forever -- that "on Day 1, everything changes." Here's one thing that shouldn't: the Ground Zero rebuilding plan.

The current master plan for those 16 acres in lower Manhattan isn't perfect. In fact, it's real far from perfect. It barely qualifies as OK. But it has this virtue -- it exists. And it is being built. Slowly, haltingly, yes. But after far too long, things are happening downtown. Beams are reaching skyward, or at least aspiring to reach ground level from the bottom of the pit 70 feet below. Buildings have been designed, street grids have been laid -- on paper, anyway.

Mr. Spitzer, the new governor of New York, says he intends to take a "fresh look" at Ground Zero and the Freedom Tower. I say, look all you want, guv. Come down here and stare at the site. I'll even offer to join him under the scaffolding that hangs over that alley formerly known as Liberty Street. Come look. Just don't do anything to slow reconstruction down here.

Along with thousands of other New Yorkers, I walk past Ground Zero every work day, and I look at it all the time. This has given me time to reflect, and I've decided that New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin was right -- it's a hole in the ground. No question about it. Only rebuilding can change that sorry fact.

I don't particularly like the Freedom Tower. Its design is uninspiring. The economic case for it is dubious at best. I have moral reservations about trying to force public-sector employees to work in a building that no private-sector firm will touch with a 10-foot pole. But as a view from my office window, it would sure beat a hole in the ground.

I'm confident I'm not alone in this. Tourists may flock to the fences that gird Ground Zero, but I don't detect a sizable constituency for holey-ness down here. People whose lives are affected by the mess downtown just want things to stop getting worse and start getting better. Which means building something.

The trouble is that, while everyone's in favor of building something, a lot of people differ on what should be built, and where, and so on. It's time we moved beyond that. The plan we've got is the only one we've got, and any alternative is likely to anger as many people who are now content as to content those now angry.

The real act of leadership here would be to declare that we're moving forward, that this scar in the fabric of Manhattan is going to be repaired. So, look all you want, Mr. Spitzer. But keep the concrete mixers mixing and the steel rising. New Yorkers have waited too long as it is.

Mr. Carney is a member of The Wall Street Journal's Editorial Board.

Pat Robertson Predicts 'Mass Killing' (AP)

In what has become an annual tradition of prognostications, religious broadcaster Pat Robertson said Tuesday God has told him that a terrorist attack on the United States would result in "mass killing" late in 2007.

"I'm not necessarily saying it's going to be nuclear," he said during his news-and-talk television show "The 700 Club" on the Christian Broadcasting Network. "The Lord didn't say nuclear. But I do believe it will be something like that."

Robertson said God told him during a recent prayer retreat that major cities and possibly millions of people will be affected by the attack, which should take place sometime after September.

Robertson said God also told him that the U.S. only feigns friendship with Israel and that U.S. policies are pushing Israel toward "national suicide."

Robertson suggested in January 2006 that God punished then-Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon with a stroke for ceding Israeli-controlled land to the Palestinians.

The broadcaster predicted in January 2004 that President Bush would easily win re-election. Bush won 51 percent of the vote that fall, beating Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts.

In 2005, Robertson predicted that Bush would have victory after victory in his second term. He said Social Security reform proposals would be approved and Bush would nominate conservative judges to federal courts.

Lawmakers confirmed Bush's 2005 nominations of John Roberts and Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. But the president's Social Security initiative was stalled.

"I have a relatively good track record," he said. "Sometimes I miss."

In May, Robertson said God told him that storms and possibly a tsunami were to crash into America's coastline in 2006. Even though the U.S. was not hit with a tsunami, Robertson on Tuesday cited last spring's heavy rains and flooding in New England as partly fulfilling the prediction.

Iranian Leader Scorns U.N. Sanctions (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad scorned U.N Security Council sanctions imposed against Iran, telling a crowd Tuesday that Iran had humiliated the United States in the past and would do so again.

Speaking in the southwestern provincial capital of Ahvaz, Ahmadinejad said the Security Council's resolution last month was invalid and had left the world body's reputation in tatters.

The council voted unanimously to bar all countries from selling materials and technology to Iran that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs. It also froze the assets of 10 Iranian companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

"Let the world know that from the Iranian nation's point of view, this resolution has no validity," Ahmadinejad said.

He said the United States was the main power behind the resolution, and warned Washington: "I want you to know that the Iranian nation has humiliated you many times, and it will humiliate you in future."

The U.S. has led the drive to stop Iran from enriching uranium — a process that produces the material for either nuclear reactors or bombs. Iran denies that it seeks to build atomic weapons, saying its nuclear program is limited to the generation of electricity.

Ahmadinejad said the sanctions were not important but were part of a campaign of psychological warfare against Iran that was designed to provoke dissent within the country.

Recalling the West's support for Iraq, then ruled by Saddam Hussein, during its eight-year war with Iran in the 1980s, he said: "If all the powers that supported Saddam in his war against Iran were to regroup and confront Iran again, Iranians would deliver a historic slap in their face."

Ahmadinejad said Iran had done everything it could to prove that its nuclear program is peaceful, but the West — in the name of opposing nuclear weapons — was trying to thwart Iran's development.

"We have tried all legal, wise and logical ways to convince these corrupt and selfish powers," he said.

While Ahmadinejad has repeatedly attacked the Security Council resolution, he has avoided any public comment on the results of Dec. 15 municipal elections, in which his political allies were heavily defeated.

The polls were seen as an electoral test of Ahmadinejad's presidency, and the success of his opponents suggested that voters want him to pay more attention to domestic issues rather than foreign policy.

Some people in the crowd in Ahvaz on Tuesday tried to remind the president of the need to address domestic problems. State television showed a placard carried by one spectator that read: "Inflation, unemployment, insecurity, drug addiction have desiccated the tree of the revolution."

Inflation is officially at 12 percent but thought to be much higher, and an estimated 3 million people are unemployed.

Russia Anti-aircraft Weapons Sales To Syria, Iran On Schedule (AFP)

AFP, January 3, 2007

Controversial Russian contracts to sell anti-aircraft weapons to Syria and Iran are being fulfilled on schedule Russian officials said.

At least half of the 29 Tor-M1 missile systems bought by Iran for 1.4 billion dollars (1.06 billion euros) had been delivered, state-run ITAR-TASS quoted an unnamed source at the defence ministry as saying Tuesday.

"We are actively carrying out deliveries of the system to Iran. At least 50 percent of the contract has been delivered," the official was quoted as saying.

The air defence systems are being stationed around Iran's civilian nuclear sites, according to ITAR-TASS.

The United States, which is leading international pressure against Iran's nuclear programme, strongly resisted the contract and imposed sanctions against Russian jetmaker Sukhoi and arms exporter Rosoboronexport.

Meanwhile, Interfax news agency quoted Valery Kashin, head of weapons maker Engineering Design Bureau, as saying that Russia met all its commitments in 2006 under the contract to supply Syria with the Strelets anti-aircraft system. He gave no details.

Israel spoke out against the 2005 deal, claiming that Syria would pass on the system, which fires Igla ground-to-air rockets, to Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon.

Details about the quantity and cost of the Strelets contract have not been made public.

Troops May Leave Somalia 'in Weeks' (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Ethiopian troops could be pulled out of Somalia "within a few weeks", Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister, said on Tuesday, adding that the victors of Somalia's two-week war were now "mopping up remnants" of the country's former Islamist leaders.

Addis Ababa, which backs Somalia's weak transitional government, launched an offensive on December 24 against the Islamist movement which has controlled much of the country's south since June.

After Ethiopia sent in thousands of troops, supported by tanks and fighter jets, the Islamists retreated rapidly and on Monday fled Kismayo port, their last stronghold.

But despite promises of a swift withdrawal, doubts remain about when Mr Meles would be willing or able to pull back his troops.

DOJ_NMG_0110564

Ethiopia is believed to have had troops in Somalia for months before it announced its military presence in December and Ali Mohamed Gedi, the Somali prime minister, on Tuesday said the forces should stay for months until the country had been pacified.

Ethiopia faces a painful dilemma: if it withdraws too quickly it could leave a security vacuum in an often threatening neighbour that has endured 15 years of chaos and violence.

However, the longer the troops stay, the more likely the Ethiopians could be seen as an occupation force or become embroiled in a guerrilla war with the remaining Islamist forces.

Some observers said that while Addis Ababa had legitimate security concerns, it had broken international protocols by invading Somalia. But Washington, which also accused the Islamist movement of including al-Qaeda suspects, is believed to have given tacit support to Ethiopia to mount its offensive.

The military operation will also be a drain on Ethiopia's meagre resources. The country maintains one of Africa's largest armies, estimated by an Ethiopian analyst to be about 150,000 troops, down from a figure of up to 300,000 during its 1998-2000 border war with Eritrea.

But the impoverished country of 77m people is dependent on donor funding and Mr Meles' government has agreed to keep military spending at a flat cash rate of 3bn birr ($355m, €269m, £181m) a year in recent years.

Aid donors will be monitoring to see if there has been any rise in defence spending. "We will be looking very carefully to see if Somalia has had an impact," said one western diplomat in Addis Ababa. "If it has, we will take a very serious view of that."

Regardless of the aid advantages of a swift withdrawal from Somalia, it is likely to take weeks before a peacekeeping mission could deploy and fill any security vacuum.

Diplomats and the Somali government have called for an African-led operation, but it is unclear who would finance or contribute troops to the mission.

An official with the cash-strapped African Union, which is already overstretched providing peacekeeping troops in Sudan's Darfur region, told the Financial Times the organisation was still internally discussing proposals.

Ethiopian Premier Says His Troops Won't Stay In Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Jan. 2 — Prime Minister Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia said Tuesday that his country, one of the poorest in the world, could not afford to keep troops in Somalia much longer and that it was ill equipped to play the role of peacekeeper there.

Two hours after he spoke, two Ethiopian soldiers were gunned down in an ambush in southern Somalia in one of the first strikes of an anticipated anti-Ethiopian guerrilla campaign.

According to residents in Jilib, about 250 miles southwest of Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, a fighter for the Islamist forces, who were routed last week by Ethiopian-led troops, had shot two Ethiopian soldiers while they were crossing a bridge. Witnesses said the fighter then dashed into town and was quickly surrounded by Ethiopian troops, who killed him.

"It was a suicide mission," said Mohammed Subiye, a farmer in Jilib.

The Islamist forces, which in the span of one week went from ruling much of Somalia to fleeing into the bush, have vowed to fight a guerrilla insurgency against the Ethiopians, whom they consider infidel invaders.

But Mr. Meles said he did not plan to have his troops to remain in Somalia for much longer, possibly only a few more weeks. The troops were dispatched to neutralize the rising regional threat posed by the Islamists, he said, and now international peacekeepers are needed to bring order to a country that has been synonymous with anarchy for 15 years.

"We don't have the money to take this burden individually," Mr. Meles said during a speech to Ethiopia's Parliament.

Diplomats in the region are hurrying to cobble together an African peacekeeping solution, but despite murmurs of commitment from several countries, including Uganda, South Africa and Nigeria, a force has yet to materialize.

Somalia is far from stable, with many heavy weapons still in the hands of warlords, and the country's turmoil is likely to dissuade many nations from volunteering troops.

On Tuesday, Ali Mohammed Gedi, Somalia's transitional prime minister, reiterated his plea for the nation's many gunmen to turn in their weapons. But few seemed to be listening. The collection points across Mogadishu remained empty, and many young men defiantly vowed to keep their guns.

Meanwhile, the remnants of the once-fierce Islamist army continued to flee south from Kismayo, the port city 100 miles from the Kenyan border that had been a final stronghold until the Islamist military definitively collapsed there on Monday.

Kenyan authorities said 10 fighters were apprehended on Monday as they tried to slip through the border disguised as refugees. Eight had Eritrean passports while two had Canadian passports, said Alfred Mutua, a spokesman for the Kenyan government. All of them were carrying briefcases packed with cash.

"They definitely didn't look like refugees," Mr. Mutua said.

Mr. Mutua said that the suspects remained in Kenyan custody and that they would probably be returned to Somalia to face charges under the transitional government, though it has not yet set up a justice system.

The Islamists tried to improve their military prospects by calling for a global jihad against Ethiopia, a country with a long Christian history. But in the end, American officials said, only a few hundred foreign fighters answered the call, the bulk of them from Eritrea, Ethiopia's archenemy.

Still, the Islamists were widely believed to have been sheltering several wanted terrorists, and American officials said they were hoping to use the swift collapse of the Islamist forces as an opportunity to capture men they have been chasing for years.

Ships from the Fifth Fleet of the United States Navy, based in Bahrain, have increased patrols off Somalia's coast to prevent any suspects from escaping.

"Yes, we have a presence out there," said Lt. Denise Garcia, a spokeswoman for the Fifth Fleet.

So far, though, no suspects have been apprehended.

Somalia continues to be a work in progress. The country's transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, has yet to set foot in the capital, and only a select few officials of the transitional government have returned to it. Many of them seem to be pulling in wildly different directions.

On Tuesday, Hussein Mohammed Aideed, the interior minister and son of a notorious warlord, announced that he would like to erase the 1,000-mile long border between Somalia and Ethiopia.

"We should unite, just like the Europeans," Mr. Aideed said at a news conference. "One money. One passport. One security."

Many Somalis consider Ethiopia a historic enemy and were appalled by the suggestion.

"All I can say is that the interior minister is entitled to his opinion," said Abdirahman Dinari, the spokesman for the transitional government. "But he does not speak on behalf of the government."

Ethiopian Troops Leave Security In Mogadishu To City's Residents (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 2 -- The sandy road from airstrip K-50 is littered with the remnants of roadblocks, heaps of pushed-aside stones left over from when warlords balkanized this coastal capital, and rusted metal gates where Islamic militias took charge from the warlords.

On Tuesday, clusters of Ethiopian troops were here and there on the road into the city, leaning against gray crumbling walls or passing in trucks along wasted yellow cornfields still sopping from recent floods.

Within the city's borders, the Ethiopian troops who chased out the country's Islamic Courts movement on behalf of Somalia's weak transitional government were hardly visible.

Six days after the transitional government took hold, very little security was evident beyond that which Somalis have grown accustomed to providing for themselves: roving pickup trucks filled with armed teenagers, and AK-47-toting militiamen who guard the city block by block, and clan by clan.

DOJ_NMG_0110566

It was the first day after Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi demanded that thousands of former Islamic fighters and citizens in general surrender their weapons or be forcibly disarmed. But with the ability of Gedi's government to provide security in doubt, almost no one complied.

Only a few spectators showed up at the points the government had set up to collect guns.

In an interview, the country's interior minister, Hussein Farah Aideed, said lawmakers would return this week to their town of exile, Baidoa, to approve Gedi's declaration of martial law and a plan to allow 90 days -- instead of Gedi's original timeline of three days -- to disarm militias.

In what amounted to an appeal for outside help, Aideed also conceded that the transitional government was weak. "We have a symbolic government. Ministries we don't have, a military we don't have," he said, sitting in shirt and tie inside a house fortified with his personal set of guards slinging assault rifles. "We're limited."

Aideed is the son of Mohamed Farah Aideed, a Somali warlord targeted by U.S. military forces in a failed raid in 1993 that led to the deaths of 18 American soldiers.

In a densely populated neighborhood of Mogadishu, people still walk past the rusted parts of the U.S. Black Hawk helicopters shot down in that incident. They buy mangoes next to the rusted-out shells of tanks. They go about life in a city of salty air and bombed-out buildings and the leftover grace of old Italian arches.

On Tuesday, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi reiterated that he would withdraw his troops soon, while Gedi appealed to the 53-country African Union to accelerate efforts to deploy troops to Somalia.

Perhaps thousands of militiamen who fought for the vanquished Islamic Courts movement have melted back into the city's maze-like neighborhoods, each now controlled by clans and sub-clans and sub-sub-clans. There is lingering tension around the city that nothing is settled yet, and fears remain that the Islamic fighters could reemerge in a guerrilla-style war against the government that ousted them.

Aideed said the most hardened fighters had fled south with their leaders along the coast toward the Kenyan border, where they were being pursued by Ethiopian troops. The group is thought to include three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, and the U.S. Navy was patrolling Somalia's coast to help prevent escapes by sea.

The fighters have vanished into an area thick with mangrove forests, and Aideed said that finding them would be difficult even for the best-trained soldiers.

On Monday, Kenyan authorities arrested 10 foreigners suspected of being Islamic fighters as they attempted to slip across the border.

Kenyan President Mwai Kibaki said in a statement that his country would not provide refuge to people seeking to undermine regional stability.

Some analysts have said, however, that for political reasons, Kenyan authorities might give refuge to certain members of the Islamic movement in an effort to avoid trouble with their own substantial population of Somalis who might be sympathetic to the exiled fighters.

Somali Disarmament Begins Slowly (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia — A government-mandated disarmament program here got under way Tuesday without much of a bang.

At one designated weapons drop-off point in the Somali capital, bored-looking Ethiopian soldiers mulled about with little to do. A second collection site, nestled atop a bluff overlooking the Indian Ocean, closed early because "no one showed up," according to a Somali government soldier.

The disarmament program is the first major test of Somalia's transitional government since its troops and Ethiopian allies defeated Islamic fighters and seized control of this capital, a city so awash with guns that most government officials were previously afraid to even visit.

Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi on Monday set a three-day deadline for gun collection, threatening to use force after that to pacify the city.

But if Tuesday's turnout was any indication, the government is facing a steep challenge in convincing Mogadishu residents to part with their weapons. The campaign is also reigniting long-standing clan rivalries and distrust, which are certain to play a big part in the nation's turnaround.

Ever since the government announced the disarmament program, the streets have been abuzz with debate over whether it will succeed. Though most support disarmament in theory, those with guns call it a Catch-22 situation: The government wants to round up weapons before dispatching more soldiers in the capital, while residents don't want to give up their guns until they're assured that troops can keep the peace.

The presence of Ethiopian soldiers, who helped chase off the Islamists, only complicate the issue. The two nations have a history of warfare and many Somalis fear that the Ethiopians are attempting to occupy their country.

"I will never give my gun to the Ethiopians," said one young man, who like many did not want to be identified for fear that the government might come and take his gun. "They are the enemy."

Others cited financial considerations. Assault rifles and machine guns in Mogadishu range from several hundred dollars to several thousand, representing the largest single asset many families own. For thousands of young men, carrying a gun and working as a militia member or security guard are the only job prospects available. But the government is not offering cash in exchange for the guns.

As a result, prices for weapons at Mogadishu's gun market plummeted in recent days as gun owners rush to sell their weapons rather than give them away to the government. AK-47 assault rifles dropped from $300 to $120.

Last June, the Islamic courts became the first local authority to sharply reduce the number of arms in the Mogadishu in nearly 16 years. Rather than collecting the weapons themselves, the courts set up regional, clan-based authorities to collect guns from their fellow clansmen.

But when Islamists fled Mogadishu a week ago, they opened their weapons stockpiles to the public, once again flooding the city with guns.

The current disarmament campaign is sparking familiar clan distrust. Most residents in Mogadishu are members of the Hawiye clan, considered Somalia's largest. But many Hawiye subclans, including the subclans of several warlords and Islamist leaders, are deeply skeptical of the transitional government. They say it's unfair to disarm Mogadishu without also collecting the guns from the rest of Somalia. Hawiye fear they will become vulnerable to attacks by other clans.

"I'm keeping my gun," said a 33-year-old former Islamic court official. "They should disarm the entire country at the same time."

He and other Hawiye also complained that President Abdullahi Yusuf is a member of the Darod, another major clan based originally in the north. Darod and Hawiye began fighting over control of Mogadishu after the 1991 fall of military dictator Mohamed Siad Barre. In the end, many Darod were killed or driven out of their homes. Now Hawiye in Mogadishu fear Yusuf, who has spoken disparagingly about their clan in the past, will use the disarmament program to take retribution.

"He's trying to favor his own people," said the former Islamic court official.

Clan experts say the government must first demonstrate that it is neutral before clan rivals will trust it.

"The only language the government can use to unite the clans of Somalia is to restore peace and order through justice and equality," said Sharif Mohamed Ali, an elder with the small Ashraf clan, which in the past has avoided the clan wars.

Somalia Tense After Islamists Vanish (CSM)

By Rob Crilly

The Christian Science Monitor, January 3, 2007

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA

For six months Somalia's Islamists used freelance warlord Mohamed Qanyare Afrah's home as one of their bases as they took over much of the country. They used his many battlewagons and held meetings in his living room.

Last week, they fled an onslaught led by troops from neighboring Ethiopia with Somalian government forces.

Mr. Qanyare is grateful but only up to a point. "What I say is Ethiopia should not interfere in Somalian politics," he says. "They can stay as long as they are fighting Al Qaeda - that is a problem for the entire region. But if they try to become involved in our politics then we will oppose them."

Ethiopia's preemptive offensive signals the opening of a new front in the global struggle against Islamist militants. And the speed of the Islamists' retreat is reminiscent of how insurgencies began in both Iraq and Afghanistan, say analysts. Now, victory may hinge upon whether warlords like Qanyare support occupying Ethiopian forces or the Islamists.

For now Qanyare says his opposition to Ethiopians would be political.

But his armored personnel carrier sits in silent threat outside his door. At his gate, a young boy holds a machine gun.

And 50 of his "technicals" - pickup trucks mounted with heavy-caliber machine guns - sit around the corner from the whitewashed house, six miles from Somalia's capital, Mogadishu. Bitter rivalry with Ethiopia

Ethiopian forces are not popular in this battle-scarred land. Many in Mogadishu see them as an invading force rather than a liberating power. This is due to a longstanding, bitter rivalry between Ethiopia - a country with a large Christian population - and mostly Muslim Somalia. The countries fought two wars in the last 45 years, and Somalia still lays claim to territories in Ethiopia.

Diplomats want an international peacekeeping force to replace Ethiopian troops.

But for now, Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi is reliant on Ethiopia's tanks and artillery to keep his fractious nation in line.

They propelled his meager government forces across Somalia and into the capital, which the Islamists held for more than six months, raising fears that an African Taliban would seek to make the Horn of Africa a haven for Al Qaeda.

Some analysts warn that Mr. Gedi is not doing enough to prepare for the Ethiopians' withdrawal - promised in a matter of weeks.

They warn that without the Ethiopians, his feeble government will be left trying to fill a political vacuum that could let in the return of the warlords and clan militias who held Somalia in anarchy for 15 years - or even allow the Islamists to rise again.

Already Mogadishu has returned to the fear and lawlessness it knew before the Union of Islamic Courts (UIC) imposed its version of order.

Tuesday, Gedi told journalists his foreign allies would not leave before their work was done.

"The Ethiopians will leave when we have cleared our territory of terrorists and when we have pacified our capital," he said.

That will take "a week, or weeks, or months, not more."

So far he is pursuing a two-pronged strategy to promote peace.

He has asked the African Union to send peacekeepers and has declared a three-day amnesty for gun owners to give up their firearms.

There were no takers at the Villa Baidoa Tuesday - an old presidential villa designated as one of two collection centers.

"We haven't even taken a pistol," said a Somalian government soldier.

In a city where AK-47s cost $150, most families and businesses rely on one for protection.

Arabey Ma'Alim Abdulle, who coordinates security in the donkey-clogged streets that make up Bakaara market, says he only needed a torch and a nightstick when the Islamists were in power.

Now he has no intention of giving up his gun.

Matt Bryden, consultant to the International Crisis Group, says Gedi's government is following the wrong strategy.

"It should be concentrating on winning over the Hawiye clan - the main support base for the [Islamists] - by bringing them into some sort of government of national reconciliation," he says.

"You have a state of confrontation between the Hawiye and the government and that's where a settlement has to be pursued," he said. "That means some sort of settlement that makes the Hawiye feel like they are part of the government."

That would mean Gedi - himself a Hawiye but largely despised by his kinsmen as a weak and ineffectual leader - losing his position, which is not on the table, added Mr. Bryden. Ethiopian troops keep a low profile

Tuesday, Somalia's Ethiopian guardians kept a low profile in Mogadishu.

Two tanks guarded the airport runway and a contingent of soldiers was at the port.

The main Ethiopian firepower is based in Afgooye, about 10 miles from Mogadishu, or has followed the Islamists south.

DOJ_NMG_0110569

In the south, they managed to rout the Islamist forces, forcing them out of their main stronghold of Kismayo. From there the Islamists have disappeared into the forests of Ras Kaambooni, close to the Kenyan border.

Hussein Aideed, deputy prime minister, admits the government now faces a tough challenge. "To clear [the Islamists] will take a long time. It will not be days this time, but maybe three or four months," he says.

Meanwhile, in parts of Mogadishu, Somalis are reverting to the lives they lived before Islamic law was imposed. Western music has returned to the Global Dancehall, where Somalis welcomed the new year.

When the Islamists were in control, staff were forced to play traditional music and keep the volume down.

Still, freedom to party won't erase the worries Somalis have about a return to anarchy now that the Islamists are gone. "As a businessman, I want stability," shouts Mustafa Haji Abdullahi, the 22-year-old chief operating officer of Telcom Somalia, above a blaring hit by US rapper 50 Cent. "I'm already back to paying bribes."

Now everyone is waiting to see whether the government can consolidate its position or whether it would disintegrate under the pressure of Somalia's bloody history.

"All it would take is for one Ethiopian soldier to make a mistake, to shoot someone, to be accused of rape, and then it is all over," says Mr. Abdullahi. "We would be in for another 16 years of mayhem."

Ethiopia Will Keep Troops In Somalia (USAT)

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Ethiopia said Tuesday that its troops will stay in Somalia for a few more weeks to help the government, but the Islamists they ousted in a brief war vowed to "rise from the ashes." The Islamists, who fled their last stronghold on Monday after a two-week conflict, said they refused a government offer to surrender. "If the world thinks we are dead, they should know we are alive," Islamist spokesman Abdirahim Ali Mudey said.

In Mogadishu, where the interim government set up gun-collection points at the start of a drive to disarm the nation, Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi said Tuesday that Ethiopian troops will leave "when they clear terrorists and pacify Somalia. It will be weeks and months, not more."

Bombing ends Basque peace talks in Spain

The peace process to halt Spain's Basque separatist conflict ended with the weekend car bombing at Madrid's international airport, Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba said. "There is no process. It has been broken, it is over, it has been liquidated. ETA ended it with the bomb it set off in Madrid," he said of the militant group blamed for the explosion. Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero had said Saturday that he was suspending — but not canceling — plans to negotiate with ETA, which in March had declared a cease-fire it called permanent. Saturday's blast leveled a five-story parking lot, injuring 26 people and leaving two people missing and feared dead amid tons of rubble.

Former Jerusalem mayor Kollek dies

Teddy Kollek, the mayor who presided over Jerusalem's reunification in 1967, died Tuesday. He was 95.

When Kollek took office in 1965, Jerusalem was divided between Israeli and Jordanian rule. In the 1967 Six Day War, Israel seized and annexed the Arab eastern part of the city. Over his nearly three decades in office, Kollek solidified Israel's hold over east Jerusalem, but also tried to reach out to its Arabs. "Teddy Kollek was the builder of the new Jerusalem after the Six Day War," said Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the man who eventually ousted Kollek in the 1993 mayoral race. The Jerusalem Foundation, a charity founded by Kollek, said he died of natural causes.

Peru lobbies U.S. for free-trade deal

Peruvian President Alan Garcia stressed his country's desire for a free-trade agreement in a meeting Tuesday with a delegation of U.S. senators, but he received a mixed response along party lines.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he had "fallen in love with the people of Peru." He did not refer to prospects for ratification in Congress, however, amid his party's concerns about the lack of protection for Peruvian workers in the pact signed by Peru and the Bush administration last April.

Sen. Bob Bennett, R-Utah, was supportive, urging that Peru become a "major trading partner."

Meeting To Tackle Somalia's Need For Peacekeepers (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

Rapidly unfolding events in Somalia have opened a window of opportunity to establish a viable government there, according to the Bush administration and its European and African allies. But there is little optimism that the international political will and resources needed to exploit it will emerge before the window slams shut.

Diplomats from the United States and other nations in the Somalia Contact Group will meet today in Brussels to examine ways to quickly install an all-African peacekeeping force. The peacekeepers would replace Ethiopian troops whose lightning invasion ousted Islamic fundamentalist forces last week from Mogadishu. Also under discussion is an effort to persuade cooperative elements of the newly ensconced Transitional Federal Government to open unity talks with certain moderate leaders of the fundamentalist forces, which have been driven from southern Somalia.

The contact group -- which includes U.S., European and African representatives -- has discussed the need for African peacekeepers and a unity government for some time with little progress. Today's meeting of the six-month-old group will open with new urgency for action.

"The situation on the ground has changed dramatically, possibly for the better," said a European diplomat whose government is closely involved in the issue and who spoke on the condition of anonymity when discussing the sensitive negotiations. "The name of the game is how to make sure that the government establishes itself" to survive without Ethiopian military occupation, he said. "Somalis don't like the idea of Ethiopian troops manning the capital.

"On the other hand, if the Ethiopians withdraw all of a sudden," he said, "what's going to happen? There's a fine balance between maintaining and consolidating the government" and allowing feuding warlords on all sides of Somalia's political divide to reactivate their militias.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said yesterday that his troops will stay "for a few weeks," but he called on "the international community to deploy a peacekeeping force in Somalia without delay to avoid a vacuum and the resurgence of extremists and terrorists."

The Bush administration also sees the current upheaval as an opportunity to capture three senior al-Qaeda operatives who it says have been sheltered by a faction of the Somali Islamic fundamentalists. U.S. Navy ships have been dispatched from neighboring Djibouti to patrol the East African coastline for a possible escape as the fundamentalists and their militias have been pushed south to the Kenyan border. A senior U.S. counterterrorism official said that he had seen no intelligence to support earlier reports that legions of foreign fighters landed in Mogadishu last week to support the fundamentalists.

The official declined to comment on whether U.S. military personnel, sent to northern Kenya in recent months on humanitarian missions, are operating on the ground with Kenyan forces lining the 420-mile frontier. "That gets into some operational stuff," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the subject involves intelligence. "Clearly, we've got an embassy there, and very robust and very good relations with the Kenyans."

Any solution to Somalia's decades of chaos rests on untangling and soothing complicated domestic and regional enmities, as well as mustering broader cooperation and resources at a time of profound international war-weariness.

A plan to send African peacekeepers, approved last month by the African Union and the U.N. Security Council, has foundered on a lack of volunteers and resources to support them. "I wish I could be optimistic, but Somalia is tough, and everybody in the neighborhood knows it's tough," the counterterrorism official said.

Although Uganda has tentatively offered troops, it has balked over the uncertainty and danger of the mission, as well as over the lack of logistical support and airlift that only the United States is seen as able to supply. "We don't want to take the lead" in providing such support, the counterterrorism official said, "but we're willing to contribute."

One option on the table in Brussels, the European diplomat said, is to use an existing agreement between the European Union and NATO that "provides for military operations carried out by the E.U. using NATO assets." That provision would allow the utilization of U.S. airlift and intelligence -- which technically would be twice-removed -- under NATO and E.U. auspices. "We don't know if this can be done through NATO," the diplomat acknowledged. "I haven't seen many ideas yet on paper. This has happened so quickly over the holidays."

U.S. and European officials estimated that the situation is unlikely to remain stable for more than a few weeks.

Establishing a unity government is likely to prove difficult. In addition to their political differences, the transitional government in Mogadishu and the Islamic forces now on the run are separately backed by militias belonging to Somalia's two most powerful clans -- the Darod and the Hawiye. No government is likely to survive for long without representation from both, as well as from a bewildering array of divided sub-clans on each side.

As the fundamentalists were routed over the past week, many Hawiye militia groups abandoned them, at least temporarily, to wait and see which way the wind would blow.

"We think of the [Islamic] Courts as a broad spectrum of political actors in varying degrees of fundamentalism," the U.S. official said. "Those leaders who have allied themselves by choice with al-Qaeda are of concern to us. But we're not looking at the Courts as some grand enemy or threat. There are lots of variations.

"We would not be averse to some members of the Islamic Courts if they can cut a deal with the transitional government and be part of that," the official added.

Opportunity In Somalia (WT)

By Vicki Huddleston

Somalia has been a failed state since 1995, when the United Nations and the United States withdrew their humanitarian mission, leaving the warring clans to sort things out for themselves. For more than a decade, both Democratic and Republican administrations have written off Somalia, raising it only as a warning against U.S. military intervention in Africa. Is it any surprise then that this ungovernable and lawless state became the breeding ground for a conflict that pitted radical Islam against Ethiopia, and ultimately the West?

The overriding objective of the Supreme Islamic Courts Council since it seized Mogadishu six months ago has been to expand into neighboring Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti. As the Islamists overran southern Somalia, they indoctrinated school children and pressed them into the militant "al Shebab," whose ruthless leaders were growing increasingly close to al Qaeda. Their end goal was to form a Muslim caliphate in Greater Somalia under whose banner their reach would extend throughout the Horn and into central and southern Africa.

Some claimed that this was a proxy war between Ethiopia and Eritrea. Others even claimed that it was a proxy war with the United States using Ethiopia as its pawn. To believe this is to ignore the fact that the Islamic Courts' objective was to replace Somalia's secular government in Baidoa so that they could claim to rule all of Somalia. Ethiopia, alone among Somalia's neighbors, responded to the Transitional Federal Government's appeal for help.

While there were competing motives for this conflict, it is certainly not — as the Islamists claim — an instance of Ethiopian aggression with the tacit blessing of the United States. Ethiopia, along with the African Union and the international community, pressed both sides for dialogue. But the Islamic Courts — covertly funded and armed by Eritrea and supporters of a radical Islamic state in the Horn of Africa — declared a jihad on Ethiopia and attacked the Transitional Federal Government. Eritrea hoped to use the conflict in Somalia to destabilize its archenemy Ethiopia, while Islamists hoped to upset the delicate balance between Ethiopia's 75 million evenly divided Orthodox Christian and Muslims.

Some in the West argued that clan rivalry would defeat the Islamic Courts, but each victory brought them more support, both outside and inside Somalia. Others pointed out that the Islamists had imposed order on chaotic Mogadishu, ignoring the fact that they had done so at gun-point. The Arab League had increasingly sided with the Islamists, and many warned that if Ethiopia intervened on behalf of the Transitional Government it would fuel a wider war.

They were all wrong. Ethiopia's and the Somali government's surprisingly easy victories have given Somalia — and the West — a second chance to get things right. We cannot afford to lose this opportunity.

Here is what we need to do: First, international relief agencies should enhance shipments of food into the towns and villages now under the Transitional Government's control. Second, the African Union, with logistic help from the United States and European Union, should immediately deploy peacekeepers to reinforce the government. Third, the region under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development should prepare for a transition to a broad based government that excludes the Islamic militants but includes the moderates from all of Somalia's clans.

A window has been opened, and before the Islamists close it by disrupting efforts to stabilize Mogadishu, we should take the lead in bringing together the international community in a concerted and sustained effort to turn Somalia into a viable state. The United Nations has approved an African peacekeeping mission. Let's get those forces on the ground now. Their presence will dampen the Islamists bravado and allow Ethiopia to withdraw.

Strong U.S. leadership will prevent Somalia from becoming a haven for al Qaeda terrorism in Africa.

North Korea's Foreign Minister Dies (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

Paek Nam Sun, North Korea's foreign minister and the country's top diplomat for nearly 10 years, has died at the age of 78, official media reported Wednesday.

North Korean leader Kim Jong Il expressed his condolences, the North's Korean Central News Agency reported. The one-sentence dispatch did not elaborate on when or how Paek died.

Paek has been the North's premier diplomat since 1998. News reports have said he was suffering from an unknown illness. It was unclear who would succeed him.

His most recent overseas trip was to Malaysia and Singapore in July.

Paek's death was not expected to change North Korea's foreign policy because the North's Foreign Ministry usually implements policies that have been crafted by the ruling Korean Workers' Party. Power is heavily concentrated in Kim's hands, and state officers stray from the official line at their peril.

His death came as tensions remain high on the Korean peninsula following the North's Oct. 9 nuclear test. North Korea held nuclear negotiations with the United States and other regional powers last month, but no progress was made.

Paek graduated from the prestigious Kim Il Sung University in Pyongyang, and later took part in Red Cross talks with South Korea in the 1970s. Diplomatic involvement with South Korea, the North's wealthy neighbor and former battlefield foe, has always been a key to career advancement for North Korean officials.

Paek was also ambassador to Poland.

Paek's career is the story of an elite loyalist who rose steadily through the government layers over the decades. He was born in 1929 in North Hamgyong, a province on the Chinese and Russian borders that is home to a coal mine notorious for forced labor as well as a key missile base.

Israeli Admits Big Errors In Lebanon War, But Won't Resign (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 2 — The Israeli chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, conceded Tuesday that the military had made serious errors during last summer's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon but said he would not resign his post.

General Halutz said Israel had badly damaged Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and killed "hundreds of terrorists." But he said Israel was "not successful in reducing the short-range rocket fire on Israel's north until the cease-fire," which came after 34 days of fighting.

Critics of General Halutz and of the Israeli government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert have said the military relied too heavily on air power and delayed too long sending in ground troops in the numbers needed to push back the Hezbollah fighters and supporters who were firing Katyusha rockets into Israel.

Critics have also said that the military should be led by a ground forces commander — General Halutz spent his career in the air force — and that reserves were not called up in time, were badly trained and equipped, and often faced contradictory orders.

"We attacked the Katyushas, but unsuccessfully," General Halutz said.

He spoke Tuesday at a Tel Aviv news conference summing up the army's own investigation of its behavior during the war.

He said he would stay on "to correct what can be corrected," and said to resign now would be "running away." He said Mr. Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz had not asked him to go. "I have not heard my superiors calling on me to resign," he said. "If they do, I will respond."

He suggested that discipline had broken down to some degree. "There were cases in which officers did not carry out their assignments, and cases in which officers objected on moral grounds to their orders," he said, an apparent reference to resistance against attacking south Lebanese towns and villages.

He said that these instances of refusal "ran counter to the army's basic values" and that a senior officer was suspended as a result.

During the war, as criticism mounted, General Halutz effectively demoted the commander of the northern front, Maj. Gen. Udi Adam, putting the deputy chief of staff, Maj. Gen. Moshe Kaplinski, alongside him. General Adam later quit the army.

Previously, General Halutz has said the army fired some cluster munitions, with the "bomblets" placed in artillery shells, into southern Lebanon in contradiction of his orders that they be aimed only at specific targets.

The United States is investigating whether the Israelis used cluster munitions made and paid for in America in ways that contravene American regulations for the weapons' use.

General Halutz implicitly criticized Mr. Olmert for setting as a goal of the war the release of two Israeli soldiers captured by Hezbollah in a cross-border raid on July 12, an act that set off the fighting.

The Winograd committee, which is led by a retired judge, Eliyahu Winograd, and was appointed by the government, is still investigating the conflict and its outcome.

General Halutz said that if the committee called for his resignation, "of course" he would comply. Defense Minister Amir Peretz has made the same pledge.

The war ended with a cease-fire on Aug. 14, after a United Nations Security Council resolution mandated an enlarged and strengthened international peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon and supervision of Lebanon's seacoast and border with Syria to prevent the rearming of Hezbollah.

The fighting left more than 1,000 people dead on both sides. Israel says more than 500 of the dead were Hezbollah fighters, but Hezbollah disputes that.

Israel counted 159 fatalities, including 39 civilians who were killed by the more than 4,000 rockets Hezbollah fired into Israel.

In Gaza on Tuesday, Palestinian security forces were searching for a Peruvian photographer for Agence France-Presse, Jaime Razuri, 50, a day after his abduction.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said he was hopeful. "We're sure he will soon be released," Mr. Abbas told a delegation from the news agency and French and Peruvian diplomats. "In past incidents of this kind, hostages have been freed after one or two days."

In the latest in a string of foreigner abductions, several unmasked gunmen abducted Mr. Razuri in the center of Gaza City on Monday as he was returning from an assignment with an interpreter and a driver.

Separately, warring Hamas and Fatah factions returned 14 fighters kidnapped on Monday after mediation from representatives of Islamic Jihad, Palestinian officials said.

The violence resumed Monday when Hamas gunmen shot at a brother of a senior Fatah militant in the northern Gaza Strip, violating an earlier deal for a general truce.

Israel Could Abandon Own Missiles For US System (AFP)

AFP, January 3, 2007

Israel is considering halting the development of a new generation of its Arrow defense missiles due to the high costs involved in favour of US-made missiles.

Following negotiations in recent months, Israeli leaders will make a final decision on whether to phase out the Arrow, or Hetz, missiles and opt instead for the US-made THAAD missile defense system in the coming year, the Haaretz newspaper reported Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0110574

The THAAD missile, made by Lockheed Martin, could be delivered to Israel in 2009, according to sources in Washington quoted by the newspaper.

But the US missile defense system still has to resolve a number of technological bugs, the daily added.

For the time being, Israel is still developing Arrow missiles and is due to carry out a new test.

The last test, in December 2005, intercepted a missile similar to Iran's Shihab-3, which is capable of reaching Israel, public radio reported.

The Arrow project began in 1988, with 80 percent US backing, as part of former US president Ronald Regan's "Star Wars" project that was officially abandoned in 1993.

Since 1991, Arrow development costs have been split equally between Israel and the United States.

U.N. To Probe Sudan Abuse Allegations (AP)

By Matt Moore

AP, January 3, 2007

The United Nations will investigate a report of allegations of sexual abuse and child rape by peacekeepers operating in southern Sudan, a key U.N. official said Tuesday.

Jane Holl Lute, the U.N. assistant secretary-general who oversees peacekeeping operations, said the allegations, reported by British newspaper The Daily Telegraph, if shown to be true would not be tolerated.

"There could be truth. These environments are ones in which it is difficult to ascertain the truth. I do not believe these are new allegations. Nevertheless, we will treat them as seriously as we treat all other allegations," she told The Associated Press at U.N. headquarters in New York.

The Daily Telegraph, citing an internal UNICEF report along with interviews with more than 20 alleged abuse victims, reported that several children, some as young as 12, had been sexually abused by U.N. peacekeepers and civilian workers.

The paper said that the alleged abuse began two years ago when the U.N. Mission in Southern Sudan, known as UNMIS, arrived to help maintain peace in the region after a more than two-decade civil war.

"The first indications of sexual exploitation emerged within months of the U.N. force's arrival and The Daily Telegraph has seen a draft of an internal report compiled by the U.N. children's agency UNICEF in July 2005 detailing the problem," the paper reported on its Web site. "Evidence suggests that UNMIS staff may already be involved in sexual exploitation."

Lute said she has spoken with the force commander and chief of staff in the U.N. mission in southern Sudan "and I know they are very well briefed on what U.N. policy is and have taken steps to implement that policy across the board in that mission."

"But we don't have the facts yet in this case, and we need to ascertain the facts and follow it through to appropriate resolution and take action if necessary," she said. "We won't be complacent and there will be no impunity to the full extent of the U.N.'s authority."

U.N. policy prohibits all U.N. staff from engaging in sexual exploitation, abuse or prostitution.

Lute, who served in the U.S. Army for 16 years, stressed that the U.N. has instituted a series of measures in terms of training, clarifying standards and reinforcing messages against sexual abuse.

But she said vigilance on this matter has to be "a constant factor of life when you're rotating through 200,000 troops in as diverse environments as we do."

UN Staff 'must Help Restore Trust' (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Ban Ki-moon, the eighth United Nations secretary-general, arrived for his first day at work on Tuesday with a tough appeal for staff to embrace change and restore trust in the organisation.

In a brief appearance before reporters he vowed to give the crisis in the Sudanese Darfur region top priority and said, to questions on the execution of Saddam Hussein, that capital punishment was an issue for each state to decide on.

That appeared a step back from the UN's traditional opposition to the death penalty.

But his core message was delivered to a closed meeting of UN staff. He praised their professionalism, but warned that the UN's "sense of pride is not to be taken for granted; it must be earned. We are all here for reasons greater than our own personal advancement or national interest."

Over recent years, he noted, the UN secretariat had faced harsh, sometimes unfair, criticism and "staff morale has plummeted". But some of the criticisms, he said, "warrant our urgent attention" and "we must take bold steps to dispel them".

Mr Ban promised to build a more mobile staff, which moved between headquarters and field posts – addressing the fact that many UN officials, on reaching New York and Geneva, remain in place for years, while field positions often go unfilled.

"We have to show the international community we are ready and eager to change," Mr Ban said. "I ask senior managers to co-operate fully in my efforts to change the working culture."

Stephen Kisimbira, a UN staff representative, told Mr Ban that he expected a revamp of the UN's internal justice system, and "a fundamental change in the mindset of senior management".

There was a sense of anticipation at the UN's New York headquarters as officials wondered what the future had in store.

As a first step, Mr Ban announced two appointments over the holiday period, both well received.

His chief of staff will be Vijay Nambiar, a veteran Indian diplomat who acted as adviser to Kofi Annan, the last secretary-general. His spokeswoman will be Michele Montas, a respected Haitian journalist.

Ban Faces 'Daunting' U.N. Agenda (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

NEW YORK -- U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, on his first official day of work yesterday, said he would soon get started on a "daunting" plateful of international affairs, including Sudan, the Middle East and North Korea.

"The crisis situation in Darfur is very high on my agenda," he told reporters, noting that he will meet today with Jan Eliasson, the U.N. special envoy to Darfur.

Mr. Ban, of South Korea, also said he expects to meet with Sudanese President Omar Bashir at the African Union summit in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, at the end of the month.

Mr. Ban -- pronounced "Bahn Ghee-moon," an aide clarified -- placed an emphasis on meeting and perhaps reassuring the staff yesterday.

"We are all here for reasons greater than our own personal advancement or our national interests," the eighth secretary-general told hundreds of staff members at a morning meeting. "Extraordinary expectations are placed upon us, and we must strive to live up to them."

He told them that new times call for "new leadership, at all levels in the organization."

Mr. Ban pledged to pursue predecessor Kofi Annan's stalled reform suggestions, some of which were more popular with the staff than others.

Later, Mr. Ban tucked into the $3.50 beef stir-fry at the U.N. cafeteria, waving to passers-by and fellow diners.

Before the secretary-general can tackle global issues, he will need to put his own staff in place, as well as make senior appointments throughout the organization. About two dozen department heads will have to be replaced or renewed by the end of February, when most contracts expire.

Mr. Ban named Vijay Nambiar, India's former U.N. ambassador, as his chief of staff over the weekend. Mr. Nambiar was hired as an adviser by Mr. Annan in March, and accompanied him on his 15-day diplomatic tour of the Middle East to cool the ground after Israel's war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

Michele Montas, a former radio journalist who has chronicled political corruption and unrest in her native Haiti, was appointed Mr. Ban's spokeswoman. The former head of U.N. Radio's French language service, Mrs. Montas will field questions at the daily U.N. briefing, making her one of the most visible faces of the new administration.

Mrs. Montas said yesterday that Mr. Ban expects to name the new heads of U.N. management and humanitarian affairs by the end of the week.

Alicia Barcena, a former chief of staff to Mr. Annan and a Mexican native, is expected to take over the U.N. Department of Administration and Management, which has been vacant since Christopher Burnham left in late November.

Mr. Ban, a career officer in South Korea's Foreign Ministry, has said he will appoint a woman from the developing world as deputy secretary-general.

Sen. Reid Meets Peruvian Leader On Trade (AP)

By Rick Vecchio

AP, January 3, 2007

Incoming U.S. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said Tuesday he had fallen in love with Peru during a short visit, but made no pronouncements on a key issue facing the two nations, free trade.

In a meeting with the bipartisan senate delegation led by Reid, President Alan Garcia stressed Peru's desire for a free trade pact.

Republicans have largely supported the free trade deal signed last April as a step in advancing commerce within the Western Hemisphere, while Democrats have expressed reservations about its ratification over what they see as a lack of protection for Peruvian workers. The administration has completed similar agreements with several other Latin nations.

"I want to tell these senators that we indeed think of a free trade agreement as something to benefit all Peruvians, not only one group with economic means," Garcia said in a public meeting with the senators and his Cabinet. "We want small businesses to also benefit."

Garcia's comments did draw support from Republican Sen. Robert Bennett of Utah.

"We would like to do whatever we can to see that Peru, and all of Latin America, becomes a major trading partner with the United States," he said.

Reid didn't comment publicly on the plan, but he spoke glowingly of the Andean nation.

"After having spent three days in this wonderful country I leave Peru understanding the government of Peru better than I did when I came here," Reid told reporters.

"Having fallen in love with the people of Peru," Reid said he had experienced something he "thought would never occur traveling to another country.

"Being in the midst of the great Andes mountains has been a spiritual experience for me," he said, without elaborating or taking questions. "President Garcia, Viva el Peru!"

Peru was the last stop in a three-nation Andean tour by the senate delegation, which also included incoming Majority Whip Richard Durbin, D-Ill.; Ken Salazar, D-Colo.; Kent Conrad, D-N.D.; and Judd Gregg, R-N.H.

They met last week with Bolivia's leftist President Evo Morales and with Ecuador's leftist President-elect Rafael Correa to discuss international trade and anti-drug efforts, among other topics.

Merkel In Drive For Europe-US Trade Talks (FT)

By Bertrand Benoit And Quentin Peel

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Angela Merkel, German chancellor, will this month launch a sweeping initiative for the harmonisation of US and European legislation to boost investment flows and trade between the world's largest economic blocs.

Initial talks will review financial market regulations, including delisting rules, which many US-listed European companies feel are too cumbersome, as well as intellectual property law. Ms Merkel is also seeking mutual recognition of technical standards for products such as cars.

In her first interview with an international newspaper since becoming chancellor, Ms Merkel told the Financial Times she would make achieving a "transatlantic economic partnership" central to Germany's presidency of the European Union, which began this week.

Her ambition is to create a single transatlantic market for investors, with common rules and standards on issues such as intellectual property and financial regulation. However, her initiative may face opposition from a more protectionist US and other EU member states.

Ms Merkel expressed optimism that talks would also begin in the next six months on a new strategic partnership with Russia but warned Moscow that relations must be based on reciprocity. If Russia restricted foreign investment in its strategic companies, she said, it should be no surprise if EU countries took similar measures against Russian investors.

She also spelt out her determination to revive the EU constitutional treaty after the No votes in French and Dutch referendums.

Ms Merkel, who also holds the chair of the Group of Eight industrialised nations for 2007, is underlining the importance she attaches to restoring transatlantic ties by flying to Washington on Thursday to meet George W. Bush, US president.

"Our economic systems are based on the same values," said Ms Merkel. "We have learnt how to combine the Anglo-Saxon and Continental European legal systems, which are very different from one another . . . think transatlantic co-operation will be more straightforward in many areas than might appear at first glance."

Ms Merkel's initiative marks the EU's first attempt to achieve a transatlantic single market since a similar move by the European Commission in 1998 petered out because of French opposition. Formal negotiations on drafting the partnership should start at the EU-US summit in May, she said.

Matthias Wissmann, chairman of the German parliament's Europe Committee, estimates that the integration of US and EU financial markets alone could be achieved by 2015 and would cut trading costs on both sides by 60 per cent and the cost of equity capital by 9 per cent.

Ms Merkel stressed that tariffs and customs duties were not part of her plan.

Yuan's Ascent Begins To Pinch Chinese Exporters (WSJ)

By James T. Areddy

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

SHANGHAI -- The Chinese currency's rising value has started to pinch an increasing number of businesses here, eroding already thin profit margins, forcing them to reduce expenses and sometimes costing them business.

The tightly controlled Chinese yuan has crept up 6% since July 2005, when the government loosened its link to the U.S. dollar. Its gains against the dollar are modest compared with the sharper run-ups of other currencies, such as the euro. But the pace of the upswing has been unusually fast for China, where until recently companies had almost no experience with currency fluctuations against the dollar.

The yuan's 3%-plus rise against the dollar last year represented an even sharper change than the Japanese yen's 1.4% decline against the U.S. currency. Expectations that the yuan will strengthen further in 2007 have sent companies scrambling to find ways to protect themselves.

The stronger yuan is reducing the profit Zhenhua Port Machinery Co. earns on its big shipping-container cranes when they are sold in dollars. To cushion the blow, Zhenhua is raising prices, changing sales terms and looking for efficiencies in its manufacturing processes. The yuan "revaluation obviously hit us," says Wang Jue, board secretary of the Shanghai company.

Zhejiang Dongyang Haisen Trading Co., a maker of beverage containers in eastern China, says the yuan move has entirely erased its 2% or 3% profit margin on basic products. For now, the company is offering a newer, pricier line of products for export orders, says sales manager Zhang Shengquan. "What we hope is that the appreciation [of the yuan] could slow down a bit," Mr. Zhang says.

On the whole, the Chinese government seems to be comfortable with the pace of the yuan's rise. The central bank said last week that the exchange rate has moved "in an orderly way within a reasonable range."

The new foreign-exchange pressure on exporters is likely to lead them and their allies in the Chinese government to argue against a rapid increase in the yuan's value, while others, including those worried about the inflationary side effects of restraining the yuan or political pressures in the U.S., push for a faster rise.

The yuan's gains haven't been nearly enough to blunt international criticism of Beijing's exchange-rate policy. U.S. politicians and others argue that China keeps the yuan artificially weak in order to give its exporters an unfair advantage in world markets, a tactic they blame for America's soaring trade surplus with China.

For China, the need to sustain its rapid economic growth takes precedence over exchange-rate concerns. Beijing recognizes the need to let market forces influence the yuan, but its policy makers view the shift as a complex undertaking. Few things can more easily jostle an economy than abrupt changes in the value of its currency.

As the yuan continues to edge up, so will China's export prices, says Edward Leung, chief economist of the Hong Kong Trade Development Council, a government-funded industry group. Manufacturing costs in China already face rising labor and materials expenses, he says. Further gains by the yuan will leave exporters with little choice but to charge more.

U.S. companies that have extensive operations in China are also feeling the effects. In a regulatory filing, Measurement Specialties Inc., an instrument maker based in Hampton, Va., said in November that the yuan's rise has "resulted in lower margins since a large portion of our products is manufactured in our China facility."

Opponents Of New Kosovo Must Be Stopped (FT)

By Joseph Biden

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Years of hand-wringing and chest-thumping over the future status of Kosovo may finally be drawing to a close. In the next few months, adroit diplomacy to secure Kosovo's independence could yield a victory for Muslim democracy, a better future for south-east Europe and validation for the judicious use of American power.

But along with the potential for triumph in Kosovo, there is a growing risk that Serbia and Russia will conspire to seize defeat from the jaws of victory. Extremists in Belgrade and Moscow are – for very different reasons – hoping to use Russia's United Nations Security Council veto to quash Kosovo's bid for independence. If they succeed, the Balkans will emerge as another source of bad news in a world already crowded with crises.

During the seven years since Nato ended Slobodan Milosevic's reign of terror in Kosovo, a UN-backed administration has largely succeeded in bringing stability to the province. However, Kosovo's people are justifiably tired of a status quo marked by uncertainty and economic privation. These two intertwined problems will continue so long as the debate over the province's future remains unresolved. Its ambiguous status is also leading to stagnation in Serbia.

Nationalist politicians in Belgrade have embraced the fight against Kosovo's independence to divert public attention from their own failures and Serbia's stalled bid for European Union membership. The actions of Vojislav Kostunica, Serbia's prime minister, have been particularly disappointing. In addition to refusing international requests to call for the arrest of war crimes fugitives Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic, Mr Kostunica has rejected every attempt at compromise on Kosovo. Serbia's moral authority on the issue hit a new low in October when the 1.5m ethnic Albanian residents of the province were denied the right to vote in a deeply flawed constitutional referendum that declared Kosovo an integral part of Serbia.

To their great credit, the people of Serbia have proved more realistic about Kosovo than their elected leaders. Opinion polls show that many Serbs foresee that the province will gain independence. Ethnic Albanians in Kosovo, meanwhile, overwhelmingly expect to sever ties with Serbia. With citizens on both sides of the issue ready to finish the debate and move on to more constructive challenges, leaders who block a solution will do so at their peril.

Historically, trouble in the Balkans is almost always the result of false expectations. On the whole, the citizens of south-east Europe are mentally prepared for an independent Kosovo.

If Belgrade postpones a settlement it will reopen the issue for many Serbs previously resigned to Kosovo's independence and further inflame frustrations among the region's ethnic Albanians. The result could be a return of the mob violence that shook Kosovo in March 2004.

A Russian effort to delay a deal on Kosovo would be in keeping with the Kremlin's habit of fostering weak, subservient governments in formerly communist states. Moscow has apparently reached the conclusion that impoverished, unstable regimes are easier targets for manipulation than prosperous, independent countries. It has made extensive, public use of oil and gas diplomacy to undermine the budding democracies of eastern Europe. Less attention has focused on the Kremlin's quiet efforts to exacerbate territorial conflicts in Georgia, Moldova and Azerbaijan. Serbia could become the latest victim of this strategy.

Kosovo is not ready for full sovereignty. Even after independence, Nato and the international community will need to provide security guarantees for Kosovo's minorities and strengthen its economy and institutions. But it is time to grant the province independence. The longer the status debate continues, the further Kosovo and Serbia will fall behind other rapidly progressing former Yugoslav republics such as Croatia and Slovenia.

Success in Kosovo, if realised, will have implications far beyond the Balkans. A responsible Russian approach to the issue could demonstrate the Kremlin's commitment to global order at a time when its credibility is in tatters. The people of Kosovo – already the most pro-American in the Islamic world – will provide a much-needed example of a successful US-Muslim partnership. Stability in south-east Europe would be a welcome bit of good news and offer hope in a season of tremendous foreign policy challenges.

A New Beginning For Turkmenistan (WP)

By Nurmuhammet Hanamov

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Last week Turkmenistan buried its brutal dictator, Saparmurad Niyazov. His ruthless reign spanned two decades, during which time his policies became increasingly irrational and unpredictable. The long list of Niyazov's crimes against our people includes: banning all political parties except his own and jailing his opponents; preventing thousands of "disloyal" citizens from traveling abroad; persecuting religious and ethnic minorities; outlawing opera; and shutting down regional hospitals, firing thousands of doctors and nurses. Under Niyazov, Turkmenistan became a corridor for heroin trafficking from Afghanistan to the West and gained for itself one of the highest heroin addiction rates in the world.

Above all, Niyazov was a selfish and kleptocratic despot, stashing billions in proceeds from the sale of the country's enormous natural gas resources in personal accounts in Western banks. He used this money to fuel his outlandish personality cult, building opulent palaces and golden statues of himself even as his people were deprived of basic necessities and suffer one of the world's lowest life expectancy rates. The West's indifference was striking compared with the relentless criticism by the United States and the European Union against the more benign regime of Alexander Lukashenko, president of gas-poor Belarus.

With Niyazov gone, the West has a historic second chance to help our country make a peaceful transition to democracy. Turkmenistan's interim rulers have unfortunately pledged to continue Niyazov's policies (even ordering new statues of him), and their efforts to grab power amount to a coup d'?tat. The former health minister -- under the de facto control of Niyazov's Presidential Guard -- has arrested the speaker of Parliament, who constitutionally is next in the line of succession. He has sealed the country's borders and, using other unconstitutional measures, has set the stage for his own unchallenged victory in presidential elections scheduled for Feb. 11.

The United States must send a clear message to Niyazov's holdouts in the "interim government" in Ashgabat: that they will not have its support unless they agree to hold free and fair elections -- ones that allow all citizens of Turkmenistan, including exiled opposition leaders and political prisoners, to take part.

We know that the United States has tried to help the people of Turkmenistan in recent years, and thanks to American educational exchange programs, there is a thriving community of bright Turkmen students and intellectuals who are living in Western countries and are ready to return and help rebuild their country. This community is largely held together by the efforts of Khudaiberdy Orazov, a former chairman of the National Bank and an accomplished and energetic leader who was forced into exile several years ago. He was unanimously nominated to be a candidate in the February presidential elections by a broad coalition of opposition groups inside and outside of Turkmenistan. According to a recent poll, Orazov's candidacy would have the support of a majority of Turkmen voters. Until Orazov and other opposition candidates are allowed to contest the February elections, the United States and the European Union must refrain from recognizing the junta in Ashgabat and freeze all personal accounts of Niyazov and his cronies abroad. We hope that members of Congress and other government officials will visit Turkmenistan soon to personally deliver that message.

We must rebuild our country, and with the help of our friends and neighbors we can do it in an open and transparent way. Priorities for a democratically elected government during the initial post-Niyazov reconstruction must be to release all political prisoners, conduct open tenders and allow Western companies to bid for a stake in developing Turkmenistan's oil and gas fields; to consider new ways of getting our gas and oil to Western markets; to restore private property that Niyazov confiscated from

Turkmen citizens; and to create a reconstruction fund using Niyazov's personal bank accounts and proceeds from the sale of oil and gas to revive the health-care and education systems.

The United States is spending billions of dollars trying to turn Afghanistan and Iraq -- both deep in the throes of civil war -- into democratic nations while all but abandoning their peaceful post-Soviet neighbors to the north. Turkmenistan is ready for a new beginning, and the West must finally step up to the plate. To do otherwise would waste a historic opportunity and allow yet another case of popular discontent with an illegitimate government to become an anti-Western lost cause.

Now It's Belarus's Turn (NYT)

A year after Russia put the gas squeeze on Ukraine, it was Belarus's turn. Unlike Ukraine, Belarus blinked two minutes before the Jan. 1 deadline and Russia had its booty: a 50 percent share of Belarus's pipeline network and a more than doubling of the price Belarus will now pay for Russian gas.

There was no global outcry this time. President Aleksandr Lukashenko, the utterly Soviet boss of Belarus, has no friends in the West. But this latest squeeze is another warning that the Kremlin will let nothing — personal loyalty, contracts, the law — halt its drive to reimpose state control on Russia's energy sector. It is also another reminder that the West, a big consumer of Russian energy, remains vulnerable to President Vladimir Putin's whims.

The Belarus deal came less than two weeks after Royal Dutch Shell gave in to the Kremlin's pressure and sold a controlling share in the Sakhalin-2 oil and gas project to Gazprom, Russia's state gas monopoly. Moscow is now leaning on the British-Russian joint venture, TNK-BP, to give Gazprom a large and possibly controlling stake.

A year ago, when the democratic revolutions in Georgia and Ukraine were seen as serious threats to the Kremlin's influence, Mr. Putin was eager to prop up Mr. Lukashenko. But once Mr. Lukashenko successfully stole the March presidential election, the new gas bill arrived in Minsk. That included half ownership for the Kremlin of Beltransgaz, the state pipeline operator that not only fuels Belarus but also supplies a fifth of Europe's gas.

Russia's European customers could increase their leverage — and possibly improve the Kremlin's behavior — if they negotiated jointly with Gazprom, rather than scurrying to cut separate deals. Western companies and governments also need to warn Moscow that its leverage has limits. Russia will need the expertise and capital of foreign companies if it wants to keep developing its natural resources. No one wants to do business with a bully.

More Gas Blackmail (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

The new year did not begin, as many had feared, with Russia's Gazprom again turning off taps that lead eventually to natural gas customers in Western Europe. At the last moment, Belarus acquiesced to the Kremlin's demands to double gas prices and cede control over the Belarusan gas-transit network, thereby avoiding the shut-off that hit Ukraine on January 1, 2006.

The bullying of Minsk this year also didn't elicit a hue and cry in the West as did last year's gas war with Kiev. Part of this is cynical self-interest: Europe gets only a fifth of its gas through Belarus compared with four-fifths through Ukraine. But this latest rendition of Moscow's spigot shakedown carries a blueprint for its strategy toward the rest of the Continent, and Europe's leaders ignore it at their peril.

This dispute was also less overtly political. Whereas the Kremlin was blatantly punishing the West-leaning democrats of Ukraine's "Orange Revolution," Belarus appeared to be a strictly economic case because its president, Alexander Lukashenko, is a Russian puppet. That's not entirely true, however.

Russia made Mr. Lukashenko's re-election possible last year, and Gazprom came to collect for that favor in the form of a new contract. His stubbornness amounted to political insubordination. The West might not have wanted to stick up for "Europe's last dictator," but leaving him out to dry only entrenches the Russians in Belarus. They will be far more difficult to expel from Minsk than Mr. Lukashenko ever could be.

As for the future, the key to the Belarus compromise was the 50% stake that Gazprom won in Beltransgaz, Belarus's gas-pipeline monopoly. Gazprom has been transparent about its aim to own the pipes that connect its gas fields to its customers. This is one of the main reasons Moscow refuses to ratify the International Energy Charter, which requires free access to pipeline networks, and why it is lobbying hard against European Union plans to liberalize its gas market. As part of that reform, the EU would likely prohibit gas suppliers from owning pipelines, and vice versa.

Gazprom is thus scurrying to build and buy enough pipelines inside the EU to strengthen its leverage. It already owns 50% minus one share in Wingas, a joint venture with BASF's Wintershall AG unit that, according to Gazprom, owns 2,000 kilometers of pipe in Germany as well as Europe's largest underground gas storage site. Moscow must figure that, if it can consolidate enough, the Europeans won't have the backbone to force Gazprom out. Given Brussels' timid reaction to Paris's shotgun marriage of Gaz de France and Suez, the Kremlin might be right.

This type of monopoly power is worrying enough in companies and countries where the state has a large influence in the energy sector: Think of France's GdF and EdF. It's even worse when the state is the company, as in Russia today, and explicitly bars certain foreign investments while changing investment terms on a whim. European customers who want to know how they might be treated by a vertically integrated Gazprom might ask Royal Dutch Shell CEO Jeroen van der Veer; late last month he was all but forced to cede control of his Sakhalin-2 oil project to the Russian gas giant.

Gazprom's monopoly status also undercuts claims by the company and Kremlin -- pardon the redundancy -- that the situation in Belarus was merely a matter of introducing "market pricing" to the former Soviet republic. The same line was trotted out in the disputes with Ukraine, Azerbaijan, Moldova and Georgia. Just so we're clear, there is no proper market price for this gas. Gazprom has no competitors that could offer to fill the pipelines to Belarus with Russian gas at a lower price. But never mind. Let the advocates of Kremlin capitalism answer this: Since when does "market" economics entail the forced sale of one firm's assets to another, particularly when those assets weren't for sale in the first place?

It's hard to remember now, but before its Ukrainian blackmail last year Gazprom had a decent reputation for reliability. So much for that. All the more reason for Brussels to expedite its plans for gas-market liberalization. We'll get an idea of how European policy makers size up the threat from Russia on Thursday, when the EU's Gas Coordination Group meets, and next week when the European Commission unveils its energy sector review. No news on the liberalization front will be bad news.

The Squeeze On Belarus (WP)

EUROPE narrowly averted another energy supply crisis this week when Russia and Belarus struck a last-minute deal, preventing a threatened Russian cutoff of natural gas supplies. Since Russian gas flows through Belarus to Poland and Western Europe, a disruption could have affected consumers far beyond Belarus, as happened a year ago when Russia turned off the tap to Ukraine. The source of the dispute was the same in both cases: Russia's demand that its neighbors pay vastly increased prices for gas and turn over controlling stakes in pipelines that carry gas to the rest of Europe. Belarus, like Ukraine, claimed that Moscow's commercial hardball was politically motivated, while the Kremlin argued that it was merely ending subsidies that were a legacy of the Soviet Union.

In fact both sides are telling the truth -- but it's the political ramifications that should concern Western governments. As executives of the Kremlin-controlled Gazprom company asserted, the price to be paid by Belarus -- $100 per thousand cubic meters of gas in 2007 -- is still one of the better deals Russia offers, even if it is far more than the previous rate of $46. But Belarus obtained the discount only by agreeing to sell a controlling interest in the transit line, thereby advancing Russia's disturbing campaign to monopolize energy supplies to Europe.

Belarusan President Alexander Lukashenko is widely known as Europe's last dictator. What's less well known is that he has been resisting pressure from Russia to annex his country. Mr. Lukashenko signed a deal with Russian President Vladimir Putin several years ago under which the two countries would merge; by its terms Belarus was to adopt the Russian ruble and turn over the gas pipeline. But Mr. Lukashenko, who once dreamed that the union would propel him toward becoming leader of both countries, changed his mind when he realized he was on his way to becoming a provincial governor. He has resisted yielding the pipeline or abandoning his country's sovereignty.

Mr. Putin is consequently using "market pricing" to extract what he wants from Belarus. "We are being threatened with economic sanctions and isolation again," Mr. Lukashenko said in a New Year's address. "The reason is simple: It is our desire to be independent." He went on to denounce "anti-Belarusan sentiments" in Russia that "are dealing a blow to our century-old friendship."

Mr. Lukashenko's disillusionment with Russia might make him wish for better relations with the West. But as the European Union recently reiterated, that would require steps to democratize his country, something the strongman has shown no inclination to do. Still, Mr. Lukashenko's assertion of Belarusan sovereignty and independence could open the way to reform. If Belarus is really to survive in the center of Europe independent from Russia, it will inevitably have to accept far greater change than simply paying the market price for gas.

Sinn Fein And The Cops (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

IN MOST societies, it isn't news when a major political party accepts the legitimacy of the police force. But the leader of the political wing of the Irish Republican Army made not just news but history last week by doing just that. Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams said he would ask a party conference to approve a motion supporting the "police services" in both Northern Ireland and the predominantly Catholic Irish Republic.

A recognition by Sinn Fein of the new Police Service of Northern Ireland — a replacement for the Royal Ulster Constabulary long distrusted by Catholics — would be a momentous step. It would add the final piece to the jigsaw puzzle of a new arrangement in which the North's pro-British Protestant majority shares power with the Catholic minority.

If power sharing is revived, credit will belong not only to Northern Ireland's erstwhile enemies but to the United States. Abandoning this country's traditional hands-off policy, President Clinton committed his administration to the search for a solution to "the Troubles," which killed more than 3,000 people. The result was the 1998 Good Friday Agreement negotiated by Clinton's envoy, former Sen. George J. Mitchell, which called for an "inclusive" government in Belfast.

Still, even as savvy a salesman as Clinton would have failed had not successive British and Irish governments worked together, often over the heads of their supposed surrogates in Northern Ireland. Both governments combined toughness toward terrorism with an openness to negotiations and creative thinking. (Alas, there is no equivalent of the Dublin-London axis to induce Israelis and Palestinians to settle their differences.)

In 1994, in a gesture to Northern Ireland's Catholics, Britain announced that it had no "selfish" interest in ruling the North against the wishes of a majority of the population. Four years later, as recommended by the Good Friday Agreement, the Irish Republic addressed a long-standing Protestant grievance by amending its constitution to renounce any claim to govern the North.

The effect of these and other concessions was to fudge the question of whether Northern Ireland was eternally part of Ireland or eternally subject to the British crown. The answer: It's neither. The North will remain linked to Britain until a majority decides otherwise, but meanwhile both London and Dublin will take care that the Protestant majority shares power — including police power — with a long-marginalized Catholic minority. And the guns will remain silent.

It's an untidy compromise, but eminently preferable to three decades of civil strife and political deadlock. Too bad it comes to late for those who didn't survive the Troubles.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Warns Justice Over Terror Policies (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

The incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday described as "disappointing" the Justice Department's refusal to release documents detailing the Bush administration's interrogation and detention policy for terrorism suspects.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat, called on the department and the White House to "reconsider their response" and work with the committee "to promptly share this information, with any appropriate confidentiality safeguards."

Mr. Leahy, who bitterly criticized FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III last month during a committee hearing for refusing to discuss the Bush administration's domestic terrorist-surveillance program, has promised that as chairman he will target what he called the "unprecedented" efforts by the administration to "hide its own activities from the public."

"The department's decision to brush off my request for information about the administration's troubling interrogation policies is not the constructive step toward bipartisanship that I had hoped for, given President Bush's promise to work with us," he said.

Mr. Leahy said he requested documents in November concerning CIA interrogation methods and described the administration's offer to work with Congress after Democrats take over tomorrow as "political lip service."

"I have advised the attorney general that I plan to pursue this matter further at the committee's first oversight hearing of the Department of Justice," he said.

In November, Mr. Leahy told Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales that the CIA had disclosed the existence of two interrogation-related documents -- a presidential directive regarding the agency's interrogation methods and detention facilities located outside of the United States, and a Justice Department memo regarding CIA interrogation methods.

The CIA disclosures came during an ongoing Freedom of Information Act lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Prisoner abuse is one aspect of a broader problem, which includes the use of so-called 'extraordinary renditions' to send people to other countries where they will be subject to torture," Mr. Leahy said. "We diminish our own values as a nation -- and lose credibility as an advocate of human rights around the world -- by engaging in, or outsourcing, torture."

His request for documents included records describing CIA interrogation methods or policies for the treatment of detainees, including a directive signed by Mr. Bush governing CIA interrogation methods. He also sought documents regarding the legality of specific interrogation tactics.

In September, the Republican-controlled Congress passed a bill giving Mr. Bush wide latitude in interrogating and detaining captured enemy combatants. Democrats opposed the measure and have vowed to revisit the issue once they take control of Congress.

Mr. Leahy, joined by several Democrats and outgoing Republican Chairman Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, have challenged a provision in the bill that prohibits a detainee from protesting his detention in court. They have argued that it is unconstitutional.

Justice Dept. Refuses Senator's Document Request (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

Setting up what could become the first showdown between the Bush administration and the new Democratic Congress, the Justice Department has refused to turn over two secret documents, describing the CIA's detention and interrogation policies for suspected terrorists, to the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), who asked for the documents in November, said Tuesday that the department's response suggested that President Bush's promise to work with the new Congress "may have been only political lip service."

Leahy has said he might use subpoenas to get the material.

"It is disappointing that the Department of Justice and the White House have squandered another opportunity to work cooperatively with Congress," he said Tuesday in a statement. "The department's decision to brush off my request for information about the administration's troubling interrogation policies is not the constructive step toward bipartisanship that I had hoped for, given President Bush's promise to work with us."

The administration notified Leahy on Dec. 22 that it would not release a presidential directive signed by Bush authorizing the CIA to set up secret prisons overseas for suspected terrorists or a 2002 Justice Department legal memorandum outlining "aggressive interrogation techniques."

Leahy waited until the week that Democrats take control of Congress to release — and denounce — the response. The department's letter to Leahy was sent during Congress' holiday recess, when most lawmakers were out of town.

The exchange is an inauspicious start to what some lawmakers and administration officials had hoped would be a period of bipartisanship following the November election, in which Republicans lost control of both houses of Congress.

Democrats have pledged stepped-up oversight on a number of matters, including the conduct of the Iraq war, the National Security Agency's warrantless electronic surveillance of terrorist suspects in the United States, and the bungled response to Hurricane Katrina.

In a letter Tuesday to Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales, Leahy asked the Justice Department to reconsider its decision. He also told Gonzales he would "pursue this matter further" as part of an oversight hearing that the judiciary committee was planning for the department.

That warning indicates the depth of frustration among Democrats who believe the administration has withheld crucial information about its anti-terrorism efforts. In response to a question after a speech Dec. 13 at Georgetown University Law Center, Leahy signaled the possibility of using subpoenas to elicit information.

"I expect to get the answers. If I don't ... then I really think we should subpoena," he said. "If the president wants to claim executive authority, then let him do so, and then we can determine where we go from there."

In its Dec. 22 letter to Leahy, the Justice Department said the information he sought was classified and included confidential legal opinions that were privileged. The department also said disclosing sensitive operational information, such as interrogation techniques, would help the enemy.

"Al Qaeda seeks information on our interrogation techniques — their methods and their limits — and trains its operatives to resist them," wrote James H. Clinger, acting assistant attorney general for legislative affairs. "We must avoid assisting their effort."

Clinger said the department had already briefed members of the Senate and House intelligence panels about aspects of the anti-terrorism programs, fulfilling its obligations under the law.

He added that the department remained open to discussing many of the legal issues regarding the war on terrorism with Leahy and other lawmakers. He forwarded Leahy a document detailing how the department was currently interpreting the federal anti-torture statute under which CIA personnel could be prosecuted for mistreating prisoners.

Leahy noted in his response Tuesday that the document was already public.

The disclosure of the CIA "black sites" in late 2005 triggered a congressional furor — and a Justice Department leak investigation into a Washington Post report that broke the news. Reports of prisoner abuses in Iraq and Afghanistan have also prompted global outcry and raised questions about the moral authority of the United States worldwide.

Bush acknowledged the existence of the secret prisons in September when he transferred 14 "high-value" detainees held at the prisons — including alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed — to the military detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for possible trial.

Issuing a subpoena is considered a last resort for lawmakers looking to examine administration policies. Doing so can lead to lengthy legal battles and, in some cases, attempts by Congress to enforce the subpoena by withholding funds for administration projects or by refusing to confirm nominees to executive-branch or judicial posts.

FBI agents witnessed possible mistreatment of the Koran at the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, including at least one instance in which an interrogator squatted over Islam's holy text in an apparent attempt to offend a captive, according to bureau documents released yesterday.

In October 2002, a Marine captain allegedly squatted over a copy of the Koran during intensive questioning of a Muslim prisoner, who was "incensed" by the tactic, according to an FBI agent. A second agent described similar events, but it is unclear from the documents whether it was a separate case.

In another incident that month, interrogators wrapped a bearded prisoner's head in duct tape "because he would not stop quoting the Koran," according to an FBI agent, the documents show. The agent, whose account was corroborated by a colleague, said that a civilian contractor laughed about the treatment and was eager to show it off.

The reports amount to new and separate allegations of religiously oriented tactics used against Muslim prisoners at Guantanamo Bay. After an erroneous report of Koran abuse prompted deadly protests overseas in 2005, the U.S. military conducted an investigation that confirmed five incidents of intentional and unintentional mishandling the book at the detention facility. They acknowledged that soldiers and interrogators had kicked the Koran, had stood on it and, in one case, had inadvertently sprayed urine on a copy.

The reports released yesterday were the result of an internal survey conducted in 2004 by the FBI, which asked nearly 500 employees who had served at Guantanamo Bay to report possible mistreatment by law enforcement or military personnel. More than two dozen incidents were reported, including some that the government had revealed in earlier document releases.

The new documents were turned over as part of an ongoing lawsuit by the American Civil Liberties Union.

In them, FBI employees said they had witnessed 26 incidents of possible mistreatment of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, including previously reported cases in which prisoners were shackled to the floor for extended periods of time or subjected to sexually suggestive tactics by female interrogators.

In a previously unreported allegation, one interrogator bragged to an FBI agent that he had forced a prisoner to listen to "Satanic black metal music for hours," then dressed as a Catholic priest before "baptizing" him.

One agent reported being told that while questioning male captives, female interrogators would sometimes wet their hands and touch detainees' faces in order to interrupt their prayers. Such actions would make some Muslims consider themselves unclean and unable to continue praying.

Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter, a Pentagon spokesman, said in a statement last night that "the issues and facts raised" in the documents "are not new" and that 12 reviews have showed there were no Defense Department policies that condoned abuse.

"The Department of Defense policy is clear -- we treat detainees humanely," Carpenter said. "The United States operates safe, humane and professional detention operations for enemy combatants who are providing valuable information in the war on terror."

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said all the information from the survey has been turned over to the Defense Department's inspector general.

An FBI memorandum that accompanied the documents emphasized that none of the incidents involved agency or Justice Department employees. It said the reports concerned personnel from other government agencies or outside contractors.

Jameel Jaffer, deputy director of the ACLU's National Security Program, said the new documents highlight the need for more focused and aggressive investigation of allegations of detainee abuse at Guantanamo Bay. He questioned how aggressively the FBI pursued the allegations by its employees, because authorities conducted follow-up interviews in only nine of the 26 cases.

"More comprehensive investigation is needed, not only into the scope of abuses but into the root causes and policies that led to those incidents," Jaffer said.

Some previously reported tactics mentioned in the new documents include wrapping a prisoner in an Israeli flag, subjecting others to extreme heat and cold, and aggressively using strobe lights on others.

Such approaches were allowed under aggressive Pentagon detention policies in place at the time, and the new documents include several instances in which interrogators appear to cite such approval as justification for their actions.

But one FBI agent who visited Guantanamo Bay in the fall of 2003 described a tactic called the "frequent flyer program," in which detainees who were deemed uncooperative were placed on a list to be subjected to special sleep-deprivation tactics. The prisoners were moved frequently from cellblock to cellblock at intervals of two to four hours to interrupt their sleep, the agent said.

In September, the Pentagon adopted new interrogation rules, outlawing harsh techniques adopted at Guantanamo Bay, detention facilities in Iraq and other prisons overseas since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

FBI Details Possible Detainee Abuse (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - FBI agents documented more than two dozen incidents of possible mistreatment at the Guantanamo Bay military base, including one detainee whose head was wrapped in duct tape for chanting the Quran and another who pulled out his hair after hours in a sweltering room.

Documents released Tuesday by the FBI offered new details about the harsh interrogation practices used by military officials and contractors when questioning so-called enemy combatants.

The reports describe a female guard who detainees said handled their genitals and wiped menstrual blood on their face. Another interrogator reportedly bragged to an FBI agent about dressing as a Catholic priest and ``baptizing" a prisoner.

Some military officials and contractors told FBI agents that the interrogation techniques had been approved by the Defense Department, including directly by former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

The documents were released in response to a public records request by the American Civil Liberties Union, which is suing Rumsfeld and others on behalf of former military detainees who say they were abused. Many of the incidents in the FBI documents have already been reported and are summarized in the ACLU's lawsuit.

Defense Department spokesman Lt. Cmdr. Joe Carpenter said the issues raised in the report are not new. A dozen reviews of detention operations have found no policies that condone abuse, he said.

The treatment of detainees has long been a volatile subject, especially between the administration and the Democratic lawmakers slated to assume the majority when the 110th Congress convenes on Thursday.

One incoming chairman served notice Tuesday that the issue is a top priority. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., notified Attorney General Alberto Gonzales that his panel's first oversight hearing of the new Congress would focus on two documents Leahy is seeking about the interrogation methods of another agency, the CIA.

The Justice Department has refused to hand over the documents, saying their contents are ``extremely sensitive" and could help terrorists plot more attacks.

President Bush signed legislation in October that authorized aggressive interrogation tactics but did not define them. ACLU lawyer Jameel Jaffer said the court documents show that stricter congressional oversight is needed.

``If you just authorize in a vague way, there's no end to the abusive methods the interrogators will come up with," Jaffer said.

The records were gathered as part of an internal FBI survey in 2004 and are not part of a criminal investigation.

The agency asked 493 employees whether they witnessed aggressive treatment that was not consistent with the FBI's policies. The bureau received 26 positive responses, including some from agents who were troubled by what they saw.

``I did observe treatment that was not only aggressive but personally very upsetting," one agent wrote, describing seeing a man left in a 100-degree room with no ventilation overnight. ``The detainee was almost unconscious on the floor with a pile of hair next to him. He had apparently literally been pulling his own hair out throughout the night."

Another agent said he heard several ``thunderclaps" then saw a detainee lying on the floor with a bloody nose. Interrogators told the agent the man was upset and had thrown himself to the floor.

In one report, an agent said he saw a detainee draped in an Israeli flag in a room with loud music and strobe lights. A note on the report said the Israeli flag ``may be over the top but not abusive." The words ``may be" were then crossed out and replaced with ``is."

Carpenter, the Pentagon spokesman, said the Guantanamo detainees ``include some of the world's most vicious terrorist operatives."

``The Department of Defense policy is clear," Carpenter said. ``We treat detainees humanely. The United States operates safe, humane and professional detention operations for enemy combatants who are providing valuable information in the war on terror."

The FBI reports do not say whether any laws were broken. They said nothing employees observed rose to the level of abuse seen at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

FBI spokesman Richard J. Kolko said all the information in the reports was passed on to the Pentagon's inspector general.

FBI: Workers Saw Prisoner Abuse At Guantanamo (CNN)

CNN.com, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The FBI on Tuesday released documents showing at least 26 of the agency's employees witnessed aggressive mistreatment and harsh interrogation techniques of prisoners by other government agencies or outside contractors at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"On several occasions witnesses saw detainees in interrogation rooms chained hand and foot in fetal position to floor with no chair/food/water; most urinated or defecated on selves and were left there 18, 24 hours or more," according to one FBI account made public.

One FBI witness saw a detainee "shaking with cold," while another noted a detainee in a sweltering unventilated room was "almost unconscious on a floor with a pile of hair next to him (he had apparently been pulling it out through the night)."

Another witness saw a detainee "with a full beard whose head was wrapped in duct tape."

One FBI statement said that an interrogator squatted over the Quran and that a German shepherd dog was ordered to "growl, bark and show his teeth to the prisoner."

Another detainee was draped in an Israeli flag.

The FBI surveyed all 493 FBI personnel who had been assigned to the military prison facility in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and determined no FBI agent or support personnel had participated in any of the controversial practices.

"This thorough internal assessment shows the FBI was not involved in these activities in any way," said chief FBI spokesman Richard Kolko.

The FBI Office of General Counsel in September 2004 ordered the "special inquiry" into any FBI participation or observations of a series of alleged incidents at the prison camp for suspected terrorists and al Qaeda sympathizers, but the results were not made public.

The FBI released the documents in response to a Freedom of Information request by the American Civil Liberties Union, but stressed that most of the findings had already been reported elsewhere.

"Note these documents have been vetted by both DoD [Department of Defense] and FBI, and that FBI believes this or substantially similar information has already been released in this litigation," the FBI said.

Results of the 26 "positive responses" and several more "not purely negative responses" reported by FBI personnel in the internal inquiry were made available Tuesday on the Web site at www.FBI.gov. (Read the report)

Other actions FBI personnel reported either witnessing or being told about included:

Placing a detainee in a darkened cell with the intent of interrogating him for 24 hours straight; the witness reported being told that then-Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld had approved this technique.

Keeping detainees awake for days on end with strobe lights and loud music.

Dressing as a priest and "baptizing" a detainee.

Subjecting a detainee to a lap dance by a topless female guard.

Interrupting detainees' attempts to pray by putting fluid on their faces and telling them it was menstrual blood.

Beating a detainee who said he had recently undergone abdominal surgery.

FBI Releases Internal Documents in Guantanamo Abuse Investigation

Jan. 2, 2007 — The FBI has released documents related to an internal inquiry of more than 490 FBI personnel who served at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and who may have witnessed abusive or aggressive interrogation techniques by military interrogators at the facility.

From late 2002 through mid-2003, several FBI personnel who were at the base reported several incidents of abuse, including the use of dogs, extreme cold and sleep deprivation techniques.

Following reports in July 2004, the FBI's general counsel, Valerie Caproni, began an internal inquiry to find out how many of the FBI personnel at Guantanamo had witnessed abusive or questionable interrogations.

Of the 493 FBI agents and employees who were contacted and interviewed by FBI inspectors, 26 individuals suspected mistreatment of detainees but only nine employees witnessed such methods being used by military interrogators or contractors at the base.

Internal e-mails and communications from the agents assigned to Guantanamo Bay indicate their concerns to their superiors at FBI headquarters. "I did observe treatment that was not only aggressive but personally very upsetting, although I can't say this treatment was perpetrated by bureau employees," wrote an FBI special agent in a July 12, 2004, e-mail to FBI inspectors. "It seemed to me these techniques were being employed by the military."

In his e-mail, the agent described his observations: "I entered interview rooms to find a detainee chained hand-and-foot in the fetal position to the floor, with no chair, food or water. Most times, they had urinated or defecated on themselves and had been left there for 12, 24 hours or more. … I was told the interrogators from the day prior had ordered this treatmen, and the detainee was not to be moved."

The FBI agents assigned to Guantanamo were there gathering potential leads, through interrogations, about attacks against the United States in the wake of 9/11.

In May 2004, FBI director Robert Mueller told the Senate Judiciary Committee that "It is the FBI's policy to prohibit interrogation by force, threats of force or coercion. Where we have conducted interviews, we have adhered to that policy."

7th Circuit Ruling Expands Use Of FISA Wiretaps (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, January 3, 2007

Federal prosecutors may use wiretap evidence obtained under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act in spy cases for criminal prosecutions unrelated to the original espionage purpose of the wiretap, the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has held.

The ruling is the first outside the special FISA court itself to interpret the law as expanding the ability of prosecutors to use the act in a variety of criminal contexts, according to defense attorney James Geis, a Chicago solo practitioner representing Ning Wen, who was convicted of violating export-control laws.

"Unless there is a constitutional problem in domestic use of evidence seized as part of an international investigation, there is no basis for suppression," wrote Chief Judge Frank Easterbrook in U.S. v. Wen, No. 06-1385.

"I think this holding makes it virtually impossible to challenge a FISA search," said Geis. "This pretty much makes it bulletproof."

The ruling could be significant given the government's increased focus on economic espionage and international theft of U.S. technology. Last month, two men, Fei Ye and Ming Zhong, pleaded guilty in San Francisco to stealing trade secrets from Sun Microsystems Inc. and Transmeta Corp., with the intent of benefiting the People's Republic of China.

Wen and his wife, both naturalized U.S. citizens, were arrested in 2005 in Manitowoc, Wis., for sending to China $500,000 worth of computer parts that could be used to improve missile systems. The government alleged that the computer chips sent out of the United States to China without permission could be used for military radar and missiles.

The FISA court, created to oversee government requests for surveillance warrants against suspected foreign intelligence agents, has held that domestic use of intercepted evidence is permitted so long as it has a "significant" international objective. Sealed Case, 310 F.3d 717 (FIS Ct.).

Geis argued that evidence of domestic criminal conduct gathered under FISA warrants cannot be used to prosecute domestic crime when the espionage investigation dies without charges. "Violation of export laws was very different than espionage," he said. "We never got to see the [government] affidavit" that was the basis for the warrant, he said. In part, the export law violation claim against Wen may have been a matter of geography. "This was central Wisconsin. It would have been trivial in New York, Chicago, San Francisco or Los Angeles," Geis said.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the department is pleased with the outcome, but he declined to elaborate on its broader potential application.

Two Albany Mosque Leaders Request New Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 3, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. -- Two mosque leaders convicted last fall after a terrorism-related sting have asked the trial judge to set aside the verdicts or else grant them new trials.

Yassin Aref, imam at an Albany mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner, were caught in a 2004 FBI sting involving a fictional terror strike. The government never accused the pair of actual violence, but said they participated in a money-laundering scheme that included an FBI informant posing as an illegal arms dealer.

DOJ_NMG_0110591

In court papers filed Sunday, defense attorney Kevin Luibrand said the facts don't support Hossain's convictions. He argued they should be set aside because Hossain was entrapped, authorities induced the crime, the pizzeria owner had "no predisposition" to join in, and improper testimony from an unqualified prosecution expert witness made Hossain's political affiliation appear sinister.

Hossain was convicted Oct. 10 on all 27 charges against him, including three counts of conspiracy. The jury, which deliberated over four days, found Aref guilty of 10 of the 30 charges against him.

Aref, a 36-year-old Kurdish refugee from northern Iraq, was also found guilty of lying to FBI agents about having known a terrorist leader, Mullah Krekar.

The federal informant asked Hossain to launder $50,000, saying it was from the sale of a shoulder-fired missile that would be used to kill a Pakistani diplomat in New York City. Aref, spiritual leader of Hossain's mosque, acted as a witness to a series of transactions between the two men. Hossain said he had merely asked the informant for a loan.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericek, who prosecuted the case, said it's unlikely the trial judge would reverse himself and he doubted the motions would succeed on a later appeal to the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. Judge Thomas McAvoy was careful about the defendants' rights, he said, instructing the jury, for example, to consider the entrapment defense.

In court papers last week, defense attorney Terence Kindlon argued that FBI surveillance tapes showed Aref repeatedly said he could not support Jaish-e-Mohammed, or JEM, the Pakistan-based Islamic terrorist group that the informant claimed to support. "We feel the verdict didn't make any sense," he said.

The FBI has acknowledged Aref was the ultimate target of the sting, not Hossain. Luibrand declined to comment on whether prosecutors had offered Hossain a plea bargain.

Hossain, 51, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Bangladesh, could face 20 years in prison, Luibrand said.

The men are in jail, scheduled to be sentenced Feb. 12.

Can Small Businesses Help Win The War? (USAT)

By Del Jones

USA Today, January 3, 2007

The U.S. military is studying small companies such as 24-employee Craigslist to see how the online bulletin board has all but terrorized the newspaper industry by siphoning classified advertising.

Such research may unearth ideas that will help the United States fight the war on terror.

It may seem a stretch that within the chaos of capitalism are the secrets to fighting al-Qaeda. But the military and business have long borrowed leadership lessons and competitive tactics from each other.

In the past, sharing between military and business has been largely a one-way street. The Art of War by the ancient Chinese general Sun-Tzu remains a must-read for corporate CEOs, and most great lessons have been learned the hard way on the battleground before migrating into commerce. For example, CEOs have come to embrace the idea that it's better to act quickly on an imperfect plan than to introduce a perfect plan too late, a lesson first learned the hard way in the fog of war.

But now the military is paying closer attention to business than business is paying to the military, because the world of geopolitics has discovered itself to be on the same road that business has been on for some time. That road is flatter, more networked and more decentralized than ever.

Large companies are groping for strategies to fend off disruptive competitors, including YouTube, Kazaa, Skype and Wikipedia, companies that are giving away video, music, long-distance and information while eroding the revenue stream of companies that charge for it. YouTube is a website where users swap millions of free videos. With fewer than 100 employees, it has created anxiety throughout the giant industries of film and TV.

The Wikimedia Foundation has no plans to bring Western civilization to its knees, but the organization that provides a free Web-based encyclopedia has done as much to Encyclopaedia Britannica. Some 100,000 readers comb Wikipedia entries for errors. Two of those volunteer editors wouldn't recognize each other if they passed on the street. But they are joined at the hip by an ideology and can inflict pain upon a company that has been around since 18th-century Scotland.

How large, traditional companies fare in this fight may prove invaluable in developing a strategy against al-Qaeda. That's why the military is going to school. A book making the rounds at the Pentagon is The Starfish and the Spider: The Unstoppable Power of Leaderless Organizations. It was written for a business audience, but military strategists are saying, "This is the best thing I've read that applies to counterterrorism," says Lt. Col. Rudolph Atallah, a Defense Department director in international affairs.

The premise of The Starfish and the Spider is that centralized organizations are like spiders and can be destroyed with an attack to the head. Decentralized organizations transfer decision-making to leaders in the field. They are like starfish. No single blow will kill them, and parts that are destroyed will grow back.

When Starfish co-author Rod Beckstrom arrived at USA TODAY's suburban Washington, D.C., headquarters for an interview in November, he said he had just come from meetings with representatives at the Pentagon and elsewhere in the "intelligence community." He said he was contacted "out of the blue" in September by one of the highest-ranking officers in special operations, and more recently by a high-ranking special operations officer at Fort Bragg, N.C.

Next week, Beckstrom will present a "high-level briefing set up for a dozen members of different intelligence groups in D.C.," he said.

It's no coincidence that Osama bin Laden is the first leader of terrorism to have studied economics and public administration, nor that he cut his teeth on the family business in Saudi Arabia, says Bruce Hoffman, a professor of security studies at Georgetown University.

As disruptive as the Irish Republican Army once was, it had but "450 trigger pullers and bomb throwers, because (the leadership) couldn't control a larger number," Hoffman says.

But long before he became a household name, bin Laden was creating an organization so flat and decentralized that it can plot destruction from cells in about 65 countries no matter how deep its leader is pushed into the caves of Pakistan or Afghanistan.

He created a "terrorist sausage factory," in Afghanistan and then, like any good Silicon Valley CEO-geek, he attracted employees with an ideology and secured their dedication with vacations, airline tickets home to see the family, and death benefits, Hoffman says.

"Decentralized organizations can be more effective and resilient," says Craigslist founder Craig Newmark, who says he has come to the same conclusion that companies such as his have something in common with al-Qaeda.

Craigslist might be little more than an online bulletin board, but it gets 5 billion page views a month.

"People who are passionate and can work independently can get more done than a centralized organization," Newmark says.

Others have reached the same conclusion, although most companies declined interviews because they didn't want any part of the al-Qaeda analogy.

Many experts have identified terrorism as being hard to defeat because it is decentralized. But Beckstrom and Starfish co-author Ori Brafman, both with Stanford MBAs, hold out hope for victory. Beckstrom recommends three strategies against terrorism:

1 Change the ideology that fuels it. For example, he says the West should help fund public schools in terrorist hotbeds where parents now send their children to radical madrasahs because they feed and educate their children. For now, parents have no alternative.

School choice and other strategies aimed at the ideology take a generation or more, but Atallah says he, too, has decided that blunt military weaponry is not enough, and success depends on winning hearts and minds.

When Sandy Weill was CEO of Citigroup he took steps to decentralize a company that today has 300,000 employees in 100 countries by letting divisions compete freely against each other. To defeat terrorism, young people must believe they have opportunity in the world, or they will blow themselves up to get to the next, says Weill, who helped raise $100 million for victims of the 2005 Kashmir earthquake in Pakistan, a country known as a breeding ground for terrorism.

2 Centralize the decentralized opponent. An example of this would be to let Hezbollah go ahead and govern in Lebanon. Hezbollah is defined as a terrorist organization by the United States, Australia, Canada, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands and Israel. But it is more centralized than al-Qaeda and is funded by the centralized government of Iran. Centralized governments are easier to persuade and/or defeat than independent cells, Beckstrom said.

Google's decision in October to buy YouTube for $1.65 billion is the business equivalent. The move has already tamed YouTube into respecting intellectual property rights, because Google, with a $140 billion market value, has deep pockets and must worry about lawsuits. YouTube has purged copyrighted programs such as The Daily Show With Jon Stewart.

3 Decentralize yourself. The obvious military example here is to expand special operations and give small units the freedom to complete missions without oversight and second-guessing from command and control.

Of course, that has its downside as it does in business, says Robert Shillman, CEO of Cognex, maker of vision sensors that gauge, guide, inspect and count on the production lines of companies, including Ford Motor. When you give others freedom to succeed, you also give them more freedom to make costly mistakes, he says.

Were the military to become more decentralized with few orders other than to win, it would lead to greater success, Shillman says. But it also could cause a special-ops unit to destroy religious buildings if they were being used as havens by terrorists. Such tactics are necessary if the U.S. wants to win, Shillman says, because if bin Laden is decentralized, the U.S. military must decentralize to defeat him.

Bin Laden tells his fighters: "I want you to kill people and wreak havoc. Don't check with me, or they'll find me. We'll send money," Shillman says. "It's the same way Cognex runs our acquisitions. We hire smart people, give them cost guidelines and a reward if they succeed."

Even in business there has long been a love-hate relationship with decentralization. Sara Lee was little more than a group of independent, decentralized companies when Brenda Barnes became CEO in 2005. But with everyone acting independently, Sara Lee was unwieldy, losing volume discounts, and its computer systems were such a patchwork that employees couldn't communicate across the street.

Robert Nardelli reached a similar conclusion when he became CEO of Home Depot six years ago. Both he and Barnes have moved to centralize some aspects of their companies. Home Depot's stock was flat last year, and the jury is still out on whether Nardelli gained purchasing efficiency at the price of entrepreneurial spirit. Sara Lee's stock was down 16% last year while the S&P 500 index gained 14%.

"If you take decentralization to an extreme, you get chaos," Beckstrom said. But decentralization is winning, and he has yet to find an industry that isn't moving at least gradually toward decentralization.

Oversee.net, an online ad firm, has 150 employees. Companies that small have traditionally been managed top down. But CEO Lawrence Ng says he has already decentralized his employees into what he describes as SWAT teams and battalions.

"They know their goals. They don't have much intervention from myself or my senior management." Knowing what his teams are capable of accomplishing on their own, Ng imagines that it would be incredibly difficult for a centralized government to fight decentralized terror.

"How many cells are out there? All want to be successful and are coming up with their own strategy," Ng says.

Hoffman says no decentralized company thrives without strong leadership in the field, and the U.S. has probably avoided another attack after 9/11 by effectively taking out the second and third tier of al-Qaeda's leadership, including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Abu Zubaydah. The "decapitation approach" of killing bin Laden would have been less effective, he says.

On the other hand, the U.S. government has been unable to take advantage of one of its greatest areas of business expertise: marketing. Any first-year business school student learns that the first rule is to know the customer. Know the audience.

The U.S. marketing message has focused on freedom and democracy. A little research might show that "stability and justice are what people seek," Hoffman said.

Don Tapscott, whose book Wikinomics: How Mass Collaboration Changes Everything went on sale Dec. 28, says we've entered a time when people with no relationship other than a passion can come together to invent an encyclopedia or a computer operating system. California is thinking about using such collaboration to "wiki all school books," he says, which means using software that allows users scattered throughout the world to collaborate to create and edit.

There are 90,000 chemists online, 90,000 problem solvers, Tapscott says. Groups of strangers with an ideology — a passion — can "create a school book, a mutual fund, a motorcycle. They can also create terror."

It's unfortunate that the bad guys use the same tools as the good guys, says Craigslist founder Newmark. But the good guys have an advantage, he says.

"You can build a network around hatred that works in the short run. The way to disrupt a culture of hatred is to be noisy about a culture of trust. Until recently, the United States has stopped hatred from developing by standing up for our ideals," he says.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

6 Of 75 Cities Get Top Disaster Rating (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

The AP, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON - Only six of 75 U.S. metropolitan areas won the highest grades for their emergency agencies' ability to communicate during a disaster, five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, according to a federal report obtained Tuesday by The Associated Press.

A draft portion of the report, to be released Wednesday, gives the best ratings to Washington, D.C; San Diego; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Columbus, Ohio; Sioux Falls, S.D.; and Laramie County, Wyo.

The lowest scores went to Chicago; Cleveland; Baton Rouge, La.; Mandan, N.D.; and American Samoa. The report included large and small cities and their suburbs, along with U.S. territories.

In an overview, the report said all 75 areas surveyed have policies in place for helping their emergency workers communicate. But it cautioned that regular testing and exercises are needed "to effectively link disparate systems."

It also said while cooperation among emergency workers is strong, "formalized governance (leadership and planning) across regions has lagged."

The study, conducted by the Homeland Security Department, was likely to add fuel to what looms as a battle in Congress this year. Democrats who take over the majority this week have promised to try fixing the problem emergency agencies have communicating with each other but have not said specifically what they will do, how much it will cost or how they will pay for it.

"Five years after 9/11, we continue to turn a deaf ear to gaps in interoperable communications," _ the term used for emergency agencies' abilities to talk to each other, said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "If it didn't have such potentially devastating consequences, it would be laughable."

Homeland Security spokesman Russ Knocke would not comment on the report, saying only that in releasing it on Wednesday, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff will "talk about nationwide assessments for interoperable communications."

The attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, revealed major problems in how well emergency agencies were able to talk to each other during a catastrophe. Many firefighters climbing the World Trade Center towers died when they were unable to hear police radio warnings to leave the crumbling buildings.

In New York now, the report said, first responders were found to have well-established systems to communicate among each other _ but not the best possible. Thirteen U.S. cities scored better than New York.

Just over a year ago, Hurricane Katrina underscored communication problems when radio transmissions were hindered because the storm's winds toppled towers.

A separate report the Homeland Security Department released last month found that emergency workers from different agencies are capable of talking to each other in two-thirds of 6,800 U.S. communities surveyed.

But David Boyd, who heads the Homeland Security office that conducted the study, said in an interview that only about 10 percent of them have systems so fully developed that they can communicate with them routinely. That survey did not name the cities that provided data.

In the study to be released on Wednesday, communities were judged in three categories: operating procedures in place, use of communications systems and how effectively local governments have coordinated in preparation for a disaster.

Overall, 16 percent of the communities were given the highest score for the communications procedures they have in place and 1 percent got the lowest rating.

Nineteen percent got the top grade for their plans for coordinating during a disaster and 8 percent received the worst; and 21 percent got the best mark for how well they use their communications equipment while 4 percent got the bottom rating.

Most of the areas surveyed included cities and their surrounding communities, based on the assumption that in a major crisis emergency personnel from all local jurisdictions would respond.

Los Angeles got advanced grades in procedures and use of emergency communications systems and a well-developed grade in coordination of governance.

San Francisco, by comparison, received intermediate grades in governance and procedures, and a well-developed grade in use of systems.

Since the Sept. 11 attacks, $2.9 billion in federal grant money has been distributed to state and local first responders for the improvement of their emergency communications systems.

DOJ_NMG_0110595

Congress has ordered that the television broadcast industry vacate a portion of the radio spectrum to make it available for public safety communications. Lawmakers have also created a new office at the Homeland Security Department to oversee the issue, though they have yet to provide money for it.

The areas with the six best scores were judged advanced in all three categories. The cities with the lowest grades had reached the early implementation stage for only one category, and intermediate levels for the other two categories.

Chicago, Cleveland and Baton Rouge, for example, were judged to have accomplished the early stage of government coordination. Mandan, N.D., and the territory of American Samoa were both found to have gotten to the early stage of their actual usage of interoperable emergency communications and rated intermediate in governance and procedures.

The Chicago Office of Emergency Management and Communications took issue with the report's methodology and findings.

"We strongly disagree with the results of this study, and feel that the parameters of the study were inconsistent and limited," the statement said." In some instances, the scorecard evaluated urban areas or regions that contain a small number of independent jurisdictions and compared them with urban areas or regions containing significantly higher numbers of independent jurisdictions _ an apples to oranges comparison across the board."

The statement said that in 2006, Chertoff described the city's Operations Center, which is responsible for communications among various agencies and jurisdictions, "as a great model for the country."

Tammy Lapp, the emergency coordinator for Mandan and Morton County, N.D., said she was not surprised by the low ranking.

"We knew with our limited funds, we were going to fall short," she said.

Report: Cities' Communications Still Lacking (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — Emergency responders in most cities don't have the equipment and skills needed to communicate with each other during a crisis, according to a report to be released today by the Homeland Security Department.

Only six of the 75 cities and regions surveyed received top scores for "interoperability," or the ability to reliably communicate by radio. They were Washington, D.C., and its suburbs; San Diego; Columbus, Ohio; Minneapolis-St. Paul; Sioux Falls, S.D.; and Laramie, Wyo.

The report comes more than five years after the 9/11 attacks highlighted communications problems among fire, police and other emergency responders in New York City, at the Pentagon and at the crash site in Somerset County, Pa. The problems were especially acute at the World Trade Center, where firefighters couldn't hear police warnings to get out of the towers before they collapsed.

"One of the dramatic lessons of 9/11 was the cost in human life when we do not have at least command-level interoperability in cities and in regions," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said last month.

Chertoff said the country has made "a significant amount of progress" toward better communication systems. But in regions where there are still gaps, he said, leaders of cities and towns with incompatible systems need to work to develop a better system that would help communication during a disaster.

Since 2003, Homeland Security has handed out $2.9 billion in grants for interoperable communications systems, and Chertoff said his department's grant programs will be heavily focused on communications improvements over the next two years.

The survey, he said, was designed to identify the gaps so they can be closed "as quickly as possible."

The lowest scores on the report went to Chicago; Cleveland; Baton Rouge; Mandan, N.D.; and American Samoa. New York City scored in the middle.

Outgoing House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Pete King, R-N.Y., said communities immediately outside New York City have numerous communications systems that are incompatible with each other. That's also true in several other major urban areas, he said. "A lot of progress has been made," King said. But the report shows "how difficult an issue this is."

Congressional Democrats, who assume leadership of Congress on Thursday, are expected to address the issue as part of a campaign promise to pass all the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. The commission in 2004 cited the urgent need for "compatible and adequate communications among public safety organizations."

German Muslim Held, Denied U.S. Entry (NSDY/AP)

By Garance Burke, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110596

A German businessman of Syrian descent who wanted to surprise his daughter with a holiday visit was detained for four days in a Las Vegas holding cell before being sent back home without explanation. A civil rights group called authorities' treatment of Majed Shehadeh a case of anti-Muslim discrimination.

Shehadeh, 62, flew from Frankfurt to Las Vegas last Thursday, hoping to meet with his wife and drive to Bakersfield, Calif., where his American-born daughter had just gotten news she'd passed the California bar exam. Instead, he wound up shivering in a holding cell without ever being told why he couldn't enter the country, he said.

Roxanne Hercules, a spokeswoman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection, confirmed Tuesday that Shehadeh was denied entry, but would not discuss specifics of his case. She said Shehadeh's visa waiver could have been denied because "he could have a criminal record, or it could be a terrorism issue."

The detention follows a series of similar incidents involving Muslim passengers, according to the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

In October, an Islamic scholar from South Africa was denied entry at San Francisco International Airport. A month later, six imams were taken off a US Airways flight from Minneapolis to Phoenix after a passenger reported overhearing them criticize the U.S. war in Iraq.

"Overall these cases send a message that Muslims are second-class citizens who can be detained and kept from their families," said Affad Shaikh, a civil rights coordinator for CAIR.

Shehadeh touched down Thursday afternoon on a direct Condor Airlines flight to McCarran International Airport, where his American wife was waiting to pick him up. The couple had planned to visit family in the Las Vegas area, before surprising their daughter for the New Year and celebrating her wedding anniversary in Central California.

"I gave them my German passport, and he looked to see which countries I visited. He found I had stamps that looked like Arabic and asked if they were fake," Shehadeh said Tuesday in a phone interview from his home in Alzenau, a small Bavarian village.

"Nobody ever informed me why I was being questioned," he said. "All that was ever told to me was this had to do with Washington."

After being interrogated by Border Protection and FBI agents for more than 12 hours at the airport, Shehadeh said he was handcuffed and transported in the back of police car to a North Las Vegas jail. Officials told family members they had denied Shehadeh's visa waiver, which grants German citizens the right to enter the U.S. with no additional paperwork, said his wife Joanne Mulligan.

Officials with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement said they could not comment on why he was denied entry. FBI and airport officials in Las Vegas also declined comment.

An aide to Sen. Dianne Feinstein later told the family that Shehadeh was on a "look-out list," Mulligan said. Feinstein's office confirmed Tuesday that the family contacted her, but wouldn't comment further.

"I said you've got to be joking me, he's never even had a speeding ticket," said Mulligan, a retired math teacher for the U.S. military. "I mean, we're Muslims, and we travel a lot. Maybe the countries we travel to are not the countries they want you to visit."

Once in the holding facility, Shehadeh said he was stripped of his shoes, jacket and prescribed heart medicine and locked in a cell with about 25 other detainees. There was one toilet in the middle of the room, and access to a telephone was extremely limited, he said.

On Sunday, he was released and sent back to Frankfurt on the same charter airline.

Shehadeh's daughter Majida Shehadeh said she was glad her father made it home, but feared he wouldn't be able to return to visit.

"I used to be happy I moved here," she said. "But now I can't wait for when I leave here. The mentality is not what it was like beforehand."

Man Held In Pit Injuries May Enter Plea (DURHS)

By Beth Velliquette, The Herald-Sun

Durham Herald-Sun, January 3, 2007

HILLSBOROUGH -- If the FBI turns over the evidence it collected after Mohammed Taheri-Azar allegedly attempted to kill people on the UNC campus by running over them in an SUV, Taheri-Azar will enter a plea at his next court hearing on Jan. 24.

Taheri-Azar is facing nine counts of attempted first-degree murder and nine counts of felony assault for allegedly driving a Jeep Grand Cherokee through the Pit on the UNC campus and hitting people on March 3, 2006.

During a short court appearance here Tuesday, Taheri-Azar appeared to want the case to move along faster and said he wished there weren't so many short pretrial hearings he had to attend. Hearings, such as Tuesday's and a previous one in December, caused too much trouble for too many people, he told Superior Court Judge Carl Fox.

"It would be best to have as few of these hearings as possible," Taheri-Azar said. "If January 24 is the earliest possible date for this trial, then I think it's very reasonable."

Fox then asked Taheri-Azar if he had had a chance to meet with his family, and Taheri-Azar said he had met with them over the weekend. When asked if he wanted to speak to his family after the hearing, Taheri-Azar replied, "I think that it would not be a good day for that. We have our arrangements. Thank you."

After the hearing, when asked whether he planned to plead guilty, Taheri-Azar did not answer.

During the short hearing Tuesday in Orange County Criminal Superior Court, Taheri-Azar's attorney, Orange-Chatham Public Defender James Williams, told Fox he wants to see the interviews that FBI agents conducted in Charlotte with Taheri-Azar's family and others and to see any evidence, including computer files, that the agents may have collected in the case.

Orange-Chatham District Attorney Jim Woodall said he has been attempting to get that evidence without a court order, but so far has not been successful. Woodall said he believed the interviews did not have much evidentiary value, but Williams said he can't say whether the interviews have evidentiary value or not because he hasn't seen them.

"The statute clearly supports our right to have this information," Williams said.

Fox said he would give Woodall 14 days to try to get the evidence for Williams. If he doesn't get the information from the FBI, Fox said he would sign a court order to obtain it.

Williams also has written a letter saying he wants information from computer files and e-mails that UNC police collected from Taheri-Azar's e-mail account. Woodall said he believes he could get copies of the e-mails almost immediately.

UNC Hit-And-Run Suspect Wants Case Over 'As Early As Possible' (WRAL)

WRAL-TV, January 3, 2007

Hillsborough — A man accused of plowing a sport utility vehicle into a crowd of people at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill told a judge Tuesday that he wants to speed up the judicial process.

"Personally, Your Honor, I'd like to get this whole court-trial over with as early as possible," Mohammed Taheri-azar said.

The judge scheduled Taheri-azar's next court appearance for Jan. 24, when Taheri-azar is expected to enter a plea in the March 3 attack in which nine people were injured.

"And if Jan. 24 is the earliest possible next date to continue this trial, I think that's fair and reasonable," Taheri-azar said.

Taheri-azar's lawyer also requested copies of FBI interviews with Taheri-azar's family after the incident.

Taheri-azar, a UNC-Chapel Hill graduate, is charged with nine counts of attempted murder and nine counts of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill.

In letters to UNC-Chapel Hill's student newspaper, The Daily Tar Heel, Taheri-azar wrote that he carried out the attack to get back at "American taxpayers and their government" for the United States' role in the killing Muslims around the world. He also wrote that he felt "no remorse" for steering the SUV through the Pit.

Taheri-azar was expected to enter a plea last month in connection with the attacks, but that court appearance was continued.

From Monitoring Teens To Minding Terrorists (WP)

By Ylan Q. Mui

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The job of a shopping mall security guard normally involves controlling rowdy teenagers, finding lost children and patrolling parking lots. But starting this month, malls across the country will begin training guards for another task: fighting terrorism.

The 14-hour program is being developed by the International Council of Shopping Centers, a trade group, and the Homeland Security Policy Institute at George Washington University at a cost of $2 million. It is the first standardized anti-terrorism curriculum written for the nation's estimated 20,000 mall security guards.

Developers of the program say it is crucial to safeguarding shopping centers, which have significant economic import -- as evidenced by the billions of dollars spent at malls during the holiday season -- and have emerged as modern-day town centers, with movie theaters, restaurants, and now grocery stores and gyms.

"Many different facets of our society since September 11 have had to take the stark realization that bad people might try to do bad things," said Paul M. Maniscalco, a senior research scientist at GW who helped create the program. "Security is really paramount in large enclosed malls. . . . . These events, when you respond to them, you make or break it in the first 20 minutes."

Not everyone agrees, however, that America's malls face a serious threat of terrorism. And some critics question the effectiveness of the training when the private security industry suffers from high turnover -- most guards leave the job within a year and some in as little as four months, according to estimates from the Service Employees International Union.

"There is no justification for this," said Ian S. Lustick, a professor at the University of Pennsylvania and author of "Trapped in the War on Terror." "It's too diffuse a problem. There's a security problem in any public place. . . . The retail industry and shopping malls is just one little part of that."

The training focuses on making guards more aware of the effects of terrorist attacks and helping them recognize potential attackers. It ranges from the understanding the characteristics of the nerve agent sarin (especially dangerous in enclosed spaces because it vaporizes quickly) to spotting suicide bombers (look for unusual dress, like a heavy coat in the middle of summer). The program is being tested at a handful of shopping centers, including the Mall in Columbia, and is planned to be rolled out over the next six months.

The Department of Homeland Security categorizes shopping centers, along with other easily accessible public places, as "soft targets." Since the 2001 attacks, the Smithsonian museums and national monuments have been among those increasing security, and the Washington Convention Center recently said it was beefing up emergency preparedness training for some workers.

Yet the retail industry has treaded warily. Customers expect shopping centers to be free and open, and malls are loath to introduce stringent security measures, as airports have done, that might limit shoppers' access -- or scare them off altogether. Though security officers are usually uniformed, they are not intended to appear threatening.

"Their job is to be welcoming," said Robert Rowe, director of development for the American Society for Industrial Security, an advocacy group for private security officers. "The shopping mall doesn't survive unless people come."

General Growth Properties Inc., which owns Tysons Galleria and the Mall in Columbia, has already restricted access to the roofs of its buildings, said David Levenberg, vice president of security and risk management. The Columbia shopping center recently installed a video surveillance system, a wall of 16 monitors and eight video recorders filling a tiny security office.

"You want to see the sales slip?" said Bill Burley IV, director of public safety and security at the mall, as he directed one of the more than 100 cameras to zoom in on a shopper looking at jewelry.

But a report released early in 2006 under leadership of the Police Foundation, a District think tank, found that although some malls have made changes, they have not been enough. The study, funded by the Justice Department, cited lack of coordination with local law and emergency forces and financing for new technology. It highlighted poor training of mall officers in terrorism awareness and response as one of the industry's main challenges.

That thinking broadens the responsibility of security guards: Mall security directors surveyed in the report put loitering kids as their top concern, with terrorism second. Only 2.5 percent required guards to have some college education. Less than 1 percent mandated a degree in criminal justice.

Robert C. Davis, lead author of the study who now is senior research analyst at Rand Corp., said it is not feasible to teach mall guards the complex skills needed to identify potential terrorists, who are tracked through highly developed intelligence networks. He contends there is little malls can do to prevent an attack -- they can only react to one.

"The biggest things malls can do is have really well-developed, detailed emergency response plans and rehearse them," Davis said. "The best thing they can do is respond effectively."

Maniscalco said the curriculum focuses on awareness and response and was developed with the same materials used in training courses for emergency responders and law enforcement, tailored for mall security officers.

The instructional DVD was shot at the Boulevard Mall in Las Vegas. One lesson shows a man dressed as a janitor with a hose who seems to be watering plants in the food court. But there is no badge on his uniform and his eyes are scanning the crowd rather than looking at the plants.

Actually, he is spraying dangerous chemicals into the air, Maniscalco said. And instead of following an instinct to rush to the scene -- and possibly exposing themselves to the chemical -- guards should block off the area and call police, he said. The DVD also has live footage of terrorist attacks from New York to Russia, including the carnage following a suicide bombing in Israel.

"This is all real-world, everyday stuff that the security officer will encounter," Maniscalco said.

In fact, a man was arrested in December for plotting to use hand grenades and a pistol to disrupt Christmas shopping at a Rockford, Ill., mall. Two years ago in Columbus, Ohio, a man with alleged ties to al-Qaeda was indicted for wanting to shoot up a local mall. He is awaiting trial.

Still, there has been never been a terrorist attack against a U.S. shopping center. William Flynn, director of risk management for Homeland Security, said there was no intelligence to suggest shopping centers were in danger. The handful of reported threats seem to have come from lone wolves rather than organized cells, skeptics say.

"I wouldn't say let's classify every shopping mall in the country as critical infrastructure and start handing out federal grants" said James Carafano, a homeland security expert with the Heritage Foundation. "Putting a lot of money in this doesn't make much sense."

The initial rollout of the curriculum is being funded by the International Council of Shopping Centers, and companies that provide the private security for the country's shopping centers have agreed to participate, council spokesman Malachy Kavanagh said. Financing for the future has yet to be determined, but Kavanagh said the group plans to apply for federal grants. Flynn said he supports the program and that Homeland Security has conducted risk assessments at several shopping centers across the country.

One of the first guards to go through the new training program was Lt. Al Pineiro, who has worked at the Mall in Columbia for the past 10 years, starting part-time and recently going full-time. A former Army recruiter, he was at the National Guard facility in Silver Spring on Sept. 11, 2001. He recalled watching one of the World Trade Center towers crumble on a big-screen television with his fellow soldiers.

"I was shocked that it happened so close to home," he said.

Pineiro said the anti-terrorism training recalled the lessons he learned in the months following the attacks. It took him several days to complete the course, and he aced the final exam.

"It just reminds us that we have to stay alert," he said. "We can't afford to get complacent."

DHS Tracking System Will Keep Eye On IT Workers (GCN)

By Alice Lipowicz, Contributing Writer

Government Computer News, January 3, 2007

A new records system is being designed to allow the Homeland Security Department to monitor the names, passwords, citizenship information and other data on thousands of IT workers with access to the department's systems.

In a notice posted Dec. 29, DHS announced it is creating a new sensitive, but unclassified, database as part of its General Information Technology Access Account Records System. The department made the notice to comply with the Privacy Act of 1974, which regulates how the government collects and uses personal information.

The new database will collect personal information from IT employees, contractors, grantees and others, including people who serve on DHS advisory committees or are listed as points of contact for facilities.

The system will include names, user names, citizenship, business affiliation, contact information and passwords. It also will include home addresses, e-mail addresses, and names and phone numbers of people listed as contacts.

The information will be routinely used by DHS contractors and consultants, facility operators, congressional offices, National Archives, Justice Department or other federal agencies conducting litigations or proceedings involving DHS.

The National Archives will access the database pursuant to records management inspections and there will be no disclosure to consumer reporting agencies, the notice stated. DHS plans to destroy the records six years after the user account becomes inactive, or when no longer needed for investigative or security purposes.

WAR NEWS:

Troop-surge Proposal Fodder For '08 Presidential Hopefuls (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, January 3, 2007

Few Republicans sprinted to Sen. John McCain's (R-Ariz.) side when he first came out in support of a troop surge in Iraq several months ago, and some of those who did wound up backing off amid campaign-season criticism.

The proposal still isn't popular among Republicans, even as the Bush administration mulls putting it into action. Among Democrats, there is a similar brand of hesitance, despite varying degrees of support expressed by leaders including incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), incoming Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.) and incoming House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas).

None of those three is facing a tough campaign this cycle, however.

About two months after voters delivered what many Democrats interpreted as a strong message of discontent with the war in Iraq in the 2006 election, Democratic presidential candidates and lawmakers who are likely to face some of the most competitive races in 2008 are largely joining with Republicans in resistance to the idea of adding troops, citing the need for a political solution instead.

DOJ_NMG_0110600

Democratic presidential contenders Sens. Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) became the latest to come out forcefully against a surge in Iraq. They and other presidential candidates appear ready to make "The McCain Doctrine," as Edwards dubbed it Sunday, one of the first big issues of the 2008 campaign.

Polls have shown support for adding troops in Iraq to be below 20 percent, with a clear majority against it.

Biden, who has repeatedly said he is a candidate, and Obama, who has said he will decide soon, sent e-mails to supporters last week detailing their anti-surge positions.

Obama reinforced that he "strongly opposed" the war from the start and called for a phased withdrawal: "We must not multiply the mistakes of yesterday," he said, "we must end them today."

Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, vowed to fight the surge, saying it wouldn't work without a political settlement between the Sunnis, Shi'a and Kurds. Biden said he intends to hold a series of hearings this month to produce a better option.

Edwards weighed in after officially declaring his candidacy last week. Appearing on ABC's "This Week" on Sunday, he called the proposal "The McCain Doctrine" and said that, though McCain is his friend, "I think he's dead wrong about this."

Appearing on Fox News Sunday, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack (D) echoed Biden by calling for a "political settlement" and said the responsibility should belong to the Iraqis. Vilsack is asking supporters to sign a petition on his website urging McCain to find an alternative plan.

Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) came out against the idea after a Middle East trip two weeks ago. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) has left open the possibility if it's part of a "larger plan" for ending the war.

The proposal is also unpopular among incoming House Democrats, many of whom could draw strong challenges in two years. Veteran Rep.-elect Tim Walz (D-Minn.), who defeated Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R) in November, is opposed to ramping up troops, as are Reps.-elect Peter Welch (D-Vt.) and Paul Hodes (D-N.H.).

Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), who is up for a fifth term in 2008, believes the solution in Iraq is a political one, not a military one, said spokesman Tom Reynolds. "More troops doesn't get us to that goal."

Rep. Jim Marshall (D-Ga.), who was one of the few Democratic incumbents to face a close reelection battle after redistricting tilted his district in Republicans' favor, "generally speaking" does not support an increase, said spokesman Doug Moore, who added, "There would have to be a very specific plan with very specific goals."

Three months ago, Sen. Jon Kyl (R) expressed support for his Arizona colleague's position, and Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.) said during a campaign visit from McCain that he would consider the idea. Chafee's campaign manager said later on a local radio show that the senator was looking at everything.

Both of their opponents pounced. Kyl's campaign scaled back its statements, saying the senator would support an increase only if the commanders on the ground requested it, and Chafee's campaign manager told The Hill that the idea was "off the table." Kyl won reelection; Chafee lost.

In similar fashion, Reid was quick to back off his statements, originally made Dec. 17 on "This Week." Two days later, in a post on the Huffington Post blog, Reid said, "Frankly, I don't believe that more troops is the answer for Iraq. … We obviously want to support what commanders in the field say they need, but apparently even the Joint Chiefs do not support increased combat forces for Baghdad."

On the Republican side, among those running in 2008, Sens. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) have denounced the idea of adding troops, while Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) have expressed support.

After visiting Iraq in mid-December, Coleman returned and issued a statement saying he doesn't believe a troop surge "is the answer at this time." Last week, after an Iraq trip with McCain, Collins wrote in a journal on her website that adding troops would be "a mistake" and suggested repositioning the ones already on the ground instead.

Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) who is unlikely to face a tough reelection contest in 2008 but could run for president, has emerged as a chief critic of the idea and penned an op-ed in The Washington Post in late November calling for a phased withdrawal.

Cornyn has been calling for the surge for more than a month, and Graham has also recently emerged as an important backer. Both serve on the Armed Services Committee.

Iraq Orders Investigation Into Hussein Execution (NYT)

By John F. Burns And James Glanz

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110601

BAGHDAD, Jan. 2 — Iraq's Shiite-led government said Tuesday that it had ordered an investigation into the abusive behavior at the execution of Saddam Hussein, who was subjected to a battery of taunts by official Shiite witnesses and guards as he awaited his hanging.

Officials said a three-man Interior Ministry committee would look into the scenes that have caused outrage and public demonstrations among Mr. Hussein's Sunni Arab loyalists in Iraq, and widespread dismay elsewhere, especially in the Middle East. In an unofficial cellphone video recording that was broadcast around the world and posted on countless Web sites, Mr. Hussein is shown standing on the gallows platform with the noose around his neck at dawn on Saturday, facing a barrage of mockery and derision from unseen tormentors below the gallows.

As the shock of those scenes reached a new crescendo in Iraq, American officials said that they had worked until the last hours of Mr. Hussein's life to persuade Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to delay the execution. The officials, who spoke on condition that they not be identified, said they appealed to Mr. Maliki not to execute Mr. Hussein at dawn on Saturday because of the onset of a major Islamic festival, and because of constitutional and legal questions that the Americans believed threw the legitimacy of the execution into doubt.

But when Mr. Maliki decided to go ahead with the hanging, the Americans said they made no further attempts to stop it, having concluded that they could advise the Iraqis against the execution, but not prevent it if the Iraqis persisted, out of respect for Iraqi sovereignty.

When asked if that decision had been made in the White House, the Americans refused to say, noting only that it came some time before the final exchanges on Friday night. Mr. Hussein was hanged at 6:10 a.m. on Saturday, about seven hours after what the officials said was their final attempt to postpone the hanging.

"We told the prime minister that going forward on the first day of Id would have a negative reaction in the Islamic world, and among the Iraqi people," a senior American official said, recounting a telephone conversation with Mr. Maliki that began at 10:30 p.m. Baghdad time on Friday. The reference was to the Id al-Adha holiday, which began for Sunnis on Saturday, marking the end of the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. "Therefore," the official said, "we said we thought it would be better if they delayed until after Id, and use the delay to resolve the legal issues."

The American official said that Mr. Maliki had never fully explained his urgency in carrying out the death sentence, which was upheld last Tuesday in an appeals court ruling that set off a 30-day countdown for executions to be carried out after a final appeal has been turned down. But the prime minister gave one explanation that appeared to weigh heavily on his mind, the American said, and that was his fear that Mr. Hussein might be the subject of an insurgent attempt to free him if the procedural wrangling over the execution were protracted.

"His concern was security, and that there was a danger that if it continued, maybe there would be a mass kidnapping to bargain for Saddam Hussein's release," the official said. "He was concerned that he might somehow get free."

The American decision to confirm that they had opposed the quick execution came after days of silence from the American Embassy and the United States military command in Baghdad, which appeared to have been shocked, like so many others, by the unofficial video recording that showed the bedlam at the gallows.

With some Iraqi politicians raising fresh demands for Mr. Maliki's dismissal, the Americans, in offering to have a senior official discuss the matter in a telephone interview with The New York Times, appeared eager to protect the Bush administration from a fresh surge of criticism for its handling of events in Iraq.

The official said that among American officials in Iraq who had tried to stop Mr. Maliki from rushing Mr. Hussein to the gallows, the reaction to the scenes of abuse had been one of dismay.

"Well, yes, when I think of the behavior of the people who were there, I'm disappointed and distressed, that's true," the official who spoke in the telephone interview said. He said he had been one of the Americans who intervened with Mr. Maliki on Friday night and earlier last week to try to delay the hanging.

Mr. Maliki seemed equally eager to ward off the opprobrium stirred by the execution. As his aides announced that the events at the hanging would be the subject of an inquiry, one of the officials who attended the hanging, a prosecutor at the trial that condemned Mr. Hussein to death, said that one of two men he had seen holding a cellphone camera aloft to make a video of Mr. Hussein's last moments — up to and past the point where he fell through the trapdoor — was Mowaffak al-Rubaie, Mr. Maliki's national security adviser. Attempts to reach Mr. Rubaie were unsuccessful. The prosecutor, Munkith al-Faroun, said the other man holding a cellphone above his head was also an official, but he could not recall his name.

The government inquiry was ordered as a groundswell of protest grew at Sunni population centers across Iraq. The protests, sporadic in the first 72 hours after the hanging, appeared to be building in intensity as Iraqi and American troops relaxed security cordons that had been thrown around centers of diehard support for Mr. Hussein, including his hometown, Tikrit, 100 miles north of Baghdad, and Awja, the village where he was born, a few miles away. The protesters carried portraits of Mr. Hussein, chanted his name, and fired weapons in the air.

Thousands of mourners flocked to Awja, where Mr. Hussein's body has lain in a reception hall. The body, in a plain wood coffin draped in an Iraqi flag, has become a point of pilgrimage for loyalists. Many of those reaching Awja have wept as they filed past the coffin, shouting slogans of fealty of the kind that were universal in Iraq when Mr. Hussein was the country's dictator.

"Maliki, you coward, you are an American agent," cried one demonstrator in Tikrit, referring to the prime minister. "Iran, out, out!" another man shouted, echoing anger among Sunnis at the rise to power in Baghdad of Shiite religious groups backed by Iran, including Mr. Maliki's Dawa Party.

After Mr. Maliki made it clear to the Americans in Baghdad that his decision was final, the official who discussed the events on Friday night said, American commanders were told to deliver Mr. Hussein to an execution bloc in the Kadhimiya district of northern Baghdad that Mr. Hussein's military intelligence agency used to execute countless opponents of his government. At 4 a.m., Mr. Hussein was flown by an American military helicopter from an American detention center and handed over to the Iraqis. He was hanged with only Iraqis present, in a group of about 25, including executioners and guards, according to accounts by American and Iraqi officials.

A postponement of the execution until after the holiday would have delayed it at least until Thursday of this week. But the American officials said they had made no stipulation as to how long the delay should be, since their concern, beyond respecting the sanctity of the Id al-Adha holiday, had been that Mr. Maliki should await a formal judicial ruling resolving the legal issues before going ahead with the hanging.

The Americans said Mr. Maliki had agreed, as the Americans had urged, to ask the chief judge of Iraq's Supreme Judicial Council, Midhat al-Mahmoud, to issue a formal written judgment saying that the uncompleted legal procedures that concerned the Americans were not necessary to the lawfulness of the hanging. But Judge Mahmoud refused, the Americans said, and around midnight on Friday the Iraqi leader decided to go ahead with the execution, signing a decree ordering that Mr. Hussein be "hanged by the neck until dead."

The legal issues the Americans said they urged Mr. Maliki to resolve before the hanging centered on a constitutional provision requiring Iraq's three-man presidency council to affirm all executions before they are carried out. That posed a potential obstacle to the hanging because Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, is opposed to the death penalty. One of the other members of the council, Tariq al-Hashemi, is a Sunni from a moderate party that has disavowed Mr. Hussein, but has been careful not to endorse his trial and execution.

Mr. Maliki, in pushing ahead with the hanging, relied on a provision in the statute that established the Iraqi High Tribunal, which convicted Mr. Hussein, which said that the tribunal's verdicts, once upheld by its own appeal bench, were final and not subject to presidential review. It was that conflict the Americans said they wanted resolved by a written ruling from Judge Mahmoud. "Mr. Maliki said that Judge Mahmoud had given that opinion orally, but we said it would be better for everybody if he said it in writing," the American official who discussed the standoff said.

Sami al-Askari, a political adviser to Mr. Maliki who attended the hanging, said in a telephone interview that the committee would question everyone present at the execution. He said those who used their cellphones to record the event would be one focus of the inquiry. He said his own observation was that the worst sectarian taunts had come from a guard he described as a poorly educated Shiite man with a thick Arabic accent. "It was horrible, it was terrible, it was a mistake," he said. "We were supposed to sit there quietly, just looking at what's going on."

The first images of the execution that were released were in the form of an official video recording without sound. The unofficial cellphone images showed Mr. Hussein, with the noose around his neck, facing shouts of "Go to hell!" and taunts of "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" in reference to an unruly Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, who has become a populist hero among Shiites.

Speaking of those protesting the abuse of Mr. Hussein, Mr. Faroun, the prosecutor, asked, "Where were these critics when Saddam's people were executing whole prisons full of innocent people?" He said he had been deeply offended by the taunting of Mr. Hussein, and had tried to stop it. "You heard my voice on the cellphone recording," he said. "I was the one shouting, 'Please, no. The man is about to be executed.' "

Iraq To Probe Disorder At Hussein's Execution (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 2 -- As thousands of Saddam Hussein's supporters protested in Sunni Arab enclaves across Iraq, the Shiite-led government said it had launched an investigation into the chaotic scene at his execution, captured on video, which has deepened the nation's sectarian rift and sparked condemnation around the world.

Iraqi officials said a committee from the Interior Ministry would likely question everyone, including senior Iraqi officials, who was present at the hanging, where witnesses mocked and jeered the ousted president as he stood at the gallows. Hours later, grainy video of the event, taken with a cellphone camera, was broadcast around the world, bringing more pressure on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to take action.

The video triggered outrage, in Iraq and abroad, at Hussein's undignified and disorderly end. Iraq's Sunnis declared the execution an act of Shiite revenge. The Vatican, in its official newspaper, called the images from the hanging "a spectacle" that violated human rights and could harm Iraq's process of reconciliation. The Italian government, which like all members of the European Union opposes the death penalty, said after the appearance of the video that it would push at the United Nations for a worldwide moratorium on capital punishment.

U.S. officials have declined to comment publicly, but have privately expressed concern at the hastiness of the execution, which came just four days after an appeals court upheld Hussein's death sentence.

The video was the latest example of how amateurs using modern technology are exposing abuses and holding the powerful to account. The investigation, officials said, would focus not only on who hurled the taunts but also on how the video was leaked, damaging the government's credibility. Maliki's political adviser, Sadiq al-Rikabi, said the prime minister was "disappointed about that film."

"He took the subject very seriously," Rikabi said. "The prime minister tried his best to implement the execution very respectfully."

In the video, one person yells, "Go to hell," at Hussein while another voice is heard chanting, "Moqtada, Moqtada, Moqtada," referring to Moqtada al-Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric whose father and two brothers were assassinated by Hussein's regime. The taunts provoked Hussein to hurl insults. Later, images of Hussein's swinging body were plastered on dozens of Web sites. On the video-sharing site Youtube.com, a search using the terms "Saddam Hussein hanging" generated 1,559 results as of Tuesday night.

The probe could implicate senior Iraqi officials. Munqith al-Faroun, the deputy prosecutor in Hussein's trial, said in a telephone interview Tuesday that he saw two official observers using their cellphones to record Hussein's last moments. The two men, he said, were "recording through their mobiles openly." He said he did not recognize them, but could do so if he saw them again.

Maliki aides said they did not think any officials were behind the video.

"I think [it was] one of the guards, but let us leave everything to the inquiry," Rikabi said.

"I am confident that they were not the guards, for I checked the guards. I kept them under my eye," Faroun said. "They were not people who came off the street." Iraqi officials had been flown in by two U.S. helicopters from the Green Zone an hour before the execution.

Faroun, who could be heard in the video appealing for calm, said he had considered walking out during the disorderly moments, which would have halted the execution because his presence was required by law. But soon the room quieted.

"If there were other violations, I would have stepped out," he said. "I did not make a threat. But it was in my mind. If I noticed another violation, I would have stopped the execution and taken other measures," he added, without being specific.

Faroun said he did not know how the video cellphones were taken into the execution room at the former military intelligence headquarters, where Hussein's government had tortured and killed his opponents. Everyone at the hanging, Faroun said, was searched and had their phones taken. "Even my cellphone, which had no camera, was taken," he said.

[A] news agency, meanwhile, reported that U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad had urged Maliki to postpone the execution for two weeks until after the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Adha, but that he relented after Maliki produced documents legally authorizing the execution. U.S. officials declined to comment on the report.

Meanwhile, in Hussein's home town of Tikrit, peaceful protests continued for the third straight day. On Tuesday morning, several thousand demonstrators marched to the nearby village of Auja, where Hussein is buried. Firing guns into the air, they chanted, "Revenge, revenge," and, "We shall always remain Baathists," referring to Hussein's outlawed Baath Party. The protesters carried portraits of the former leader depicting him as the hero of the Arab Nation.

Thousands more Sunnis protested in the northern city of Mosul, while in Baghdad, similar but smaller demonstrations have taken place in several mainly Sunni neighborhoods.

"This action really put a great difficulty in front of us," said Alaa Maki, an influential Sunni politician, referring to the execution and video. "So many people now are having strong reactions against the Shiites, and they're doing shouts here and there and saying Saddam is a hero. This will not benefit the building of the political process."

He added that Maliki needed to take decisive action against Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia. "Now he's in a very critical state," Maki said of the prime minister. "My advice to him is he has to sign -- as he signed the execution of Saddam -- he has to sign the pulling out of weapons of the Mahdi Army and the militias. Otherwise, he's a prime minister for Shiites. Not only for Shiites but for al-Sadr and the people of all the militias."

Rikabi scoffed at the criticism from Sunnis that the execution showed Maliki's inability to control militias. "This is not related to the militias," he said. "You can't judge the ability of the prime minister by this."

"To be honest with you, many people try to defend Saddam," he said. "They can't say, 'Oh, Saddam was a very good president. Why did you kill him?' So they try to find some small mistakes here or there."

On Tuesday, the U.S. military reported that an American soldier was killed and three others were wounded when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol southwest of Baghdad on Monday. The soldiers were in a village talking to residents about sectarian violence in the area. An interpreter was among the three injured.

Iraq PM Orders Probe Of Saddam Execution (AP)

By Christopher Torchia

AP, January 3, 2007

Iraq's prime minister ordered an investigation Tuesday into Saddam Hussein's execution to try to uncover who taunted the former dictator in the last minutes of his life, and who leaked inflammatory footage taken by camera phone of the hanging.

The unofficial video, on which at least one person is heard shouting "To hell!" at the deposed president and Saddam is heard exchanging insults with his executioners, dealt a blow to Iraq's efforts to prove it was a neutral enforcer of the law. Instead, the emotional, politicized spectacle raised tensions between the Shiite majority and Sunni Arabs who ran the country until their benefactor, Saddam, was ousted in the U.S.-led invasion of 2003.

A prosecutor who saw the hanging said some of the taunting came from guards outside the execution chamber, not the masked ones who put the noose around Saddam's neck.

The Iraqi government did not say what, if any, punishment would await anyone uncovered in its probe of guards and 14 selected witnesses who attended the execution at a Baghdad prison before dawn Saturday. Some were high-ranking officials or people affiliated with radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a political ally of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who had wanted to speed up the timing of the execution after an appeals court upheld the death sentence.

The grainy video appeared on the Internet late Saturday. Al-Jazeera television also showed the footage at that time, saying it was exclusive.

The footage contained audio of people taunting Saddam with chants of "Muqtada," a reference to al-Sadr. Also on the video, Saddam accuses his tormentors of being unmanly in scenes that stop just short of pandemonium.

The video was inflammatory not only because the chanting was clearly audible, but also for showing the ghastly spectacle of Saddam plummeting through the gallows trapdoor and dangling in death, his vacant eyes open and his snapped neck almost at a right angle to the line of his shoulders.

In contrast, the official video showed masked executioners placing a heavy noose around Saddam's neck, without a soundtrack. Another official video shows Saddam wrapped in a burial shroud after his death, though his head and neck are exposed as proof of his identity.

Munqith al-Faroon, an Iraqi prosecutor who helped convict and sentence Saddam to death for the killings of 148 people in the town of Dujail in 1982, said he was a witness to the hanging. He said two top officials had their mobile phones with them — even though the government-approved witnesses had been searched before boarding U.S. helicopter that carried them from the Green Zone to the site of the execution, their cell phones placed in a box for safekeeping.

Al-Faroon did not name the officials who had their phones and said he did not know whether the Iraqi government had approved the mobile phone video.

"It might be for money. Maybe he decided from the start to film it and to sell it to the satellite TV channels," al-Faroon said in an interview with TV2, a Danish television network. "I do not think that an investigation is necessary if they only filmed it for money. The execution was not a secret. The filming was not against the law."

Still, the prime minister "ordered the formation of an investigative committee in the Interior Ministry to identify who chanted slogans inside the execution chamber and who filmed the execution and sent it to the media," said Sami al-Askari, a political adviser to the Iraqi leader.

Al-Faroon said he vigorously protested when people began to shout just before Saddam was executed, and that shouts of "Muqtada" came from guards outside the execution chamber.

"I am certain that the chanting at the moment of the execution was not organized, and that those chanting were not being ordered to do so," al-Faroon told TV2. "The guards made a decision to do so by themselves. This is the truth. I shouted at them and ordered them to keep silent. My voice is very clear in the recording."

In the leaked video, one voice called: "Allah, bless those who pray for Muhammad and his descendants. Allah, pray for Muhammad and his descendants and may they bring us their help soon and curse their enemies and back their son Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada."

DOJ_NMG_0110605

At that point Saddam asked, "Is this manly?"

A voice responded, "To hell."

Another voice called out, "Long live Mohammed Baqir al-Sadr" — a reference to the Dawa Party founder and Shiite cleric who was executed along with his sister by Saddam in 1980.

Then, a voice purportedly belonging to al-Faroon said: "Please no, this man is being executed, please no, I beg you no."

After Saddam was dropped through the trapdoor, a voice is heard shouting, "Don't rush, come back!" That suggests people were moving toward the body. However, the leader of Saddam's clan has said the body showed no signs of mistreatment after it was returned to Saddam's hometown Sunday.

It was unclear how many guards attended the execution. On the official video, seven people were on the gallows platform with Saddam. They included five guards in masks, a man without a mask whose face was blurred over, and a photographer.

Sadiq al-Rikabi, an adviser to the prime minister, told the U.S.-financed Al-Hurra television that he does not know who leaked the video and that such an act "is wrong and should be investigated, and I agree that cellular telephones were taken from witnesses before they boarded the helicopter" that headed to the execution site.

"I am full of hope that the results of the investigation will be announced, and the person who did this act should pay a price," al-Rikabi said. Still, the results of some Iraqi government probes in the past have not been released.

The Vatican's official newspaper on Tuesday decried media images of the hanging as a "spectacle" violating human rights and harming efforts to promote reconciliation in Iraq.

Within the country, Saddam's execution and the way it was conducted have provoked anger among Sunni Muslims, who have taken to the streets in mainly peaceful demonstrations across the country.

On Monday, a crowd of Sunni mourners in Samarra marched to a bomb-damaged Shiite shrine and were allowed by guards and police to enter the holy place carrying a mock coffin and photos of the former dictator.

The protest took place at the Golden Dome, a Shiite shrine bombed by Sunni extremists 10 months ago. That attack triggered the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiites.

On Tuesday, police in Baghdad said they had found 45 bodies scattered around the city. Many had been blindfolded, handcuffed and shot, apparent victims of sectarian violence.

Iraqi Government To Investigate Saddam Execution (USAT)

USA Today, January 3, 2007

BAGHDAD — The Iraqi government moved Tuesday to deal with allegations that the execution of Saddam Hussein turned into an unruly scene where the former dictator was cursed in his final moments of life.

The government plans an investigation to try to uncover who taunted Saddam and who leaked inflammatory footage of the hanging taken by a camera phone, said Sami al-Askari, a political adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Sadiq al-Rikabi, another adviser to the prime minister, told Al-Hurra television that he does not know who leaked the video and that such an act "is wrong and should be investigated."

Saddam's execution has prompted mainly peaceful demonstrations by Sunni Muslims in Iraq.

Blair's Deputy Calls Taunting Of Hussein At Execution 'Deplorable' (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 2 — Britain's deputy prime minister said Tuesday that the taunting and baiting that accompanied Saddam Hussein's execution was unacceptable and that the people responsible should be condemned for taking part.

"I think the manner was quite deplorable, really," said the deputy prime minister, John Prescott. "I don't think one can endorse in any way that, whatever your views about capital punishment."

Responding to the murky scenes that emerged after the execution showing witnesses and guards chanting and telling Saddam to "go to hell" as his executioners prepared to hang him, Mr. Prescott added: "Frankly, to get that kind of recorded messages coming out is totally unacceptable, and I think whoever is involved and responsible for it should be ashamed of themselves."

But in a terse exchange with an interviewer on BBC radio, Mr. Prescott refused to be drawn into criticizing the Iraqi government, which had custody of Mr. Hussein and which arranged his execution. "If they are responsible, I pass my comment and that's where I stand," he said.

Images of Mr. Hussein with a noose around his neck have been plastered across newspapers and shown on television all weekend here. In a country implacably opposed to the death penalty, the sight has been shocking, as was the speed with which it was carried out.

Prime Minister Tony Blair, on vacation in Florida, has not spoken publicly about Mr. Hussein's death, an omission that has been seized on by antiwar members of his Labor Party as another misstep in a long succession of them on Iraq. But the foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, released a statement last week saying that while she welcomed the fact that Saddam had been tried and "held to account," the British government had made it clear that it opposed the death penalty.

"We have made our position very clear to the Iraqi authorities, but we respect their decision as that of a sovereign nation," she said. Asked if the government had also complained to the Iraqis about how the execution was carried out, Mr. Prescott repeated what Ms. Beckett had said.

Saddam Execution Video Draws Criticism (AP)

By Anita Chang

AP, January 3, 2007

Grainy cell phone video of Saddam Hussein's execution triggered international criticism Tuesday, with Britain's deputy prime minister calling the leaked images "unacceptable" and the Vatican decrying the footage as a "spectacle" violating human rights.

Meanwhile, the Italian government pushed for a U.N. moratorium on the death penalty, Cuba called the execution "an illegal act," and Sunnis in Iraq took to the streets in mainly peaceful demonstrations across the country.

The unofficial video showed a scene that stopped just short of pandemonium, during which one person is heard shouting "To hell!" at the deposed president and Saddam is heard exchanging insults with his executioners. The inflammatory footage also showed Saddam plummeting through the gallows trapdoor and dangling in death.

The grainy video appeared on the Internet and Al-Jazeera television late Saturday. On Tuesday, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki ordered an investigation into the execution to try to uncover who taunted the former dictator, and who leaked the cell phone footage.

At the United Nations, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon ran into trouble on his first day of work when he failed to state the U.N.'s official stance opposing capital punishment and said it should be a decision of individual countries.

"Saddam Hussein was responsible for committing heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against Iraqi people and we should never forget victims of his crime," Ban said in response to a reporter's question about Saddam's execution Saturday for crimes against humanity. "The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide."

His ambiguous answer put a question mark over the U.N.'s stance on the death penalty, although Ban's spokeswoman said there was no change in policy.

British Deputy Prime Minister John Prescott said those who leaked the footage should be condemned.

"I think the manner was quite deplorable really. I don't think one can endorse in any way that, whatever your views about capital punishment," Prescott said in an interview with British Broadcasting Corp. radio.

"Frankly, to get the kind of recorded messages coming out is totally unacceptable and I think whoever is involved and responsible for it should be ashamed of themselves."

The Holy See's daily, L'Osservatore Romano, lamented that "making a spectacle" of the execution had turned capital punishment into "an expression of political hubris."

The execution "represented, for the ways in which it happened and for the media attention it received, another example of the violation of the most basic rights of man," L'Osservatore wrote.

The office of Italian Premier Romano Prodi said Italy would seek the support of other countries that oppose capital punishment to put the issue of a moratorium to the U.N. General Assembly. Italy and all other European Union countries ban capital punishment.

Italy, which is one of the rotating members of the U.N. Security Council, has lobbied unsuccessfully for U.N. action against the death penalty.

On Monday, a crowd of Sunni mourners in Samarra marched to a bomb-damaged Shiite shrine, the Golden Dome, and were allowed by guards and police to enter the holy place carrying a mock coffin and photos of the former dictator.

The shrine was bombed by Sunni extremists 10 months ago, an attack that triggered the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiites.

Communist Cuba, which allows capital punishment, called Saddam's execution "an illegal act in a country that has been driven toward an internal conflict in which millions of citizens have been exiled or lost their lives."

The Foreign Ministry statement Monday said the island nation "has a moral duty to express its point of view about the assassination committed by the occupying power."

The U.S. military had held Saddam since capturing him in December 2003 but turned him over to the Iraqi government for his execution.

New U.N. Secretary Begins By Addressing Capital Punishment (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — On his first official day on the job, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon stepped back from the United Nations' long-standing opposition to the death penalty, saying capital punishment is an issue for each country to decide.

Ban's statement contrasted sharply with his predecessors' public rejection of the death penalty, and with the condemnation by the United Nations' special envoy to Iraq of Saddam Hussein's execution last weekend.

Responding to a question about the execution, Ban said the former Iraqi leader "was responsible for committing heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against the Iraqi people. We should never forget the victims of his crimes."

But, he added, "The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide."

"At the same time," he said, "I would hope that the international member states would pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian laws"

It was Ban's first official statement as secretary-general. His aides spent the rest of the day trying to further explain his comments.

Michele Montas, his new spokeswoman, insisted that there was no change in U.N. policy, and that what Ban had said "was his own nuance" on the death penalty. South Korea has capital punishment, as do the United States, China and Russia, three permanent members of the Security Council.

"The U.N. policy still remains that the organization is not for capital punishment," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0110608

Human-rights groups said that the death penalty was not a clear-cut issue under international law but that an optional protocol to the legally binding International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights said that the abolition of the death penalty would contribute to human dignity and rights.

"We feel strongly that he missed an opportunity to make an unequivocal statement about the death penalty, which we believe is a human-rights abuse, and we look forward to stronger positions in the future," said Peggy Hicks, global advocacy director for Human Rights Watch.

At his informal news conference in front of the Security Council chamber, Ban also said that the crisis in Sudan's Darfur region was "very high on my agenda" and that his first trip would be to an African Union summit at the end of the month in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, where he planned to talk to Sudanese President Omar Al-Bashir.

North Korea's nuclear ambition is another top priority, Ban said. He told reporters he would do whatever he could to help along six-party talks. As the former foreign minister of South Korea, he was directly involved in the talks and has pledged to be personally engaged in the issue.

He said that he was starting his duties at a daunting time but that the world's crises needed to be addressed as a common effort. "Not a single person, including the secretary-general of the United Nations, not a single country, however strong," can deal with the challenges alone, he said.

Ban has begun to name his new Cabinet, a process that tries to balance merit with geographical representation. His first appointment was his chief of staff, Vijay Nambiar, a former undersecretary general and ambassador from India to the United Nations. His new spokeswoman, Montas, is a broadcaster from Haiti who joined the United Nations after her journalist husband was murdered in 2002.

New U.N. Chief Invites Controversy By Declining To Oppose Hussein Execution (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 2 — On his first day of work as secretary general, Ban Ki-moon, the mild-spoken South Korean diplomat who had suggested he would bring new caution to the post, invited controversy by declining to criticize the death penalty applied to Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Ban commented on the execution of Mr. Hussein just after entering United Nations headquarters on Tuesday morning to start his job.

“Saddam Hussein was responsible for committing heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against the Iraqi people,” Mr. Ban said in response to questions from a crush of reporters outside the Security Council’s chambers. “We should never forget the victims of his crimes, “ he said.

“The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide,” he added.

“While I am firmly against impunity, I also hope the members of the international community should pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian laws.”

Mr. Ban’s remarks appeared to contradict bedrock United Nations policy opposing the death penalty on human rights grounds.

He seemed to have tripped in his effort to tread lightly on the political views of the many United Nations members.

The remarks also seemed to show that Mr. Ban, who was South Korea’s foreign minister when he was chosen in October as secretary general, had not completed the transition from representing his country to leading the United Nations.

Michèle Montas, Mr. Ban’s spokeswoman, said the death penalty was legal in South Korea.

On Dec. 30, hours after Mr. Hussein was hanged, the United Nations special representative for Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, said in Baghdad that although the United Nations “understands the desire for justice felt by many Iraqis,” it could not support the execution.

“Based on the principle of respect for the right to life,” Mr. Qazi said, “the United Nations remains opposed to capital punishment, even in the case of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.”

Ms. Montas, whose first day on the job also was Tuesday, said Mr. Ban had not intended to change United Nations policy, but had added his own “nuance.” Mr. Hussein was hanged in a hasty execution at dawn on Dec. 30, in a chamber where many Iraqis had been killed under his brutal rule.

In public comments before his first meeting with United Nations staff, Mr. Ban said, “We have to show the international community that we are ready and eager to change.” He said the organization had faced “harsh and sometimes unfair criticism,” and acknowledged that “staff morale has plummeted.” But he said United Nations workers must be ready to “multitask” and to move frequently from armchair jobs at headquarters in New York into the field.

"My watchword will be meritocracy," he said, in words that should be well received by the Bush administration, which backed Mr. Ban to succeed Kofi Annan, who served two five-year terms, in part because of Mr. Ban's pledges to streamline the United Nations bureaucracy.

In veiled words, Mr. Ban seemed to hint that he would not overreach his power, but that he expected cooperation from the United States. Speaking of the many crises facing the organization, he said, "Not a single person, including the secretary general of the United Nations; not a single country, however strong, powerful, resourceful, maybe, can address this."

New U.N. Chief Defends Death Penalty For Hussein (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Jan. 2 -- U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki Moon said Tuesday that Iraq and other countries have the right to impose the death penalty, adding that the world should never forget Saddam Hussein's "heinous crimes."

Ban's first public reaction to Hussein's execution signaled a sharp break from his predecessor, Kofi Annan, an ardent death-penalty critic who opposed U.N. participation in the Iraqi war crimes tribunal that sentenced Hussein to die. Human rights advocates expressed concern that Ban's comments lend credibility to what they see as a flawed trial of the former Iraqi leader, and complained that he could set back efforts to abolish the death penalty.

The remarks suggest that the former South Korean foreign minister, who began a five- year term on Monday, would defer to the United Nations' 192 member states on some of the day's most controversial and unsettled issues. Nearly 70 countries, including the United States and South Korea, retain the death penalty.

"Saddam Hussein was responsible for committing heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against the Iraqi people," Ban said in his first news conference as secretary general. "The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide."

Ban said that while he is "firmly against impunity" for the world's despots, he would also urge states to "pay due regard" to international humanitarian law in meting out justice to a deposed leader. "The Iraqi people and government have taken steps to address their past, and I hope that the international community should also understand the stakes and try to build the rule of law nationally and internationally," he said.

Ban's remarks come just one day after the top U.N. representative in Iraq, Ashraf Qazi, said that the world body "remains opposed to capital punishment, even in the case of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide." But Ban and his spokeswoman, Michele Montas, repeatedly declined to say Tuesday whether the U.N. chief agrees with that view.

"The U.N. policy still remains that the organization is not for capital punishment," Montas said. Ban thinks "there are some countries that do recognize the death penalty. He would like to just leave it open to the countries." She characterized Ban's comments as "a nuance on the situation, stating that we should think first of the victims and the need for justice."

The death penalty debate unfolded as Ban began his first day as secretary general by paying homage to U.N. officials who lost their lives in the service of the world body, and by dining with employees in the U.N. cafeteria.

"My watchword will be meritocracy, with due regard for gender balance and geographical representation," he said in his first meeting with U.N. staff.

Behind the scenes, the United States, Britain, France and other U.N. governments pressed Ban to appoint their nationals to key senior posts in the organization.

Ban will announce on Wednesday the appointment of Britain's former ambassador to France, Sir John Holmes, to head the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, an emergency relief organization, according to two Security Council diplomats.

Alicia Barcena Ibarra, a former Mexican official who served as Annan's chief of staff, will be named undersecretary for management and administration, a position that has been traditionally held by an American national, according to senior U.N. officials and diplomats.

A U.S. candidate is being considered for other senior posts, possibly as the head of the U.N. Department of Political Affairs or as a senior official in the U.N. peacekeeping department, U.S. and French diplomats said. The French, who currently hold the top peacekeeping job, are also expected to hold a senior position in the peacekeeping department.

Ban also plans to appoint a woman from the developing world to serve as his deputy. Montas is from Haiti, and his new chief of staff, Vijay Nambiar, is a former Indian deputy national security adviser who served as special adviser to Annan.

Ban Cool On Envoy's Words (WT)

New United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon yesterday backed away from comments by the world body's top representative in Iraq criticizing the execution of former dictator Saddam Hussein.

Meeting reporters in New York on his first full day on the job, Mr. Ban said Saddam was guilty of "heinous crimes and unspeakable atrocities against the Iraqi people, and we should never forget the victims of these crimes."

"The issue of capital punishment is for each and every member state to decide," said the South Korean diplomat. " While I am firmly against impunity, I also hope that the members of the international community should pay due regard to all aspects of international humanitarian law."

On Saturday, the day Saddam was hanged in a north Baghdad prison, Ashraf Qazi, the U.N. point man in Baghdad, issued a statement saying the United Nations flatly opposed the death penalty, regardless of the crimes for which it is imposed.

The United Nations "understands the desire for justice felt by the many Iraqis," said Mr. Qazi, a Pakistani diplomat.

"Based on the principle of respect for the right to life, however, the United Nations remains opposed to capital punishment, even in the cases of war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide."

Aftershocks from the execution of Saddam, 69, continued to roil the Iraqi political scene after images from a leaked cell-phone video recording showed some of the witnesses taunting the former dictator in the moments before he was hanged.

Many fear the raucous scene at the dingy prison room execution on the first day of a major Sunni Muslim holiday will only inflame sectarian violence in the country.

"This man destroyed 35 years of my life, for many years I dreamed about his death. But when I saw it, I was angry," said a Shi'ite Muslim doctor who watched the televised execution.

"When you take a man's life, it should be with respect," he said, speaking on the condition of anonymity out of fear for his safety.

A Sunni former military officer jailed twice by Saddam's regime said Saddam, unlike his executioners, behaved like a "real man" in his final minutes.

"Killing him with this funny trial and in this way, and on this date, made Saddam an Islamic and Arab hero," said the officer, who also declined to speak on the record.

Sami al-Askari, a close political adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, told the Associated Press that the prime minister had ordered an investigation to identify who chanted slogans and leaked the video of the execution to the press. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, an ethnic Kurd who has long opposed the death penalty, said in a statement he had not been aware the date for the execution had even been scheduled.

But Mr. al-Askari defended the decision to execute Saddam.

"This is an artificial uproar," he told Iraqi state television. " cannot say this court has been unjust, and so they take this mistake and forget that Saddam deserved to be executed."

Few foreign governments or war-crimes analysts supported the court case against Saddam and several aides, in large part because of the possibility of capital punishment.

The United Nations and the body's human rights agency have traditionally opposed capital punishment. But the world body also has long deferred to national laws on internal matters such as the death penalty, abortion and other difficult issues.

Michele Montas, Mr. Ban's spokeswoman, said Mr. Qazi was "tacitly referring" to the human rights agency's stand in questioning the decision to put Saddam to death. She denied that either Mr. Qazi or Mr. Ban was trying to alter long-standing U.N. policies on the death penalty.

Mr. al-Maliki, a Shi'ite who pushed strongly for Saddam's prompt execution last week, said in an interview published in the Wall Street Journal that he was ready to hand over the job of prime minister.

"I wish I could be done with it even before the end of this term," said Mr. al-Maliki, whose seven months in office have seen escalating violence and brutal sectarian reprisal killings.

A Hanging And A Funeral (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Last Saturday was a strange day. It started with the hanging of Saddam Hussein. The more I read about the hasty, quasi-legal maneuvers used by Iraq's Shiite leaders to rush Saddam to the gallows on a Muslim holiday, Id al-Adha, and the more I watched the grainy cellphone video of the event, in which a guard is heard taunting Saddam with chants of "Moktada! Moktada!" — the Shiite cleric whose death squads have killed hundreds of Sunnis — and the more I read of the insults Saddam spat back, the more it resembled a tribal revenge ritual rather than the culmination of a constitutional process in which America should be proud to have participated.

Bassam al-Husseini, an aide to Iraq's Shiite prime minister, was quoted by the BBC as saying Saddam's execution was "an Id gift to the Iraqi people." Many Sunnis would not share that view. For his part, Saddam, a Sunni, used his last breaths to spew vitriol against "the traitors, the Americans, the spies and the Persians." For Persians, read Shiites.

No wonder the BBC's world affairs editor, John Simpson, reported from Baghdad: "Altogether, the execution as we now see it is shown to be an ugly, degrading business, which is more reminiscent of a public hanging in the 18th century than a considered act of 21st-century official justice. Under Saddam Hussein, prisoners were regularly taunted and mistreated in their last hours. The most disturbing thing about the new video of Saddam's execution for crimes precisely like this is that it is all much too reminiscent of what used to happen here."

But as I said, Saturday was a strange day. After watching Saddam's hanging in the morning, I was sitting at my computer late in the afternoon and suddenly heard the strains of "My country 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty" being played on the TV in the next room. When I checked what was going on, I saw President Ford's coffin being unloaded from Air Force One.

I have to admit I got a lump in my throat watching that scene and listening to that stirring melody. Saddam's execution was a snapshot of a country divided. Gerald Ford's funeral was a snapshot of a country united — political supporters and opponents alike paying tribute to a president, who was surrounded by an honor guard representing every color of the American rainbow and whose place in history was secured by an act of pardon and national healing.

How fortunate to live in a country where this is the political norm, built up over generations.

"Because of our basic unity, we can afford to be divided on specific issues," said Michael Mandelbaum, author of "The Case for Goliath." "Democracy is about differences and contesting them in the public sphere, and it only works when there is basic agreement about the fundamentals. We should feel fortunate that we have a democratic history and set of beliefs. Those beliefs can be imported by those who want them and don't have them, but they can't be exported. We can only create a context where others would want to import them."

The raw tribal theatrics of Saddam's hanging highlight just how few of these values Iraq has imported. We are to blame for not creating the security needed for those values to take hold. But not enough of our Iraqi allies have risen to the occasion, either. It was our closest Iraqi partners who oversaw Saddam's tribal hanging. We have to look that in the eye.

Saddam deserved to die 100 deaths. But imagine if Iraq's Shiite leaders had surprised everyone, declared that there had been enough killing in Iraq and commuted Saddam's sentence to life in prison — sparing his life in hopes of uniting the country rather than executing him and dividing it further. I don't know if it would have helped, but I do know Iraqis have rarely surprised us with gestures of reconciliation — only with new ways to kill each other.

Now President Bush wants a "surge" of more U.S. troops to Baghdad, in one last attempt to bring order. Whenever I hear this surge idea, I think of a couple who recently got married but the marriage was never very solid. Then one day they say to each other, "Hey, let's have a baby, that will bring us together." It never works.

If the underlying union is not there, adding a baby won't help. And if the underlying willingness to share power and resources is not present among the major communities in Iraq, adding more U.S. troops won't help either. Adding more troops makes sense only if it's to buy more time for positive trends that have already begun to appear on the horizon. I don't see them.

As Saddam's hanging underscored, Iraqis are doing things their way. So maybe it's time to get out of their way.

'He Was His Own Accuser' (WSJ)

By Marty Peretz

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

This is not the case of Oliver David Cruz, who was executed on Aug. 9, 2000. Cruz, whose I.Q. ranged from 63 to 83, had raped and murdered a 24-year-old woman stationed at Kelly Air Force Base in San Antonio, Texas. If Cruz had lived until 2002, when the Supreme Court ruled the death sentence could not be imposed on mentally retarded people, he would have spent his life in prison. He was what we used to call, unsentimentally but truthfully, "an idiot." To me it was axiomatic that killing him was unjust. I do not ever really feel that the state is righteous when it snuffs out even a hardened criminal's breath. * * *

Saddam Hussein's execution was another matter entirely. Those who do not see that are blind to the implicit social compact of any polity, and to its always precarious situation. What this tyrant did in murdering hundreds of thousands and terrorizing millions more, within Iraq and outside it, was to normalize brutality, establish falsity and hysteria as the common language, and routinely invade the boundaries of private life. Saddam's crimes unraveled whatever authenticity and spontaneity was possible in the artificial confines of a post-Versailles state.

He also brought dread to this state's neighbors. Men and women trembled at his name. And for what purpose did Saddam put the people of Iraq and the region through these horrors? For the nihilistic purpose of sustaining his rule and that of his clan. And yet, as no one has reminded us in recent times, he also murdered kith and kin.

Seen from this perspective, the attacks on Saddam's death sentence, self-righteous and oh, so elementally moral, are petty and falsely framed. I am afraid it is the Vatican that has failed humankind most glaringly in this regard. True, it is not the Vicar of Christ who has spoken, but his designate, Cardinal Renato Martino, head of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace. Rome tends to speak portentously, urbi et orbi. Yet such speech is also often simple-minded.

"Capital punishment is not natural death," said Cardinal Martino. OK. That's obvious. So what? "Life is a gift that the Lord has given us," the cardinal continued, "and we must protect it from conception until natural death." In this rendering, are we supposed to imagine that Saddam is an innocent unborn fetus in his mother's womb? Is this a debate over abortion? Does Cardinal Martino have no conception of the dimensions of the tyrant's crimes? (Cardinal Martino does not always speak in such pabulum. He is often aggressive, as when he condemned the allied intervention in Iraq as a "war of aggression." The Vatican then told journalists that the cardinal was speaking for himself, not for John Paul II. Martino picked up many anti-American tropes during the 16 years he represented the Church at the U.N. Sixteen years, poor man, no wonder, he's a little overwrought and also disingenuous.)

Of course, many of the other critics of the death sentence do not speak of life as a benefaction from God. The folks who echo Amnesty International's denunciation would be horrified at the sheer thought. Ditto the European Union. The same for Romano Prodi, the socialist prime minister of Italy. And the antiterrorism officer at the U.N. Plus the governments of France, Denmark, Portugal, Spain and Germany.

Marco Pancetta, head of the Radical Party in Italy, had declared a hunger strike, was ready to go to Baghdad to petition for a "pardon." Yes, a hunger strike. Until death? Does Cardinal Martino believe a hunger strike natural? And, yes, a pardon. Was he out of his mind? Saddam's death has cheated Mr. Pancetta of his foolishness. Had the convict lived, we would have had to endure candlelight vigils throughout the soft countries. Soft power, indeed.

The burden of most of these objections to the death penalty is that the trial was not really fair. Now, these were certainly the most judicious legal proceedings ever held in modern Iraq. Is this not superior to victors' justice? The defendant had legal counsel of his own choosing, among them Ramsey Clark, not so mentally stable is my guess, but a former attorney-general of the U.S. and not an easily intimidated advocate. What's more, as Fouad Ajami has pointed out, the accused performed histrionics that were tolerated even though they made havoc of courtroom order. If Saddam were the accused in a U.S. tribunal, he would have been bound and gagged. In Saddam's own Iraq, he would have been lashed, at a minimum.

The Arab world is somewhat split about the sentence. Yemen, little Yemen, has actually announced that the country "unanimously" condemns everything about the trial: the process, the verdict and the punishment. You get some sense of what political discourse is like in a state where everything is (or is said to be) unanimous. Doubtless, Sunni Baathists were very close to unanimous in opposing it. But the Arab world and its non-Arab Muslim cousins, whatever they feel about the armed foreign presence in Iraq, could not honestly make the case against the penalty of death -- although some made the argument nonetheless. It is simply too routine, too ingrained in the fabric of their societies to be shocking. After all, you can juridically be condemned to death for having committed adultery (that is, if you are a woman), for stealing, for heresy and blasphemy. Moderate Arabs will breathe a sigh of relief now that the dictator is dead. And also those non-moderate Arabs whom he threatened.

Two surprising trends, one a great relief. The relief is that the people of Western Europe seem to be more sensible than their governments. Even the French, the Italians, the Spanish and others support the taking of Saddam's life. Like the Poles, and their prime minister, Jaroslaw Kaczynski. You have to have lived under a tyranny within your own memory to know why the tyrant should be punished, and punished decisively.

The other trend is a bit confusing. It shows itself especially in our stalwart ally, Great Britain, where the Labour government still adheres to the traditional alliance, in war and in peace. Margaret Beckett, Tony Blair's foreign secretary, spoke strongly in support of the hangman's noose.

But, ironically, there were counter-indications from the Tory right. Frustrated by its years in the political wilderness, the Conservatives much resent Labour's alliance with George Bush, even though they ridicule it. The brilliant showman-parliamentarian Boris Johnson, shadow minister for higher education, elicited from Ms. Beckett's predecessor, Jack Straw, already two years ago a statement of opposition to the ultimate penalty. Relying on Britain's longstanding opposition to capital punishment, they were working in consort against Mr. Blair's fidelity to how America sees the world. The prospect of Saddam's hanging would be their instrument.

Another, more recent sign of Conservative estrangement (not the only one) from the historically axiomatic bond with the U.S. is a querulous on-line column by the querulous Peregrine Worsthorne asserting that "Saddam was a butcher, so was Truman." Now, this is not a logical argument for anything. But his point was that Saddam's "cruel tyranny had at least provided the people with a degree of security quite unimaginable under conditions of freedom and democracy . . . a reign of fear may be the only effective system of government." This is cynicism of an especially low order. And if it gains currency in the house of Winston Churchill, where can it not become common wisdom? * * *

Saddam has already swung from the ropes. May his soul be tormented for eternity. If Saddam were a pious and literate Christian -- actually, he wasn't even a pious Muslim -- he might have recognized, as Dante did for Nimrod, that "he was his own accuser." His life is its own accusation.

The question, then, is not whether Iraq will recover from the oppressor's death. The question is whether Iraq will recover from the oppressor's rule. The execution of this monstrous man was not intended to be a deterrent to evil. There are probably no deterrents to real evil and real evildoers. But a community can punish its own pharaohs. That punishment will be the most significant sovereign act the people of Iraq have ever done. This is an act of recovery by itself.

Poor Execution (HC)

Houston Chronicle, January 3, 2007

Saddam Hussein's hanging lets condemned dictator play martyr while emphasizing sectarian blood lust

If any event in Iraq should have been completely under the control of U.S. forces and the government they defend, it was the final moments of condemned former dictator Saddam Hussein. Unfortunately, like so much else that has occurred since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, the tyrant's death turned into another fiasco and missed opportunity.

Like the legally questionable proceeding that produced his death sentence, the rush to put a noose around Saddam's head at the start of a Muslim holiday backfired, adding more fuel to the Shiite-Sunni conflagration that has engulfed Iraq while giving Saddam a last cell phone photo op breathing defiance against his enemies. His final words were "Down with the traitors, the Americans and the Persians." Rather than looking like the cowering vagrant that U.S. troops pulled out of a hole, the well-groomed fallen dictator exhibited nonchalance and sarcasm.

Like the raucous and sometimes out of control proceedings that resulted in Saddam's conviction for killing 148 Shiite villagers after a failed assassination attempt, the authorities' conduct at the execution only served notice how far the new Iraq has to go in meeting the standards of democratic justice. The elite government unit escorting Hussein to his death cursed the prisoner and broke into chants of "Muq- tada," referring to the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. According to The New York Times, two witnesses at the hanging wryly exchanged a quip that the behavior of the guards indicated the government had yet to stop the infiltration by sectarian militia.

Former NBC Evening News anchorman Tom Brokaw echoed a sentiment about the handling of the execution widely expressed in the news media. He told radio show host Don Imus that Saddam, a mass murderer with the blood of millions on his hands, was "able to stand up there with the hood off and invoke prayer and even invoke the Palestinians, and go out in the eyes of his people at least as a martyr." Brokaw described the execution scene as "something that resembled the worst kind of nightmare out of the old American West. "

The Vatican and most European heads of state denounced the execution out of a long-standing opposition to the death penalty. Apparently U.S. officials in Iraq had questioned the legality and wisdom of rushing Saddam to the gallows, but their concerns were overridden by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite. By hanging Saddam at the start of the Id al-Adha holiday, the government violated an Iraqi law followed in Saddam's time prohibiting public executions during holy periods. Sunnis reacted to the execution with nonviolent protest marches throughout Iraq, raising fears of new cycles of revenge killings by armed militias.

The execution also short-circuited Saddam's trial on charges of ordering poison gas attacks during the infamous Anfal campaign that killed thousands of his countrymen in the Kurdish city of Halabja. That proceeding would have presented a far different image of the dictator to the world than what was on display last weekend.

Without Saddam in the dock, few will hear the damning testimony that would have depicted a human monster rather than a nationalist martyr. It's unfortunate that won't be his final photo op.

Hanging Won't Bring U.S. Troops Home Sooner (VAPILOT)

The Virginian-pilot

Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot, January 3, 2007

Celebration followed Saddam Hussein's death at the end of a hangman's noose this weekend – technically as punishment for killing 148 people nearly a quarter-century ago, but really for a reign of terror that lasted decades. Relief followed his death, too – the end of a madman's reign of terror over his own people and his own tiny corner of the planet.

In the days to follow, some might even welcome Saturday's grisly event as the beginning of the end to U.S. involvement in Iraq. That reasoning, sadly, would be false.

DOJ_NMG_0110614

Saddam's crimes against humanity, and against anyone who dared to criticize his dictatorial rule, targeted Kurds and Shiites, women and children, foes and even two sons-in-law who had revealed details of Saddam's weapons programs. He engineered a disastrous eight-year war against Iran in the 1980s. He invaded Kuwait in 1990, only to be forced out by the U.S.-led coalition in the Persian Gulf War.

He was a menace to every Iraqi except for those among his Sunni base. But his death is unlikely to bring peace to the nation he left behind.

The execution early Saturday is cold comfort to the U.S. troops now stuck in Iraq, trying to impose stability on a fractured nation that seems to want none of it. Amid sectarian violence, warring militias and foreign insurgents, there's no end in sight to the mounting death toll of Americans and Iraqis alike. President Bush, who ordered the invasion of Iraq, is desperately trying to chart a new course there.

In a particularly cruel commentary, observers said the 80 Iraqis who died Saturday in bombings and other attacks were not unusually high, nor did the deaths appear be in retaliation for Saddam's execution. Eighty deaths have now become acceptable, the norm, just another day in this nation that U.S. troops invaded in 2003 to liberate.

And another grim milestone was reached Sunday. The Associated Press reported that at least 3,000 U.S. military personnel have been killed in Iraq since the war began. The news agency said Spc. Dustin R. Donica of Texas was killed Thursday by small arms fire. Thousands more U.S. troops have been wounded, maimed or worse.

This has occurred against a backdrop of an increasingly disenchanted American public; disaffection for the conduct of the war played the biggest part in the Democratic takeover of Congress two months ago. The U.S. has spent more than $350 billion for a conflict that shows no end in sight.

All of which provides a bloody, costly context in which to place Saddam's execution. When the history of this war is written in years to come, this weekend's hanging may be no more than a footnote.

A Regrettable Rush To Execution (BOS)

The Boston Globe, January 3, 2007

IN HIS FINAL minutes, one of Saddam Hussein's executioners shouted, "Go to hell, Saddam." The condemned man replied dryly, "You mean the Iraq that is today." After his body dropped through the trap door, the assembled witnesses chanted Shi'ite slogans.

It was Saddam that turned Iraq into hell during his 35 years in power. He murdered as many as half a million Iraqis and plunged his country into two catastrophic wars with neighboring Iran and Kuwait.

But Saddam was not executed for any of this. Instead, he was hanged for ordering the killing of 148 Shi'ite men and boys in the village of Dujail in reprisal for an assassination attempt that took place there in July 1982. While the trial was criticized by human rights groups, the verdict was consistent with the evidence. Saddam's signature was on the order for the execution and he freely admitted that he had signed the document. His explanation -- that the killings were justified since the would-be killers were linked to the Iranian-backed Dawa Party and Iraq was then at war with Iran -- was no defense. Reprisal killings of innocent people are by definition a crime against humanity.

The manner of Saddam's execution made it clear that Iraq's Shi'ite leaders -- and in particular Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki -- were more interested in revenge than justice. Al-Maliki, a Dawa Party leader, signed the death warrant in apparent disregard of Article 70 of the Iraqi Constitution that gives Iraq's president and two vice presidents the responsibility for ratifying death sentences.

Saddam's execution meant there would be no accounting for his other crimes: the destruction of the marshes and the Marsh Arabs in the 1990s, the murder of tens of thousands of Shi'ites in the aftermath of the 1991 uprising, the killing of 8,000 members of the Barzani clan in 1983, the 1990 invasion of Kuwait, and the murder of tens of thousands in various purges over his decades in power.

Obviously, it was never practical to try Saddam Hussein for every crime he committed. But the rush to execution actually interrupted Saddam's ongoing trial on genocide charges in connection with the 1987-1988 "anfal" campaign against Iraq's Kurdish minority. That trial was scheduled to resume Jan. 8 and would have concluded in a matter of months.

The Kurdish genocide was the gravest -- and by far the best documented -- of Saddam's crimes. I stumbled across its beginning in September 1987 when, as a staff member for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I got permission to visit Kurdistan. When Haywood Rankin from the US embassy in Baghdad and I crossed from Arab to Kurdish territory, we were amazed that places shown on our maps no longer existed. Later, we came across deserted towns with bulldozers parked next to partially destroyed houses and realized what was happening. By 1990, Saddam had destroyed 4,500 of Iraq's 5,000 villages. He also used chemical weapons to attack at least 200 villages and towns. In September 1988, I led a mission with Chris Van Hollen (now a Maryland congressman) to document a series of bombings on 48 villages that took place days after the end of the Iran-

Iraq war. Sixty-five-thousand survivors made it to Turkey and the ones we interviewed provided graphic -- and totally believable -- accounts of what they experienced.

The rubble of destroyed villages combined with eyewitness accounts made for a compelling case. But, Saddam's killers -- bureaucrats that they were -- kept detailed paper records of their work, along with videotapes of executions and torture sessions. The Kurds captured these records during the 1991 uprising that followed the first Gulf War, and a few months later Jalal Talabani (now Iraq's president) gave me custody of 14 tons of documents that eventually went to the National Archives. Supported by a congressional appropriation, Human Rights Watch used the documents to demonstrate that Saddam had committed genocide and thus helped lay the foundation for the case that was eventually brought.

The Kurdish trial also promised to shed light on a deeply amoral period in western diplomacy where the major powers, including the United States, chose to overlook genocide for strategic and economic reasons. According to his former foreign minister, Tariq Azziz, Saddam apparently intended to make an issue of western support in his trial. This could also have been awkward for some in the current administration. While serving in the Reagan or Bush administrations, some of the principals of the current war -- including Donald Rumsfeld and Colin Powell -- played down the significance of Iraq's use of poison gas, including, in the case of Powell, against the Kurds. And months after the 1988 gas attacks on the Kurds, the current president's father -- with the apparent support of his defense secretary, Richard Cheney -- doubled US financial assistance to Iraq.

An extension of Saddam's life for the few months would have made little difference to his eventual fate. But it would have made an enormous difference to have had an irrefutable record that Saddam was responsible for the genocide against the Kurds. As it is, the door is open to a future leader in Baghdad asserting it was never proven. Saddam's trials could have served as the basis for truth and reconciliation, as similar processes have done in so many other countries. Instead, the hanging will further divide Iraqis, and not just the Sunnis whose protests were predictable. Only President Bush, who still sees al-Maliki as a genuine national leader, could believe Saddam's execution, as it was carried out, to be a milestone on Iraq's path to democracy.

Saddam got the justice he so deserved. The rush to execution by Iraq's revenge-driven sectarian government denied the same to all but the tiniest fraction of his victims.

Just Desserts . . . (WT)

By Cal Thomas

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

In a final blasphemy, Saddam Hussein, who spent most of his life as a murdering secularist, went to his justified death holding a Koran and offering his soul to God, if God would accept it. If God does, He will have to commute the sentences of Saddam's mass murdering predecessors, including Hitler, Stalin, Mao and Pol Pot.

These days, not much that makes religious sense comes out of Iraq, or anywhere else in the maniacal Middle East, but one reasonable statement did pass the lips of Sheik Sadralddin al-Qubanjib in the Shia "holy city" of Najaf. During a Friday sermon, the sheik described Saddam's execution as "God's gift to Iraqis" and prayed "Oh God, you know what Saddam has done. He killed millions of Iraqis in prisons, in wars with neighboring countries and he is responsible for mass graves. Oh God, we ask you to take revenge on Saddam."

That was a shorter summation than most prosecutors deliver in court, but in the end Saddam's execution wasn't about revenge. It was about justice. Many countries -- from Britain, which has abolished capital punishment, to Russia, where a moratorium on capital punishment now exists, have halted executions because they believe, incorrectly, that doing so makes them more humane. It does precisely the opposite and sends the message that innocent human life has less value than the life of a killer. It is more than curious that Britain and Russia, especially, have halted the death penalty for the guilty, but do nothing to restrict incredibly high abortion rates that kill the innocent. This reflects an inverted value system.

One of Saddam's lawyers, former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, appeared on the BBC shortly after Saddam's hanging was confirmed, complaining the trial was a "travesty." No, the travesty would have been in not trying and executing Saddam. Saddam mocked the innocent lives he took, showing disrespect to the relatives of the dead who had a valid claim to see justice done.

There may not be much to envy about Iraq these days, but the swiftness of Saddam's punishment is admirable. Had he been in the American legal system, lawyers might have clogged that system for years, allowing Saddam to die in prison. Instead, on Nov. 5, Saddam was convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to death. After the death order was signed, there was a 30-day window in which to carry out the execution. The Iraqis executed him within hours after the signing of the death order and just a few days after his appeal was denied.

Saddam's hanging will not quell the current violence he helped to foment in the aftermath of the U.S. invasion in 2003. This adds to the importance of the decision President Bush will announce in a few days regarding the next -- and possibly final -- effort to stabilize Iraq so the elected government might function. Part of that stabilization must include a new vision of Iraq's God, his disapproval of the sectarian killings and the deaths of so many innocents at the hands of insurgent terrorists. Since the West is regarded as the home of "infidels," a religious leader inside Iraq who has more than his own petty interests at stake will have to step forward and effectively call for an end to the turmoil. If such a person exists, he is unknown to the world.

Who will mourn Saddam's death? Probably not his family members, an estimated 40 of whom he either ordered murdered or personally dispatched. He even murdered his own son-in-law, who defected to Jordan and then returned to Iraq on Saddam's promise he would not be harmed.

In a letter addressed to "the Iraqi nation" shortly after his sentencing in November, Saddam demonstrated his self-delusion was complete: "Many of you have known the writer of this letter to be faithful, honest, caring for others, wise, of sound judgment, just, decisive, careful with the wealth of the people and of the state."

That one will bring some laughs among his fellow despots in Hades, just before the letter is consumed in the fire.

. . . Morally Justified (WT)

By Bruce Fein

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

Saddam Hussein is dead.

The moral universe is celebrating his execution by hanging.

His life was uninterrupted infamy, leaving a trail of corpses and misery wherever he stepped.

In January 1969, Saddam established his signature savagery with the hanging of 17 alleged Israeli spies in a downtown Baghdad square. All political rivals were eliminated in 1979 through firing squads and purges, inspired by one of Saddam's heroes, Joseph Stalin.

During his one-man rule, Saddam killed, brutalized and oppressed millions of his own citizens, especially Kurds and Shi'ites. The notorious Anfal campaign featuring the poison gas killings of 5,000 in the northern Kurdish village of Halabja was emblematic, a slaughter far more gruesome than Kristallnacht, Lidice or Guernica during the Third Reich. In contrast to Slobodan Milosevic, Saddam was eager to carry his malignancy abroad. He invaded Iran in 1980, inaugurating eight years of bloody clashes highlighted by rocket attacks on civilian populations. In 1990, Saddam invaded Kuwait, and during the ensuing Persian Gulf War fired Scud missiles into Tel Aviv.

He craved weapons of mass destruction to magnify his malevolence. When the Israeli Air Force destroyed Iraq's nuclear research facility at Osirik in June 1981, nations openly or silently rejoiced.

Adolph Eichmann was executed by Israel in 1962, despite his relatively junior status in the Third Reich, for complicity in the extermination of countless Jews in furtherance of Hitler's Final Solution. Neither then nor thereafter did a moral consensus emerge denouncing Eichmann's execution as disproportionate to his genocidal criminality. Saddam's hanging is an easier moral case. His crimes consisted not in following reprehensible orders, but in giving them; his victims were vastly greater in number; and, his motives were more squalid: absolute power mixed with religious and ethnic bigotry. Saddam remained impenitent to the end, confirmed by his last truculent outburst: "Down with the traitors, the Americans, the spies and the Persians."

The arguments against Saddam's execution are unconvincing. It is said that equally culpable dictators have escaped the death penalty or were never prosecuted at all, for example, Uganda's Ida Amin, Zaire's Mobutu Sese Seko, or the Soviet Union's Stalin. But simply because condign punishment is not universally achieved does not mean it should be forgone when circumstances permit, as with Saddam. By analogy, the fact that not all murderers are apprehended does not undermine the moral justice of punishing those who are caught and convicted. There might have been a case against Saddam's hanging if his prosecution or punishment had been substantially motivated by racial, religious or ethnic animus as opposed to the criminality of his conduct, which predominately targeted Kurds and Shi'ites. But such evidence of invidious motivation was lacking.

Occasional shortcomings marred Saddam's trial. Some defense lawyers were killed. The presiding judge's removal for alleged pro-Saddam bias was irregular. The prosecution's case was not invariably subject to cross-examination. But where evidence of guilt is notorious, procedural deficiencies are routinely treated as harmless error. And Saddam's responsibility for the deaths of hundreds of thousands was as incontrovertible as Stalin's liquidation of the Kulaks or Chairman Mao's harrowing Cultural Revolution.

Categorical opposition to the death penalty is morally unsound. Every civilized legal system permits intentional killings in self-defense or defense of others. The moral depravity of even attempting to kill a human being is thought sufficient to justify lethal force against the perpetrator. Saddam's depravity was much greater because of his direct or indirect responsibility for endless effectuated murders or massacres.

The United States has no right to be morally smug over Saddam's hanging. Intelligence and companion assistance were eagerly provided the Iraqi dictator during the Iraq-Iran war. The United States also participated in the United Nations' corruption-ridden oil-for-food program. According to the Government Accountability Office of the United States Congress, Saddam diverted at least $10 billion for his own use by executing off-book oil trades in exchange for bribes.

In sum, Saddam, like Afghanistan's Taliban and Osama bin Laden, was a partial creation of the United States. That should be remembered whenever America contemplates bolstering a dictator under the banner of Realpolitik.

Iraq: 12,000 Civilians Killed In '06 (AP)

By Steven R. Hurst

AP, January 3, 2007

Iraq reported Tuesday that about 12,000 civilians were killed last year — the third full year since the U.S.-led invasion — with a dramatic rise in the last three months, when 5,000 died. Only about half as many Iraqi soldiers died in 2006 as American troops.

But the number of Iraqi security forces killed jumps to 1,543, nearly double the American death count of 823 for the year, when the deaths of police, who conduct paramilitary operations, are added to the number of slain Iraqi soldiers.

In all, the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior reported a total of 13,896 Iraqi civilians, police and soldiers died last year, 162 more than the tally kept by The Associated Press.

The AP count, assembled from its daily news reports, was always believed to be substantially lower than the actual number of deaths because the news cooperative does not have daily access to official accounting by the Iraqi ministries. Many deaths were thought to have gone unreported by AP.

Counts kept by other groups, including the United Nations, list far higher death tolls, which are disputed by the Iraqi government.

While the U.S. government and military provide no death totals for Iraqis, the U.N. Assistance Ministry for Iraq, UNAMI, does keep a count based on reports it gathers from the Baghdad morgue, Ministry of Health, and Medico-Legal Institute.

The figures for November and December are not yet available from the U.N., but as of the end of October the organization had reported 26,782 deaths in the first 10 months of 2006, nearly double what the Iraqi government and the AP reported for the entire year.

In its last report, the U.N. said 3,709 Iraqi civilians were killed in October alone and that citizens were fleeing the country at a pace of 100,000 each month. The organization estimates at least 1.6 million Iraqis had left since the war began in March 2003.

Life for Iraqis, especially in Baghdad and cities and towns in the center of the country, has become increasingly untenable. Many schools failed to open in September, and professionals — especially professors, physicians, politicians and journalists — are falling to sectarian killers at a stunning pace.

At the time of the last U.N. report, Iraqi government spokesman Ali al-Dabbagh called it "inaccurate and exaggerated" because it was not based on official government reports.

The U.N. report said Iraq's heavily armed Shiite militias were gaining strength and influence and that torture was rampant, despite the Iraqi government's vow to reduce human rights abuses.

"Hundreds of bodies continued to appear in different areas of Baghdad — handcuffed, blindfolded and bearing signs of torture and execution-style killing," the last UNAMI report said. "Many witnesses reported that perpetrators wear militia attire and even police or army uniforms."

The two primary militias in Iraq are the military wings of the country's strongest Shiite political groups, on which Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is heavily dependent. Al-Maliki has repeatedly rejected U.S. demands that he disband the heavily armed groups, especially the Mahdi Army of radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

"I think the type of violence is different in the past few months," Gianni Magazzeni, the UNAMI chief in Baghdad, said when the last report was issued in late November. "There was a great increase in sectarian violence in activities by terrorists and insurgents, but also by militias and criminal gangs."

He noted that religious clashes have been common since Sunni Arab insurgents bombed a major Shiite shrine on Feb. 22 in Samarra, north of Baghdad.

UNAMI's Human Rights Office continued to receive reports that Iraqi police and security forces have either been infiltrated by or act in collusion with militias, the report said.

It said that while sectarian violence is the main cause of the civilian killings, Iraqis also continue to be the victims of terrorist acts, roadside bombs and drive-by shootings. Others have been caught in the crossfire between rival gangs.

In its September 2006 issue, The Lancet, an independent and authoritative journal, published a study on mortality rates in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0110618

The study estimated that 654,965 excess Iraqi deaths, including 601,027 from violence, had occurred in Iraq since the invasion of the country in March 2003.

The "confidence range" for the number of excess Iraqi deaths because of violence has been estimated at between 426,369 and 793,663, with 601,027 as the median number.

The U.S. government and Iraq as well as others, including the Iraq Body Count, an organization which has conducted other types of surveys, denied the validity of the study's findings.

The Iraqi Minister of Health, in a statement made in Vienna in early November, indicated that as many as 150,000 Iraqi civilians might have been violently killed since 2003. But there are no known statistics for the early months of the U.S.-led invasion.

After an extraordinary violence-free start to 2007, Iraqi authorities reported on Tuesday that at least 57 Iraqis were killed in sectarian bloodshed, including 45 tortured bodies found dumped in Baghdad and five in Kut to the south.

Three Iraqi civilians were killed in a roadside bombing Tuesday in eastern Baghdad, police reported. In Baqouba, gunmen killed Diyala provincial council member Ali Majeed and three members of his family. The four were gunned down while driving near the town of al-Wajihiya, Diyala provincial police said.

The military announced the death of a U.S. soldier by a roadside bomb southwest of Baghdad. The blast Monday wounded three others, including an interpreter, as they talked with residents about sectarian violence, the military said.

U.S. troops killed a suspected al-Qaida weapons dealer and two other people in Baghdad raids Tuesday.

In Fallujah, a U.S. Marine fatally wounded an Iraqi soldier in an altercation at the guard post they shared, the U.S. military said.

The confrontation took place Saturday between members of U.S. and Iraqi units assigned to combined security posts at the Fallujah Government Center. The Marine — assigned to the 1st Battalion, 24th Marine Regiment, Regimental Combat Team 5 — has been assigned to administrative duties while the military investigates.

16,273 Deaths Reported In Iraq In 2006 (MLIVENWSFLSH)

By Lauren Frayer

MLive.com NewsFlash, January 2, 2007

(AP) — In a Jan. 1 story about Sunni demonstrators breaking into the Golden Dome mosque in Samarra as part of a protest of the execution of Saddam Hussein, The Associated Press erroneously reported that the protesters broke the locks off the door of the damaged Shiite shrine and forcibly entered. Iraqi police now say demonstrators were allowed to enter the shrine through a side door after threatening violence.

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — As enraged crowds protested the hanging of Saddam Hussein across Iraq's Sunni heartland Monday, government officials reported that 16,273 Iraqi civilians, soldiers and police died violent deaths in 2006, a figure larger than an independent Associated Press count for the year by more than 2,500.

The tabulation by the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior, showed that 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers were killed in the violence that raged in the country last year.

The Associated Press accounting, gleaned from daily news reports from Baghdad, arrived at a total of 13,738 deaths. The United Nations has said as many as 100 Iraqis die violently each day, which translates into 36,500 deaths annually.

In Samarra, demonstrators were allowed to enter a Shiite shrine through a side door after threatening violence, and marched through carrying a mock coffin and photo of the dictator.

The demonstration in the Golden Dome, shattered in a bombing by Sunni extremists 10 months ago, suggests that many Sunni Arabs may now more actively support the small number of Sunni militants fighting the country's Shiite-dominated government. The Feb. 22 bombing of the shrine triggered the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiia, in the form of daily bombings, kidnappings and murders.

Monday's protest came on a day that saw the U.S. military kill six Iraqis during a raid on the offices of a prominent Sunni political figure, who was suspected of giving al-Qaida in Iraq fighters sanctuary.

Until Saddam's execution Saturday, most Sunnis sympathized with militants but avoided taking a direct role in the sectarian conflict — despite attacks by Shiite militia that have killed thousands of Sunnis or driven them from their homes. The current Sunni protests, which appear to be building, could signal a spreading militancy.

Sunnis were not only outraged by Saddam's hurried execution, just four days after an appeals court upheld his conviction and sentence. Many were also incensed by the unruly scene in the execution chamber, captured on video, in which Saddam was taunted with chants of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada."

The chants referred to Muqtada al-Sadr, a firebrand Shiite cleric who runs one of Iraq's most violent religious militias. He is a major power behind the government of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

DOJ_NMG_0110619

Many Sunnis are also upset that Saddam was put to death the day that Sunni celebrations began for Eid al-Adha, a major Muslim festival. The judge who first presided over the case that resulted in Saddam's death sentence said the former dictator's execution at the start of Eid was illegal according to Iraqi law, and contradicted Islamic custom.

The law states that "no verdict should implemented during the official holidays or religious festivals," said Judge Rizgar Mohammed Amin, a Kurd.

Rizgar presided over Saddam's trial on charges he killed 148 Shiite men and boys in Dujail, north of Baghdad, in a botched assassination attempt in 1982. The judge was removed from the case after Shiite complaints that he was too lenient.

In a Sunni neighborhood in northern Baghdad, hundreds of demonstrators mourned the executed leader. Some praised the Baath Party, the outlawed nationalist group that under Saddam cemented Sunni Arab dominance of Iraq.

"The Baath party and Baathists still exist in Iraq, and nobody can marginalize it," said Samir al-Obaidi, 48, who attended a Saddam memorial in the Azamiyah neighborhood.

In Dor, 77 miles north of Baghdad, hundreds more took to the streets to attend the dedication of a giant mosaic of Saddam. Children carried toy guns and men fired real weapons into the air.

Mourners at a mosque in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit slaughtered sheep as a sacrifice. The mosque's walls were lined with condolence cards from tribes in southern Iraq and Jordan who were unable to travel to the memorial.

Saddam's eldest daughter briefly attended a protest Monday in Jordan — her first public appearance since her father was hanged.

"God bless you, and I thank you for honoring Saddam, the martyr," said Raghad Saddam Hussein, according to two witnesses. She addressed members of the Professional Associations — an umbrella group of unions representing doctors, engineers and lawyers — in the group's office parking lot in west Amman.

In the midst of the protests, U.S. forces continued operations in Iraq.

Six Iraqis were killed in a U.S.-led raid on the Baghdad offices of a top Sunni politician, Saleh al-Mutlaq. The U.S. military and Iraqi police said they suspected the offices were being used as an al-Qaida safe house.

Al-Mutlaq is a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, which holds 11 of the 275 seats in Iraq's parliament.

U.S. forces said they took on heavy fire from automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades as they sought to enter the building. Ground troops were backed by helicopters that "engaged the enemy with precision point target machine gun fire," the military said.

It was unclear whether the deaths resulted from the ground assault or fire from U.S. helicopters.

Associated Press Television News footage showed masses of rubble in the area and what appeared to be a long smear of blood where a body had been dragged across the floor of one of the buildings.

Walls were pitted with what appeared to be bullet and shrapnel holes.

The U.S. death toll, meanwhile, climbed to at least 3,002 by the final day of 2006 as the American military reported the deaths of two more soldiers in an explosion Sunday in Diyala Province, northeast of the capital. With the announcement, the Associated Press count of fatalities showed that at least 113 U.S. service members died in December. That makes it bloodiest month of 2006.

Iraqi authorities Monday reported that 16,273 Iraqis — including 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers — died violent deaths in 2006. The total exceeds the Associated Press count by more than 2,500.

On the first day of the New Year, Iraqi Police reported finding the 40 handcuffed, blindfolded and bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad. A police official, who refused to be named out of security fears, said 15 of the bodies were discovered in the mainly industrial Sheik Omar district of northern Baghdad.

An Iraqi worker for the Algerian Embassy in Baghdad was shot to death, police said.

Also Monday, the Iraqi government raided and sealed the offices of a privately owned television station, charging it had incited violence and hatred in its programming. In its coverage of the execution of Saddam over the weekend, a newscaster had worn black mourning clothes.

The satellite television channel Al-Sharqiya, which broadcasts from Dubai, remained on the air late Monday. The station is owned by Saad al-Bazzaz, a one-time chief of radio and television for Saddam.

Iraqi Civilian Deaths Hit New Monthly High (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

The tally of civilian deaths in Iraq hit a new high of 1,930 in December, suggesting sectarian violence that surged in the summer remains at peak levels.

DOJ_NMG_0110620

The figures, which were reported by [a] news agency, are the highest yet released by the Iraqi interior ministry but may be a significant underestimate as many deaths go unreported.

Since the bombing of the Samarra mosque nearly a year ago, sectarian tensions have taken over from the anti-US insurgency as the main security threat in Iraq. Tackling the communal violence will be the key purpose of the "surge" in US troop numbers in Iraq, expected to form the centrepiece of President George W. Bush's new Iraq strategy when it is announced shortly.

Much of the violence seems perpetrated by either Shia militias or Sunni insurgents as a means of controlling neighbourhoods by driving away members of the other sect.

There had been fears that the execution of Saddam Hussein on Saturday would lead to an upsurge in violence, but a resident of a mixed Sunni-Shia neighbourhood told the Financial Times that the Eid holiday since the weekend had brought a lull. However, he expected the battle to resume shortly.

In the past few days armed groups had painted warnings on the walls of homes in surrounding areas, ordering their occupants to leave and in one case had thrown a grenade over a wall, he said. "This conflict will not end until this neighbourhood is [completely] Sunni or [completely] Shia."

Both sides use mosques as refuges and command centres, and consequently both target the other's mosques with mortar barrages and other attacks. In the past few weeks, armed men invaded a Sunni mosque in the district and damaged the minaret by detonating oxygen canisters.

Most Sunni stayed inside, he said, following orders from the insurgent groups not to go to government jobs or to open their stores. Sometimes they ask Shia neighbours to fetch medical help in emergencies.

The district was expecting another flare-up of violence in coming days, he said, after several Shia homes received death threats. Residents believe the militias may counter by attacking the threatened houses' Sunni neighbours in order to bolster their own side's confidence.

The interior ministry figures showed 12,320 civilians were killed in 2006 in what officials classified as "terrorist" violence, half of them in the past four months. The figure of 1,930 civilians killed in December compared with 1,850 violent deaths in the previous month and 1,289 in October.

All Iraqi death toll figures are controversial and are often difficult to reconcile with one another. Ministries, depending on who controls them, often have an incentive either to reduce or to inflate figures. Official figures are also almost certainly incomplete, as many deaths probably go unreported. The United Nations has estimated that about 100 people are killed every day. A UN report in November stated that 3,709 had been killed in the previous month.

Nearly 2,000 Civilians Slain In Iraq In December (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-fiske, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

It was the deadliest month in 2006, government agencies say.

BAGHDAD — December was the deadliest month for Iraqi civilians in 2006, according to a combination of statistics released by staff at the Iraqi Health, Interior and Defense ministries. The death toll was 1,927, compared with 1,846 in November and 1,315 in October.

The surge in civilian fatalities has been attributed largely to the rising tide of sectarian violence in Baghdad and beyond.

Of 12,320 civilians killed during 2006, half died during the last four months, Health Ministry staff said Tuesday. A Times analysis in June found at least 50,000 Iraqis had died violently since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

A typical case is that of Baghdad bus driver Taha Hassan, 41.

His cousin Raad Yassin still recalls the day in early December when Hassan, a father of three, failed to return home as usual by 3 p.m. Three hours later, kidnappers called, asking whether Hassan was a Sunni Arab or Shiite.

Yassin's wife answered the phone. Hassan was Shiite, but she was unsure what the kidnappers wanted to hear and simply told them he was Muslim. The kidnappers demanded $15,000 ransom, and the family paid. After four days of waiting for Hassan to come home, relatives began searching local hospitals.

They found his body in a Baghdad morgue, shot several times, his right eye gouged.

"The reason behind this was sectarian," Yassin, 35, a Shiite nurse in the capital, said of his cousin's murder.

The last time Aysha Jabbawi, 67, saw her son Alaa Ahmed was Dec. 2. Ahmed, 32, a Shiite, was a truck driver who carted lumber from Baghdad to Hillah, their hometown to the south.

The day he died, a group of gunmen stopped him and a friend, Mohammed Jabr, 32. Ahmed offered them his truck and all the money he had, she said, about $3,850. They refused. He struggled with them and they shot him twice, Jabbawi said, then drove off with Jabr. Strangers found Ahmed and took him to a nearby hospital, where he gave a statement to police before he died. Jabr is still missing.

Four days ago, a group of men came to Jabbawi's door with $3,500 in a plastic bag and the key to her son's truck.

"They told me, 'Sorry, Aunty,' " she said. "I didn't say to them a single word."

Ridha Jawad Taqi, a member of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki's parliamentary bloc, called the December death toll "a terrifying and horrifying number." He said militias were responsible.

The Iraqi government defines civilian casualties as victims of violence — explosions, shootings and bombings, said a Health Ministry employee who asked not to be named. In addition to the civilian deaths, 24 Iraqi soldiers and 124 policemen died in December's violence, said an Interior Ministry employee who also requested anonymity.

At least 5,900 Iraqi police officers and soldiers have died since the 2003 invasion, according to the Iraq Index, a tally kept by the Washington-based Brookings Institution. Civilian death toll estimates range from tens of thousands to more than half a million.

Many believe the Iraqi government underestimates civilian casualties. The United Nations, for example, estimates that 100 Iraqis die in violence daily.

On the other hand, an Interior Ministry spokesman said Tuesday that the latest figures were too high. Brig. Gen. Abdul Kareem Khalaf said the civilian toll in December was about half what was being reported and one of the lowest monthly totals of the year. Khalaf did not release alternative figures. The U.S. military does not release Iraqi civilian casualty figures.

The death toll for U.S. forces in Iraq reached 3,000 on Dec. 31, including 113 in December, the highest monthly death toll since the battle for Fallouja in November 2004, according to icasualties.org.

In a 24-hour period ending Tuesday, 45 unidentified bodies were found in Baghdad, Interior Ministry staff said.

U.S. Naval Criminal Investigative Service agents are looking into an incident at the Fallouja government building in which a Marine fatally wounded an Iraqi soldier, the Marine Corps said.

The Marine, from the 1st Battalion, 24th Marine Regiment, has been assigned to administrative duties during the investigation. Officials declined to reveal what led to the shooting Saturday.

Marines from the 1st Battalion, 24th Regiment, along with Iraqi forces, are assigned to guard several checkpoints on the outskirts of the city as well as the government building. Three Marines were killed in a sniper attack last week.

A Promising Iraqi Province Is Now A Tinderbox (LAT)

By Solomon Moore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

Violence surged after U.S. forces handed security to the Iraqis. Now the Americans are stepping back in.

BAQUBAH, IRAQ — When U.S. forces killed the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Musab Zarqawi, six months ago in a village near here, they hoped security would improve in this strategic province just north of Baghdad.

Instead, security has collapsed in Diyala province, which now ranks as one of Iraq's most troubled regions. Insurgent attacks have more than doubled in the last year. Violence has devastated the provincial police force and brought reconstruction to a virtual standstill.

Assassinations have claimed the lives of mayors, tribal chieftains, police officials and judges, including a Shiite Muslim member of the provincial council who was killed Tuesday. Many government officials here sleep on cots in their offices because driving home is too dangerous.

And Iraqi security forces have been implicated in so many abuses that the U.S. commander here recently gave his Iraqi counterpart an angry lecture, likening the Iraqi troops to an "undisciplined rabble."

U.S. and Iraqi officials interviewed in recent days blamed the sharp downturn on a combination of U.S. neglect and abuses by the Iraqi army. U.S. troops largely disengaged from security here for weeks at a time, they say, handing the reins to Iraqi forces who proved to be abusive and ineffective.

U.S. commanders are attempting a sharp change in strategy, hoping that a classic counterinsurgency campaign, combining reconstruction aid with a more active U.S. presence, can turn the situation around.

For now, insurgents here appear to have gained the upper hand. They demonstrated their freedom of movement last week by barreling a dozen trucks through the streets of Baqubah's Amin neighborhood, shouting militant slogans and brandishing machine guns and shoulder-fired rocket launchers.

DOJ_NMG_0110622

The defiant show of force was similar to another insurgent parade caught on video by a U.S. aerial drone in November. Insurgents were seen hauling Shiite families out of their homes and executing them in the streets, U.S. military officials who reviewed the footage said.

Diyala is an area of fertile farmland, abundant water and untapped oil wells stretching north of Baghdad's suburbs and east to the Iranian border. Its population includes all three of Iraq's main religious and ethnic groups.

Of its roughly 1.8 million people, about 55% are Sunni Arabs. But because Sunnis boycotted elections two years ago, Shiites, who make up about one-third of Diyala's population, hold the majority of provincial council seats and control the local security forces. Kurds, mostly in northeastern Diyala, make up about 15%.

Until October, the main U.S. force in the province was the 4th Infantry Division. It largely followed the strategy laid down by top U.S. commanders in Iraq last year: Pull American forces back as much as possible and allow Iraqi troops to take the lead in fighting insurgents. U.S. officers here say that approach did not work.

"4th ID tried to keep a low profile after they handed over security to the Iraqi army, but that approach backfired," said an officer with the 3rd Heavy Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, which now has responsibility for the province. The officer spoke on condition of anonymity because he was criticizing another U.S. military unit.

Under the 4th Infantry's plan, Army convoys stayed on main roads and rarely ventured into Baqubah's dense neighborhoods, military officials said.

"Iraqis told us that 4th ID drove in here with their Humvees and told them, 'If you don't shoot at us, we won't shoot at you,' " the 3rd Brigade officer said. "So the insurgents actually took over this place."

Making matters worse, Iraq's Shiite-dominated government appointed a provincial commander who U.S. military officials say was handpicked by the Badr Brigade, a militia implicated in hundreds of death squad killings in Baghdad. The militia is linked to Iraq's largest Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

Under orders from the Iraqi Ground Forces Command in Baghdad this fall, the commander, Brig. Gen. Shakir Hulail Hussein Kaabi, and his 5th Iraqi Division started a campaign of what U.S. officials now describe as abusive raids and detentions.

The problems were so serious that Col. David W. Sutherland, commander of the 3rd Brigade, took the unusual step of lecturing his Iraqi counterpart during a mid-December briefing at Forward Operating Base Warhorse near Baqubah.

"Six weeks ago, the people of Diyala and Baqubah were disgusted with the disrespect and disregard the Iraqi army had shown them," Sutherland told Shakir through an Arabic interpreter.

"Bullying an innocent person is unacceptable. Taking things from houses is unacceptable. Taking cars or things from cars is unacceptable," he said.

"Before we send an undisciplined rabble into this fight, I will pull the plug," Sutherland told the general. "We are soldiers, not barbarians."

Since taking command of Diyala in October, Sutherland has increased the number of U.S. advisors traveling with Iraqi units and required U.S. approval for any Iraqi operation, in effect rescinding Iraqi control of the 5th Division.

Sutherland said that several joint raids convinced him Shakir was willing to change his tactics and adopt a counterinsurgency doctrine of proportional force.

"In this culture, the more you kill, the more enemies you make. The more you treat with disrespect, the more enemies you make," Sutherland said. "And we were able to show [Shakir], not subjectively but objectively, how that happened and what it created."

American commanders won at least a partial victory in late December when the government agreed to replace Diyala's police chief. The chief, Ghassan Bawi, had been accused of tacitly or directly supporting death squads in the province, according to U.S. officials, who had lobbied for months for his removal. Like Shakir, Bawi was endorsed by the Badr militia, U.S. officials say.

Detainees reported kidnappings and torture at the hands of Iraqi policemen, according to U.S. and Iraqi officials. One of Bawi's most infamous underlings is known as Cable Ali, after his favorite coercive tool.

In an interview, Shakir said he had changed tactics and now used more focused operations. But he clung to the view that his main targets were Sunnis, not Shiites.

"The nature of the target is that they are all Sunnis," Shakir said. "All these problem areas are all Sunni, so our operations are all in Sunni areas. There are actually no Shiites left, because 8,000 Shiites have been killed or displaced."

But the shift in strategy may have come too late.

Diyala's Sunni politicians refuse to attend provincial council meetings until Shakir is stripped of his command, and the governing body has been unable to reach a quorum for weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0110623

"The people don't trust the government or the security forces," said Deputy Gov. Awf Rahoomi, a Sunni. "The Shiites in control of security are not professionals — they were appointed on a sectarian basis. This has caused people to put more faith in the armed groups, which have become more powerful than the government forces."

The U.S. has spent roughly $220 million toward reconstruction in Diyala, but as winter temperatures plunge, food transport, electricity generation and petroleum shipments are beset by chronic delays, when shipments occur at all. Most Baqubah shops are closed and most streets devoid of traffic. Sewers are dysfunctional, spilling sludge across the refuse-covered streets and contaminating the water supply.

Many Iraqi contractors now refuse to enter the province, fearing for their lives.

Baqubah's Government Center building is regularly attacked by insurgents, but still serves as a nighttime refuge for government officials afraid to return home at the end of the day.

"The Government Center has become something of a dormitory," said Kiki Munshi, a State Department official who leads the Provincial Reconstruction Team.

Munshi said poor security and government bureaucracy had brought reconstruction to a virtual standstill.

U.S. military officials also complain that poor coordination among the military, State Department officials and the Iraqi government continues to hinder projects.

At a recent meeting between various local ministry representatives and Diyala's mayors and other officials, the politicians complained that Baghdad was not responding to their needs.

The mayor of Khalis said food and clean water were scarce in his area.

"The Iraqi army and the coalition forces arrested a lot of workers for our water treatment project," he said.

Baqubah's mayor said the Iraqi army had confiscated several fuel tankers from Oil Ministry drivers. The mayor of Khanaqin said at least 2,500 families had come to his city to escape violence elsewhere in the province, overwhelming services.

The officials seemed unable to agree on whether poor security was preventing reconstruction or whether reconstruction failures had caused security to erode. It is a conundrum that U.S. soldiers in the field also face.

While on patrol a few days earlier, Capt. Christopher Conley parked his armored vehicle in a Sunni neighborhood to attempt to gather intelligence from a tribal sheik.

"I want the coalition to have a good relationship with your neighborhood," Conley told the elder tribesman.

"We would like to cooperate with you," said the wizened sheik, who identified himself as Abu Mohammed. "But I can promise you that it will come to nothing because of the situation here. All the jobless men. All the closed shops."

"I want to fix the security situation," Conley told him. "I have money to fix things, but no one will come to help because of security."

"If you ask me, no one is ready to hear you right now," Abu Mohammed said. "If security gets better, we'll do whatever you want."

Will We Leave Iraqi Allies Behind? (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

One day in the Gerald Ford presidency that hasn't received much attention in the past week's memorials is April 30, 1975. That was the day the last American helicopter pulled away from the U.S. Embassy in Saigon, leaving behind many thousands of South Vietnamese who had worked with the United States.

Those wrenching final images of the Vietnam War are relevant now as we think about what lies ahead in Iraq. However long the United States stays in Iraq and whatever success it achieves there, we should agree we have a moral responsibility to the Iraqis who risked their lives and families to be America's allies.

How America leaves Iraq will be as important as how it entered. That's why I found the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton report valuable -- because they focused on an orderly process of transition from U.S. military occupation to Iraqi sovereignty, with the assistance of Iraq's neighbors. President Bush seems about to embark on a riskier course of a "surge" in American troops to achieve something that looks like military victory. But if that "double-down" bet fails, I fear we will eventually witness a repetition of April 30, 1975 -- without the orderly process envisioned by Baker-Hamilton.

America's ragged withdrawal from Vietnam was chronicled by Frank Snepp, a CIA analyst in Saigon at the time. In his 1977 book, "Decent Interval," Snepp wrote that the CIA station in Saigon was able to evacuate only about 537 of its 1,900 "indigenous employees" in April 1975. The agency also abandoned 400 members of the CIA-trained Special Police Branch; 400 members of the Central Intelligence Organization of South Vietnam; hundreds of North Vietnamese and Viet Cong defectors; and nearly 30,000 Vietnamese who had been trained as operatives in the CIA's Phoenix program. These people were, in practical terms, left to die.

In the pell-mell American withdrawal, wrote Snepp, "We committed the unpardonable mistake of failing to ensure the destruction of the personnel files and intelligence dossiers we had helped the government assemble." He concluded: "It is not too much to say that in terms of squandered lives, blown secrets, and the betrayal of agents, friends and collaborators, our handling of the evacuation was an institutional disgrace."

Thomas Polgar, the Saigon station chief, sent a final bleak cable to headquarters: "It has been a long and hard fight and we have lost. This experience, unique in the history of the United States, does not signal necessarily the demise of the United States as a world power. The severity of the defeat and the circumstances of it, however, would seem to call for a reassessment of the policies of niggardly half-measures which have characterized much of our participation here."

Vietnam and America did indeed survive this trauma -- to the point that three decades later, Vietnam is a prosperous and friendly nation visited by American presidents. A big reason why is that after the chaotic withdrawal, America worked to keep faith with people who had been its allies. The brutal policies of the North Vietnamese created waves of refugees who became known as "boat people." Many thousands of them made their way to the United States, and their children and grandchildren are among our nation's great success stories.

One of the great tragedies of the Iraq war has been America's inability to protect its friends in Iraq or to offer them a haven when they were forced to flee the country. The New York Times reported this week that 1.8 million Iraqis are living outside the country, with tens of thousands more fleeing each month. But until recently, the Bush administration had planned to resettle just 500 Iraqis in the United States in 2007. The Times quoted Kirk W. Johnson, a former U.S. aid worker in Fallujah: "We're not even meeting our basic obligation to the Iraqis who've been imperiled because they worked for the U.S. government."

The Vietnamese who came to America after April 1975 provided a backbone for investment and political change in their home country. Their superpower ally failed on the battlefield, but the Vietnamese who believed in free markets and modern values ended up as the winners.

I want to believe that will happen eventually in Iraq, as well. But one of the worst effects of the war is that it is destroying the educated middle class of Iraq -- driving doctors, teachers and business people into desperate exile. When Iraq comes back together some day, will these educated Iraqis be America's friends, or will they despise us?

Whatever we do in Iraq in coming months, it should include a bipartisan commitment to keep faith with the people who risked everything for a new Iraq -- by making room for them in America, if necessary. We need a surge of compassion more than a surge of U.S. troops.

Two Civilians Answer Return Call To Duty In Iraq (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

A reminder that federal employees are regularly heading to Iraq for duty:

Nancee Needham, who has worked for the Defense Department inspector general's office for nearly 18 years, begins a one-year tour in the war-torn country this month.

Needham, a civil service employee, will serve as the inspector general's program director for audit operations there. She spent eight weeks in Iraq last year on an auditing project and calls her decision to volunteer for a year-long Baghdad assignment "my turn to pay back" the department and the nation for providing her with a rewarding career.

Tim Walsh, a technology manager with the Air Force, joined the government four years ago and spent six months in Iraq in 2004. He has volunteered for a second assignment in the war zone. "You work for the DOD and they depend upon you during peacetime. You got to pony up during wartime," Walsh said.

As a general practice, federal agencies prefer to rely on volunteers like Needham and Walsh for duty in war zones. Volunteers have helped staff the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, restore electrical power plants and operate post exchange stores.

But with the Iraq war in its fourth year, there has been some concern that the ranks of civil service volunteers are growing thin.

The Iraq Study Group, chaired by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former House member Lee H. Hamilton, has recommended that agencies order civilian employees to fill key jobs in Iraq if not enough volunteers step forward. The recommendation grew out of a sense that agencies are not contributing enough personnel to Iraq, a commission aide said.

John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, questions how civil service employees could be ordered to Iraq when the violence in Baghdad makes it exceedingly difficult to move around and perform jobs.

"This is a slippery slope," Gage said of the Baker-Hamilton recommendation. "Security issues have to be upfront and resolved before you think of sending untrained federal workers over there."

The government does not keep count of how many federal employees are serving in Iraq and Afghanistan. By most accounts, the Army has the largest number of volunteers in Iraq -- usually about 2,000 at any one time. (In fiscal 2006, it deployed more than 4,000 civilians in Iraq and Afghanistan, an Army spokeswoman said.)

About 1,000 Americans from various agencies staff the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, according to the Congressional Research Service. They have come from the State, Defense, Agriculture, Commerce, Homeland Security, Health and Human Services, Justice, Labor, Transportation and Treasury departments and the Agency for International Development, the CRS reported last October.

Some agencies, such as the Air Force, assign civilians to U.S. bases outside Baghdad. Walsh, for example, worked on the Horned Owl project in 2004 at Camp Anaconda and the Balad air base in northern Iraq. His small team gathered data from an airplane equipped with sensors that can detect some bombs buried in roads and some types of weapons caches.

Walsh, who manages technology systems for an Air Force office in Northern Virginia, helped set up a secure electronic network, coordinated intelligence activities and relayed information to the Army about possible threats.

In a war zone, Walsh noted, federal employees can be called upon to work outside their areas of expertise. During the battle of Fallujah, he helped out at a military clinic because medics were overworked and needed extra hands to care for wounded troops.

To some degree, Walsh said, he may feel more attuned to the military than other federal civilians because he once served in the Kansas Army National Guard and because his father was a career officer. He is not married.

Needham said she found last year's stint in Baghdad's Green Zone to be "a rewarding experience." In her second week there, she said "I decided I can do this," and signaled her intent to volunteer for this year's tour.

She will supervise seven auditors and will be in charge of auditing at two locations. Her team will review some of the Defense Department's financial management practices and look at internal controls on spending.

From her first stay in Baghdad, Needham learned that living and working accommodations cannot be taken for granted, especially when electrical generators shut down. "Everything is more difficult in Iraq, and things don't work all the time," she said.

Like Walsh, she comes from a family with ties to the armed forces. Her father served in World War II and headed an American Legion post when she was growing up. She has four children and 13 grandchildren and is divorced.

Asked how her family reacted to her plans for a year in Iraq, Needham quipped that her announcement was met with "stunned silence," much the way her family responded when she bought a Harley-Davidson motorcycle.

The family's surprise over her decision to go back quickly turned to pride, Needham said. "My family very strongly supports the troops over there."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

At Apple, Timing Led To Overnight Windfalls (LAT)

By Dawn C. Chmielewski, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

Stock option grants in 1997 came on the eve of a big share-price jump.

In August 1997, Apple Computer Inc. handed four top executives options to buy a total of nearly 1 million shares. The next day, the value of those options jumped a staggering 48%, or $7.7 million.

This was no coincidence, according to a shareholder lawsuit filed against executives and directors of the Cupertino, Calif.-based company in federal court in Northern California. Rather, the options were granted to coincide with good news that would give the four executives an overnight windfall.

The stock soared when co-founder Steve Jobs announced that Apple's sworn enemy, Microsoft Corp., threw the struggling company a life raft in the form of a $150-million cash infusion. In exchange, Apple gave Microsoft a stake in the company and agreed to use the software giant's Web browser on its Mac personal computers.

The investment rocked the high-tech world at the time but became only a footnote in the astonishing comeback of a company as celebrated today for its marketing and design prowess as Nike, Prada or Mercedes-Benz.

But the grants are an example of the fast-and-loose practices that went unchecked in a corporate culture fashioned by Jobs to revive Apple, which by 1997 was hemorrhaging money, according to the lawsuit, a combination of 11 shareholder complaints.

DOJ_NMG_0110626

"The company was struggling, was cash-poor and reliant upon stock options to bring and keep executives there, so the conditions [for manipulation] were ripe," said Mark Molumphy, a partner at Cotchett, Pitre, Simon & McCarthy, the lead law firm in the case.

Apple declined to comment on the lawsuit.

Filed days before Christmas, it alleges that Apple engaged in widespread manipulation of option grants to allow employees to buy shares at low prices. Apple "spring-loaded" options in advance of good news and "backdated" other grants to days when the stock traded at low prices to create an automatic paper profit, claims the suit, which has only recently come to light.

"What they've done — and it's not isolated — is utilized confidential internal corporate data in a way to divert to themselves substantial profits," said Darren Robbins, a San Diego lawyer involved in the shareholder lawsuit. "That constitutes both a breach of fiduciary duty and a violation of federal securities law."

On Friday, Apple absolved Jobs of wrongdoing after a three-month internal investigation of its option practices. The company, however, acknowledged 6,428 instances of improperly dating option grants over a six-year period, when it had "insufficient safeguards" to prevent stock manipulation, according to a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The first incident occurred on Dec. 29, 1997, just a few months after Jobs had returned to the company and taken the title of "interim" chief executive.

'Instant windfall'

In some cases, Apple's filing said, Jobs had recommended the options be backdated to create an instant windfall for executives. It said he had neither benefited financially nor appreciated the accounting implications of backdating, which forced the company to take an $83-million charge against earnings in 2006 for underreporting expenses related to employee compensation.

The company's admissions have raised new questions among securities lawyers and corporate governance experts about Jobs' role in the controversy. "There has been a tacit admission that Steve Jobs served as a ringleader in this backdating process," said Christopher Bebel, a former SEC counsel and prosecutor who is not involved in the lawsuit.

He predicted that Apple's insistence that current management had done nothing wrong could "come back to haunt the company" in a scenario similar to Martha Stewart telling investors she had participated in no wrongdoing and later being indicted on securities fraud. "[Jobs] may find himself in a Martha Stewart quandary with obstruction of justice charges."

In its filing Friday, Apple said it had "serious concerns" about the involvement in the granting, recording and accounting of option grants by two former corporate officers it did not name but who are believed to be former General Counsel Nancy R. Heinen and former Chief Financial Officer Fred D. Anderson.

The company said its review found no instances of backdating from 2003 through 2005, when new procedures and controls on granting options were put in place to comply with the Sarbanes-Oxley Act.

Apple is among nearly 200 companies whose option-dating practices are under internal investigation or being probed by federal regulators. At least 65 executives and directors have resigned or been fired after being implicated in the scandal, including Bruce Karatz, head of Los Angeles home builder KB Home, and UnitedHealth Group Inc. CEO William McGuire.

An option is the right to buy stock at a set price within a certain time period. The price is generally determined by the stock's close on the day the option is granted by a company's board. In their current probes, regulators are focusing on backdating, whereby grant dates are changed by weeks or months to coincide with the stock's lowest price in a set period. Doing so could give executives instant paper gains and cause a company to understate compensation costs and overstate earnings.

Backdating isn't necessarily illegal, but failing to disclose the practice in a timely manner is.

Apple's is the highest-profile case so far. A host of high-tech companies have been ensnared in part, observers say, because stock options are the currency of choice in Silicon Valley for keeping top talent from jumping to another venture.

"This is how Silicon Valley works," said Alan Deutschman, the author of a critical book about the Apple chief, "The Second Coming of Steve Jobs." "Even though Apple is an anomaly — because of Steve's passion for design and his ability to connect to the zeitgeist and the popular culture — in a lot of ways it epitomizes how Silicon Valley is run. Steve, from his earliest experience in the corporate world, has been very conscious and political about stock and stock options and rewarding loyalists."

Options' indispensable role in Silicon Valley has made it hard for some experts to accept Apple's contention that Jobs was naïve about the practices surrounding them. It's also hard to swallow considering that Jobs has been an officer of a public company since 1980 and has a net worth of more than $5 billion.

Curiously, options themselves have not built Jobs' wealth. When the charismatic leader rejoined the company in 1997, he held only a single share of Apple stock. He has received a salary of only $1 a year since 1998. But he holds 5.4 million shares of Apple worth about $460 million today. Only 120,000 are options, worth about $10 million.

The bulk of his fortune stems from Pixar Animation Studios, which transformed him from a barefoot computer geek into a full-fledged media mogul. Jobs' 49% stake in Pixar, the computer-driven studio behind such blockbuster movies as "Cars" and

"Toy Story," was converted into 6.7% of Walt Disney Co. when he sold the company to the Burbank giant in May 2006. Those shares are worth $4.7 billion today.

Jobs received one of the biggest option grants in history during Apple's revival, when he was given 10 million shares Jan. 12, 2000. That was one of two option grants Jobs was awarded that Apple said Friday were backdated — and that the company canceled in 2003.

A special CEO compensation committee of the board didn't authorize the Jan. 12 grant until a week later, on Jan. 18. The options' exercise price of $21.80 coincided with the lowest closing price during that quarter, according to the shareholder lawsuit. The grant yielded a paper profit of $65.8 million for Jobs within 20 trading days.

Company records show that the other backdated grant Jobs received — 7.5 million shares — were approved at a special board meeting on Oct. 19, 2001. In its filing, however, Apple acknowledged that the meeting "did not occur."

Apple said the two stock option grants were canceled in March 2003 in exchange for 5 million shares of restricted stock. The company would not explain why the options were canceled, but its regulatory filings said Jobs wanted them to provide "additional shares that could later be granted to employees whose contributions are critical to the long-term success of the Company."

SEC records show that Jobs sold his restricted shares — the only Apple stock he has sold since 1997 — for $300 million the day they vested on March 19, 2006.

That was a day after the Wall Street Journal published the first story on the SEC's stock options backdating probe. The story did not mention Apple, which disclosed its backdating problem in late June.

Power struggle

Jobs returned to Apple in February 1997 after the company spent $427 million to buy Next Software, which Jobs had founded in 1985 following his ouster from Apple. Jobs had resigned after the board stripped him of his managerial duties amid a power struggle with the company's then-new chief executive, John Sculley.

A later Apple CEO, Gil Amelio, recalled last week how he recruited Jobs to return as the charismatic "Mr. Outside."

"He had the stage presence and stuff that I lacked," Amelio said. "I thought frankly I was better at literally running the company. It didn't take very long for him to decide that wasn't a good idea. He worked with the board, behind my back, to oust me."

A couple of months after Amelio's July 1997 departure, Jobs assumed the title of "interim" chief executive and set out to create a board he could control, according to the shareholder lawsuit. Jobs' mission was to insulate himself to prevent a repeat of his painful 1985 departure, said longtime observers.

"The big lesson Steve learned from his first time around at Apple was you have to be in control, cause otherwise they can kick you out," Deutschman said.

Jobs brought in two close friends, Larry Ellison, head of database software titan Oracle Corp., and William V. Campbell, a former Apple executive who had gone on to become chief executive of financial software maker Intuit Inc. Also joining the board were two executives with whom Jobs enjoyed professional ties: Jerome B. York, who at the time was chief executive of tech retailer Micro Warehouse Inc., and Millard Drexler, then chief executive at Gap Inc., who had appointed Jobs to the clothing firm's board.

In addition to granting generous options to Jobs that were later canceled, they heaped them on key executives. Four executives benefited from the grants made the day before the pivotal Microsoft announcement. Chief Financial Officer Anderson, Executive Vice President of Marketing Guerrino de Luca, Controller Robert Calderoni and Senior Vice President of hardware engineering Jonathan Rubinstein received shares that vested in annual installments over three years. During that period, Apple's shares tripled.

No small company

From April 2000 to August 2001, Apple's board lacked a compensation committee and relied on the full board to administer stock grants as well as approve executive compensation. One swath of grants issued during that time gave four senior executives 1 million shares at the stock's closing price on Jan. 17, 2001, the day quarterly earnings were reported. The next day, the stock surged 11% on the results, generating a paper gain of $1.9 million for each, the investor suit alleged.

Ralph Ward, publisher of the "Boardroom Insider," an online corporate governance newsletter, said it wasn't unusual a decade ago for boards of small companies to grant options, especially in Silicon Valley, where "it has always been, 'We're all pals here doing business together.' "

In 2000, however, Apple would not have been considered small. It had annual sales of $8 billion, mostly of iMac computers and its new iBook notebook. It was another year before the introduction of the iPod in late 2001.

"That does raise some eyebrows, particularly with Apple," Ward said. "Companies are supposed to outgrow that when they become major, big-cap public companies. Some don't outgrow it as well as they should."

DOJ_NMG_0110628

The shareholder lawsuit contends that Apple's practices were no aberration. The SEC is investigating stock option practices of Pixar, where Jobs served as chief executive and chairman until the Disney acquisition.

At Pixar, four of the seven grants were recorded at the lowest price during the fiscal years in which they were granted, the suit alleges.

"This dispels any notion that Apple is now trying to portray that Jobs is somehow ignorant of the accounting effects of what they were doing because it wasn't just happening at Apple," said Molumphy, the shareholders' attorney.

Apple's portrayal also defies Job's personality traits as a leader who gets involved in the most microscopic details.

"I don't know if there's a Wikipedia definition for 'control freak' but when they do that entry, Steve's picture should be next to it," Deutschman said.

"The way Apple and its allies have tried to spin this options story has been, 'Oh, Steve is passionate about the design of the product but he doesn't pay attention to these other things.' One of the big things about Steve's second time around at Apple is that he's really mastered the financial aspects of running the company."

Tough Year Ahead For US Chiefs (FT)

By Francesco Guerrera In New York

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

American chief executives are bracing themselves for a tough year, with corporate governance issues, shareholder activism, and a more difficult operating environment likely to test their leadership and business skills.

Corporate experts predict that US chief executives will see their once undisputed authority further eroded in 2007 by the growing desire from institutional and retail investors to have a bigger influence on company matters.

Over the past year, this trend has been strengthened by the explosion of the options backdating scandal, increased shareholder anger at lavish executive compensation and attacks from activist hedge funds.

“The pressure is not going to relent on CEOs in 2007,” says John Challenger of the recruitment firm Challenger Gray & Christmas. “The days of the imperial chief executive are over.”

The increased pressure on America’s corporate leaders has led to unprecedented levels of chief executive turnover. In 2006, more than 1,340 US chief executives left their jobs – the highest on record – according to Mr Challenger’s firm.

The options backdating scandal, which has engulfed more than 180 companies, has forced more than 15 chief executives to resign and more could follow.

The controversy – coupled with more investor scrutiny of executive pay and the ongoing impact of the Sarbanes-Oxley legislation – are rapidly changing the US’s corporate governance landscape.

Regulatory and corporate governance challenges for chief executives will be compounded by uncertainty over the prospects of many sectors in 2007.

With growth in both the US economy and companies’ profitability expected to slow, albeit without a “hard landing”, US corporate leaders will face stronger competition from overseas rivals.

The power of private equity groups – a feature of the past two years – is also expected to grow during 2007 as buy-out funds look to invest the record amount of funds they have raised.

“One of the messages for 2007 is: whether you like it or not, your company is for sale,” says Steve Ellis, worldwide managing director of the management consultancy Bain & Co.

“This is dramatically increasing the pressure on CEOs to show meaningful improvements in their operating performance.”

A Typical Miscreant-II

January 3, 2007; Page A12

The markets have finally had their say about the wonderfully overblown backdating scandal. When Apple filed its latest mea culpa on Friday along with a board expression of confidence in Steve Jobs's leadership, the company's shares jumped four bucks. Message: The market doesn't give a hoot about backdating. It gives a hoot whether Mr. Jobs might be run out of his job.

This ought to cast a light on whether the drop in market prices of companies in the backdating scandal reflects the shock and horror of investors at the details of backdating -- or shock and horror at the meal that trial lawyers, prosecutors and the media are making of companies caught up in this episode.

Whether Mr. Jobs is safely out of woods remains to be seen. It didn't help that just a week earlier, the Associated Press reported that SEC Chairman Chris Cox has been averring that, in sorting through dozens of backdating cases, his agency would save its legal firepower for "cases of serious fraud, with elements such as deliberately lying or forging documents."

Uh oh. In granting Mr. Jobs options on 7.5 million shares, somebody at Apple pencil-whipped a technical requirement of a board meeting to approve the grant. Of course, Mr. Jobs was already a billionaire. Does anybody think he engaged in theft to pad his net worth by a faction of a percent?

We won't remarket our column of last October, though it anticipated much of Apple's latest admissions. The company now says it "identified a number of grants for which grant dates were intentionally selected in order to obtain favorable exercise prices." It also acknowledges that Mr. Jobs had a role in "recommending" the favorable dates.

Having vouchsafed these eye-openers, Apple's filing proceeds to blur the matter amid a general discussion of how it chose to account for hundreds of option grants that were apparently misdated mostly through simple bureaucratic snafu. We never learn which grants were deliberately engineered by the CEO to award the recipient a "favorable" exercise price, or why Mr. Jobs found it useful to do so.

Apple's goal, obviously, is self-defense. Alas, this rules out trying to engage the media in a conversation about whether backdating is really the crime the media imagines it to be.

Backdating, let's recall, was simply an artifice to allow companies to issue "in the money" options (the terms of which were accurately reported to shareholders) without taking an accounting expense. That's all backdating is. Does it matter in the teensiest whether options are expensed? No, expensing has no probative value whatsoever for evaluating a company's shares or its compensation policies. Expensing creates a junk number, of zero analytical value.

Don't expect to hear any of this from companies actually involved in the backdating scandal. Apple proves you can never overestimate the shallowness of the media. That much is shown by the meretricious non sequitur, incorporated verbatim in many media accounts, that notwithstanding Mr. Jobs' role in backdating, "he did not receive or financially benefit from these grants."

Apple here shrewdly judges that what exercises the media are the large numbers involved in CEO compensation. Notice that Apple chooses to record an accounting charge for Steve Jobs options that were canceled and never exercised, but doesn't take a charge for other options that were canceled and never exercised. Does anyone doubt that this was a P.R. call because Apple judged it useful to be seen engaging in penitential accounting for Mr. Jobs's options?

We won't bore you with the findings of organizational psychology on "fairness" perceptions. Suffice it to say, "fairness" is an indeterminate thing, so people tend to look at process as a proxy for the fairness of outcomes.

This is called "procedural fairness" or "procedural justice." People naturally resent outcomes that leave some much better off than others. Procedural flyspecking is how we decide whether to put our resentment over such outcomes into abeyance or surrender to it.

Popular coverage of CEO pay is a perfect expression of this "fairness heuristic." It strives to meet a public demand for reasons to resent high CEO pay by constantly highlighting claims of cronyism, self-dealing, fraud, etc. to explain why CEO compensation is so high. By now this has become almost an unconscious conspiracy of obfuscation about the true source of ever-rising executive compensation. Try a thought experiment. If CEO pay were a real "problem," wouldn't it be a sublimely easy problem to solve? Just hire somebody who will do the job for less.

This society is full of capable, responsible people who take jobs for five- or six-figure salaries. Why don't boards wave off the demands of their first-choice CEOs and go for one of these less demanding folks? The question answers itself: Because boards believe their first-choice CEOs are worth it. Rationally, boards are prepared to bid away a sizeable sliver of a company's net worth to get the CEO they want. Take the gyrations in Apple's share price last Friday: At stake as investors worried about Mr. Jobs's fate was $3.4 billion in shareholder wealth -- many, many times Mr. Jobs's total compensation since returning to Apple a decade ago.

Now, not all CEOs are as pivotal to a company's performance as Mr. Jobs is perceived to be, but this has nothing to do with the CEO pay calculus. All CEOs sit at the switch: They make the calls by which shareholder wealth is preserved or squandered. Should a company sacrifice short-term profits in order to invest more in customer service? Should it embark on a bold product redesign or milk an aging product line a bit longer?

The market wants a CEO in whom it has confidence, and who is responsive to the share price. The media's relentless appetite is for evidence that CEO pay fails the "fairness heuristic." This basic disjunction is why one of the signal phenomena of the age, the towering increase in executive compensation, remains unexplained to the American people despite the massive amount of journalism spent on subjects like backdating.

Causey Heads To Prison For Role In Enron (WP/BLOOM)

By Laurel Brubaker Calkins

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

HOUSTON, Jan. 2 -- Richard A. Causey, Enron's former chief accounting officer, was on his way Tuesday to a federal prison in Bastrop, Tex., to begin a 5 1/2 -year sentence for his role in the fraud that destroyed the company.

Causey, 46, pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud in December 2005, less than a month before he was to stand trial with former Enron chief executives Jeffrey K. Skilling and Kenneth L. Lay, both of whom were found guilty.

"A lot of improper things were done at Enron," Causey said as he was sentenced in November. "Some of those were done by me, and for that I am profoundly sorry."

Causey was the last of 16 former executives to plead guilty to crimes at Enron, which was the world's largest energy-trading company before it went bankrupt in December 2001 as widespread accounting fraud came to light.

More than 5,000 jobs and $1 billion in employee pensions were wiped out when Enron collapsed. Investors are suing to recover more than $30 billion.

Causey was assigned to the prison he requested. Bastrop is three hours from his home in Houston, where Enron was based, and 30 miles from Austin, where the oldest of his three children attends college.

The Bastrop prison has a low-security section, surrounded by a razor-wire-topped double fence, and an unfenced minimum-security camp. Authorities would not say which one Causey is assigned to. With time off for good behavior, he can expect to serve four years and nine months.

Causey will be assigned a job such as groundskeeping or kitchen work, paying 12 to 40 cents an hour. He can apply for a job that pays 23 cents to $1.15 an hour in a prison factory that retrofits vehicles for the government, said Michael Truman, a spokesman for the U.S. Bureau of Prisons.

At his sentencing, Causey asked U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III for leniency, saying his withdrawal from the case let prosecutors to ignore accounting charges and focus jurors' attention on securities-fraud charges against Skilling and Lay.

Causey agreed to serve seven years as part of his plea. Lake sentenced him to nearly all of it after prosecutors sought a reduction of three to six months. They called Causey's cooperation too little, too late.

"A witness who is reluctant to acknowledge his own responsibility is of no use to the government," prosecutor Kathryn H. Ruemmler said at Causey's sentencing. "Without Mr. Causey's implicit consent and explicit conduct, the fraud that occurred at Enron could not have occurred."

Causey's lawyer, Reid H. Weingarten, said later that Enron was "reputed to be the worst accounting scandal in history, but the only accountant inside or outside the company who will get a prison sentence is Rick Causey."

Causey forfeited $1.25 million in illegal gains in addition to being sent to prison.

Weingarten said Tuesday that he could not confirm whether Causey had reported to the prison.

"I have no reason to assume it didn't happen because I would have heard if it was otherwise," said Weingarten. Representatives of the U.S. Bureau of Prisons were not immediately available for comment because of a federal holiday.

Skilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of conspiracy, fraud, lying to auditors and insider trading. He is serving a 24-year prison sentence in Waseca, Minn. Lay, convicted of 10 counts of fraud and conspiracy in the same trial, died of heart disease before he could be sentenced. His guilty verdict was erased under a U.S. legal principle that cancels a conviction if the defendant dies before he can appeal.

Head To Head On The Hill (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

From their years at Harvard Law School to their tenure in the House of Representatives, Barney Frank and Christopher Cox chose markedly different approaches to reach their destinations.

DOJ_NMG_0110631

This week, their paths will cross again as Frank, a Massachusetts Democrat, assumes control of the House Financial Services Committee, which oversees the Securities and Exchange Commission -- led by Cox, a former Republican lawmaker from California.

Despite similar r?sum?s, the men could hardly be more divergent in ideology and personal style.

Frank, who used an anti-neatness slogan in his first federal campaign 27 years ago, has a lacerating wit. His support for predatory-lending reforms, minimum-wage increases and universal health care mark him as one of the most left-leaning lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

Cox rarely appears in public with a hair out of place or a wrinkle in his perfectly tailored suits. He speaks with deliberation and labors to defuse criticism. Cox cut his teeth in the Reagan White House, and his votes in Congress earned him an 87 percent lifetime rating from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce before he became chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Already, they have clashed over a change to an SEC rule that some investor advocates say will reduce disclosure of executive pay in the form of certain stock awards. The change, announced in a press release three days before Christmas, amounted to a gift to the business lobby, Frank told reporters last week. "I didn't even know they had a chimney at the SEC," Frank joked, true to form.

Equally in character, Cox called Frank to smooth things over, explaining the timing of the move and defending his approach as logical, since, he said, the initial plan would have forced companies to report pay that corporate officials might never have collected.

The damage-control effort appears to have worked, for now. In a follow-up interview, Frank praised the SEC leader for his "responsible" approach at the helm and predicted few sharp disagreements to come. "There are going to be cases where I'll believe we should go further than he," said Frank, who advocates more disclosure to investors .

Frank plans to present his agenda -- what he calls "the grand bargain" -- at the National Press Club today. He will urge lawmakers to offer business concessions on trade and some burdensome regulations in exchange for more housing for the poor and minimum-wage gains.

For years, Frank has focused on housing and income inequality, just as Cox has championed making it easier for companies to win access to capital markets. But while holding fast to those priorities, neither has been reluctant to entertain opposing views.

To date, Cox has pursued a far less ideological agenda at the SEC than governance analysts expected -- and Frank's record reflects a more business-friendly stance than many have assumed. Both men voted in favor of a 1995 law that imposed limits on the filing of class-action securities lawsuits. While in Congress, both reaped significant campaign contributions from banks, insurers, and law and accounting firms. And both have said they turn first to the markets for solutions to economic problems, rather than to government.

Frank, for instance, said he agrees with certain conclusions reached late last year by an independent panel with support from Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., including making it more difficult for prosecutors to indict businesses. He also supported tweaks to a costly audit rule springing from the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, as long as the intent of the corporate accountability legislation was not thwarted.

"They're both pragmatic," said Barbara Roper, director of investor protection at the Consumer Federation of America. "I don't think either of them is looking to pursue a radical agenda."

But, as the SEC leader learned last week, Frank is less flexible in the area of ever-expanding executive pay -- an issue that fits into his broader agenda of lessening wealth disparity and one he says could come up for Financial Services hearings as early as March, after he holds oversight sessions on housing problems stemming from Hurricane Katrina. Frank previously introduced legislation that would put executive compensation up for a shareholder vote, a measure he is likely to revisit this year.

"He has certainly been eager for Democrats to have the responsibility for governance," said his sister Ann Lewis, a campaign adviser to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). Lewis says her brother developed a thick skin after years growing up in Bayonne, N.J., and playing in the sometimes brutal fields of Boston politics.

He leavens that intensity with humor to disarm his audience and make a point, which Lewis said "really goes a long way to enabling him to be politically effective."

Cox, by contrast, earnestly strives to reach consensus, making unanimous votes a priority at an agency that had been sharply divided under his predecessor. A series of 5 to 0 votes last year at the SEC is a testament to Cox's political acumen and also makes the agency a less attractive target for Hill Democrats, the consumer federation's Roper said.

That's an observation Frank agrees with. "Chris is a lawyer, and he's a very careful guy," Frank said. "Among other things, he understands he's a law enforcement officer."

DOJ_NMG_0110632

Cox, who was pursuing a joint business and law degree from Harvard, and Frank, who by then was studying law and serving as a member of the Massachusetts state legislature, didn't have much contact in Cambridge during the 1970s. On Capitol Hill, they collaborated on only a few issues, including a years-long drive to privatize the National Helium Reserve and an effort to win the release of a Chinese dissident who had lived in Frank's congressional district.

As lawmakers, both men developed a reputation for understanding the details of policy proposals and putting their substantial intellect to use. Whether and how they diverge in their new roles will be one of the more interesting questions of the next year, corporate governance experts said.

"Investors benefit from a bipartisan pro-investor consensus, and we hope that our Republican friends in the regulatory community will work with Barney to achieve that," said Damon A. Silvers, associate general counsel at the AFL-CIO.

Enron's Last Victim: American Markets (NYT)

By WILLIAM A. NISKANEN

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Washington

WHEN the new Congress begins its session tomorrow, two familiar faces will not be present: Senator Paul S. Sarbanes and Representative Michael G. Oxley, who are both retiring. Mr. Sarbanes, a Maryland Democrat, has served for 30 years; Mr. Oxley, an Ohio Republican, for 26 — and their main legacy will be their joint attack on corporate corruption, the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002.

The act, which was passed hastily in the wake of the Enron scandal, was surely well intentioned. But it has proven counterproductive in the extreme, and Congress would best honor the departing lawmakers by repealing it.

Sarbanes-Oxley has seriously harmed American corporations and financial markets without increasing investor confidence. The section of the law requiring companies to perform internal audits has turned out to be far more costly than proponents projected, especially for smaller firms. These costs have led some small companies to go private, hardly a victory for public oversight, and some foreign firms to withdraw their stocks from American exchanges.

In addition, the average "listing premium" — the benefit that companies receive by listing their stocks on American exchanges — has declined by 19 percentage points since 2002. This explains why the percentage of worldwide initial public offerings on our exchanges dropped to 5 percent last year, from 50 percent in 2000.

Other costs associated with the act may turn out to be more important. For example, more stringent financial regulations and increased penalties for accounting errors may make senior managers too risk-averse. Most chief executives are not accountants, so the requirement that they personally affirm tax reports — at the risk of jail time should anything be amiss — may make them reluctant to partake in perfectly legitimate activities.

Paradoxically, Sarbanes-Oxley's strict rules on oversight by boards of directors would have been insufficient to prevent the collapse of Enron. By the act's standards, Enron had a model board; most members were distinguished professionals. The chairman of the audit committee was a former accounting professor and dean of the Stanford Business School.

Nor would the act's provisions to create a stronger Securities and Exchange Commission have made a difference. The commission had been aware of Enron's accounting techniques since 1992 and had never thought to question them.

Nor was Sarbanes-Oxley necessary in prosecuting the senior managers of Enron, WorldCom and other corporations where fraud was committed — all have been convicted of accounting fraud under laws predating the act.

The negative repercussions of the act on businesses might have been worth it if the act had achieved its primary goal: substantially increasing the confidence of investors in the accuracy of the accounts of firms listed on the exchanges. But that does not seem to have happened.

The best measure of investor confidence is the price-earnings ratio — the price that investors are willing to pay for each dollar of a company's reported earnings. The overall price-earnings ratio for the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, however, has declined continuously since the Sarbanes-Oxley Act was being drafted in the spring of 2002.

Several leaders of the new Democratic Congressional majority have endorsed a relaxation of the audit requirements and other parts of the act. That is encouraging, but it is not enough. The basic structure of Sarbanes-Oxley is unsound.

One big problem is that the act nationalized the rules for corporate governance, reducing the value of the competition among the states for setting such rules. In addition, the act failed to resolve the major conflict of interest created when auditing firms are paid by the companies they audit. Rather than creating a regulation to change the system, Sarbanes-Oxley created an expensive and arguably unconstitutional new regulatory agency to regulate the audit firms' activities.

And, as is too often the case, Congress has rewarded the failures of the very bureaucracies that failed to keep up with Enron — doubling the budget of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0110633

Tinkering is not enough. Sarbanes-Oxley continues to discourage smaller companies from trading publicly and foreign companies from listing their stocks on American exchanges. In the eyes of investors, it hasn't cleaned up any corruption, it has only forced companies to jump through hoops. As Senator Sarbanes and Representative Oxley drift into retirement, their act should retire with them.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bruno Deals Eyed (NYDN)

By Joe Mahoney, Daily News Albany Bureau Chief

New York Daily News, January 3, 2007

ALBANY - The FBI has subpoenaed an investment firm for documents related to state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno in a widening probe of the state's top Republican, the Daily News learned yesterday.

A source familiar with the investigation said the firm, McGinn, Smith & Co. of Albany, is "one of the groups Sen. Bruno did consulting for" through his own business.

The FBI, working with a federal grand jury convened by the U.S. attorney's office here, is conducting a wide-ranging inquiry to determine if Bruno has cashed in on his position as legislative leader through his business dealings, sources said.

Bruno, of Rensselaer, has stated he is "guilty of nothing," arguing his business arrangements are independent of the legislation he helps control.

But he has been tight-lipped about his company, Capital Business Consultants, refusing to name its clients or income.

Bruno spokesman John McArdle declined to address questions about the senator's relationship with McGinn, Smith.

The firm's executives could not be reached for comment on the FBI inquiry.

The FBI is also reviewing subpoenaed documents relating to land transactions made by now-dissolved First Grafton Corp., a real estate investment firm that Bruno helped to start, as well as plane rides arranged for Bruno by a wealthy friend, Jared Abbruzzese, sources said.

Abbruzzese was an early investor in Evident Technologies, a high-tech Troy company to which Bruno steered $500,000 in pork barrel "member items" in 2002 and 2004.

Despite the probe, legislative insiders predict Bruno will be reelected today as Senate president, a position he has held for 12 years.

FBI Investigating Murder Of Pascua Yaqui Member (AZDS)

By Brady McCombs, Arizona Daily Star

Arizona Daily Star, January 3, 2007

The FBI is investigating the New Year's Day death of the brother of the chairwoman of the Pascua Yaqui Tribe as a homicide, an FBI spokeswoman in Phoenix said Tuesday.

Gabriel Frias, the 32-year-old brother of chairwoman Herminia Frias, died from shotgun blast to the midsection, an autopsy performed Tuesday by the Pima County Medical Examiner's Office revealed, said Deborah McCarley, an FBI spokeswoman in Phoenix.

The father of three was found shot outside a residential area on the reservation southwest of Tucson early New Year's Day morning, she said. He was conscious when the first responders arrived but died a short time later at about 4 a.m., she said. He was shot more than once but she wouldn't say how many times.

The FBI remained tight lipped about the events leading up to the shooting, possible suspects or motives, citing the need to protect the ongoing investigation, McCarley said. They haven't arrested anyone, she said.

The Frias family, meanwhile, was making preliminary plans for a wake on Sunday and a funeral on Monday, said Pilar Thomas, interim attorney general for the Tribe. The arrangements have not been finalized, she said.

Gabriel Frias, the youngest of six children, is survived by his parents and his three children — a 12-year-old son, a 2-year-old daughter and a 3-week-old boy, Herminia Frias said.

Herminia Frias, 33, who became the tribe's first female leader in June 2004, plans to take some time off to be with her family, Thomas said. Tribal government matters will continue as usual with the other three executive officers handling her duties, she said.

The Tribe has 14,600 enrolled members with nearly 4,000 of them living on the reservation. The tribe has 1,395 acres off West Valencia Road and South Camino de Oeste.

Indicted Cops Turn Themselves In, Other Officers Show Support (NOTP)

By Laura Maggi And Brendan McCarthy, Staff writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 3, 2007

Surrounded by colleagues offering hugs, handshakes and shouts of support, seven New Orleans police officers walked into central lock-up Tuesday morning to be booked on murder and attempted murder charges, stemming from their shooting of six people a week after Hurricane Katrina.

Steady applause broke out as the officers, accompanied by their attorneys and union representatives, began the slow march to jail. At the back of the crowd of more than 200, a woman called out, "Thank you, guys," as others clasped hands with the indicted officers, who appeared visibly moved by the outpouring. One man in the group had tears in his eyes.

Not everyone offered comfort: A handful of protesters, marching outside the ring of support, pronounced the officers guilty and called them terrorists and thugs. And shouts from inside the jail could be heard on the street below — a handful of voices screaming out obscenities and warnings. "Now you are on the inside," one man yelled.

The officer's indictment by a state grand jury indictment last week has clearly galvanized members of New Orleans Police Department, as well as other local police agencies, who turned out on a cold January morning to line South White Street next to the House of Detention.

Police have blasted the indictments, saying the officers who killed two and seriously wounded four on the Danziger Bridge merely carried out their duty, responding to reports of sniper fire at rescue workers. When they arrived at the bridge, on Chef Menteur Highway in eastern New Orleans, they were immediately engaged in a gunfight, police have said.

The grand jury rejected that account, siding with a set of victims who have filed federal lawsuits against the police stemming from the shooting. Those victims have said they were unarmed and did not shoot at the police.

Lance Madison — who police arrested for attempted murder of a police officer but the grand jury later cleared — has said he did hear shooting before the cops arrived. But Madison and his mentally handicapped brother, who police shot and killed, had no weapons and never threatened police, Lance Madison has said.

As the seven accused officers neared the booking department, several fellow law enforcement officers formed a tight-knit circle around them, clasping their hands on backs of the accused and and shuffling them to the doors.

Once they had walked through the jailhouse doors, officers broke out into chants of "N-O-P-D" and "heroes," largely drowning out a small counter-protest of people with signs reading that "police killings must stop."

"I've never seen such an outpouring of support in all the years I've been doing this. It was quite touching," said Franz Zibilich, the attorney for Robert Faulcon, who was indicted on two counts of first-degree murder and four counts of attempted first-degree murder.

Faulcon and the other three officers accused of first-degree murder will be spending an indeterminate amount of time in Orleans Parish Prison, as Chief Judge Raymond Bigelow ruled last week that they are not eligible for bail. Defense attorneys said that they expect to file motions on Wednesday for bond hearings, which are expected to be held Friday.

Sgt. Kenneth Bowen, Sgt. Robert Gisevius, and officer Anthony Villavaso were charged along with Faulcon with the first-degree murder of James Brissette, 19.

Faulcon, who left the force after the flood, was also charged with the first-degree murder of Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally handicapped man whose body was found with seven gunshot wounds to his back and upper arm. Attorneys for the officers maintain that Madison was hit by seven pellets from one shotgun blast.

Zibilich said Faulcon had never discharged his weapon during his four years on the NOPD, calling him a "decorated, perfect police officer" who spent years in the military before joining the force.

Officers Michael Hunter, Ignatius Hills and Robert Barrios were indicted on attempted murder charges, and therefore eligible for bail. Bigelow set a bond of $100,000 for each count of attempted murder.

Only Hunter posted bail on Tuesday. The families of Barrios and Hills are raising money or finding property to use collateral, with the hope that they can get out of jail within the next few days, their attorneys said.

"They aren't people of means," said Bruce Whittaker, the attorney representing Hills.

Special arrangements have been made for the indicted officers within Orleans Parish Prison, said a spokeswoman for the criminal sheriff's office. They will not be locked up with the general population, a typical provision granted to accused and often even convicted police officers.

A handful of protesters marched alongside the officers, outside of the phalanx of supporters. They carried signs—one read "NOPD Terrorism Must Stop"—and chanted for end to police brutality.

The Rev. Raymond Brown, a community activist and New Orleans chairman of the National Action Network, held a sign aloft and screamed with rage.

DOJ_NMG_0110635

"They are guilty," he said, "a bunch of thugs."

The New Orleans branch of the NAACP offered more measured criticism of the display of support, saying it sends a bad signal to the public for the police to applaud accused murderers.

"The system should have an opportunity to function," said Danatus King, an attorney and NAACP branch president.

But the protest could stop potential witnesses from coming forward, King said. Further, the fact that an internal police department investgation cleared the indicted officers could also send a dangerous message to the public: that reporting criminal acts by officers will not result in a thorough NOPD inquiry, King said.

The police rally was organized by the Police Association of New Orleans, with members of the Fraternal Order of Police handing out payroll deduction forms and asking members of NOPD to donate at least $5 per biweekly paycheck to a family assistance fund for the officers. The six officers on the force at the time of the indictment were suspended without pay, according to the department.

Watch For Scams, Gulf Coast Homeowners Told (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, January 2, 2007

Officials along the Gulf Coast are warning homeowners that they will likely face a wave of contractor scams in the coming months as they begin collecting billions of dollars in government grants to rebuild what Hurricane Katrina destroyed.

Mississippi has hired six investigators to target schemes aimed at recipients. Louisiana will send out vans to warn consumers about scams and take complaints. Both states are filling the airwaves with warnings about common schemes, and regularly warn aid recipients to research contractors and put work agreements in writing.

The grant programs in both states will distribute as much as $10.5 billion in aid to homeowners and could trigger thousands of building projects in areas already struggling with a shortage of qualified contractors.

"What used to be an occasional complaint about phony contractors or an occasional fraud has turned into — well, the best way I can describe it is blood in the water," says Charles Marceaux, executive director of Louisiana's contractor licensing board. The board now reviews the conduct of about 100 contractors each month, based on complaints from homeowners, Marceaux says. The complaints range from concerns about unqualified local workers to information about rip-off artists from as far away as Mexico, he says.

The temptation of such scams will only intensify as more homeowners start collecting grants, he says. So far, Louisiana's grant program has given money to 104 of the almost 92,000 people who applied, and Mississippi has paid 8,200 of its roughly 17,500 applicants"The biggest risk for fraud is once we put the money into the hands of a homeowner," says Donna Sanford, who runs Mississippi's program.

It's the latest venue for fraud in the federal government's $80 billion hurricane recovery effort, already faulted repeatedly by federal auditors for waste and abuse. The U.S. Government Accountability Office,the investigative arm of Congress, estimated this year that that Federal Emergency Management Agency has made $1 billion worth of fraudulent or unjustified aid payments.

Officials expect contracting schemes will make up the next wave of fraud, in part because taking money from homeowners is already proving far less complicated than scamming the government-run grants, Mississippi State Auditor Phil Bryant says. Both states required that applicants be interviewed in person and prove they own damaged homes; Louisiana also photographed and thumbprinted applicants.

"This is federal taxpayer money, and we're going to have zero tolerance for any fraud, abuse or corruption," Louisiana Attorney General Charles C. Foti, Jr. says. He says his office now gets 125 contractor fraud complaints a week, and the number is increasing.

Panel Seeks End To Death Penalty For New Jersey (NYT)

By Laura Mansnerus

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

TRENTON, Jan. 2 — A legislative commission recommended on Tuesday that New Jersey become the first state to abolish the death penalty since states began reinstating their capital punishment laws 35 years ago. Its report found "no compelling evidence" that capital punishment serves a legitimate purpose, and increasing evidence that it "is inconsistent with evolving standards of decency."

Death Penalty Study Commision Report

DOJ_NMG_0110636

The report, whose lone dissenter was the original author of the state's modern death penalty statute, came a year after New Jersey joined Illinois and Maryland in imposing moratoriums on executions, and amid growing unease among politicians and the public about capital punishment.

Eight other states, including New York, have also suspended executions in recent years, most because of court decisions. Maryland had lifted its moratorium in 2003, after a year, but a court essentially reinstated it last month.

Death penalty experts said that New Jersey was the first state to receive an official recommendation that capital punishment be abandoned, and it lands in a state where legislators have a Democratic majority along with a Democratic governor who supports repeal of the statute.

The governor, Jon S. Corzine, embraced the report on Tuesday. "As someone who has long opposed the death penalty," he said in a statement, "I look forward to working with the Legislature" to carry out the recommendations.

There is ample opposition to capital punishment in both houses of the Legislature, and Senate President Richard J. Codey said in an interview that he expected to ask for a vote, although he would not discuss a timetable.

Assembly Speaker Joseph J. Roberts, who also said he supported an end to the death penalty, issued a written statement saying that he would not consider scheduling a vote until discussing the report with other Democrats, leaving the possibility that repeal legislation could remain locked in committee.

New Jersey's last execution was in 1963, and its death row population has shrunk to nine men. Many appeals have been extended for years by a process known as "proportionality review," meant to assure that capital sentencing was not being arbitrarily applied, before the State Supreme Court.

The 13-member New Jersey Death Penalty Study Commission, including two prosecutors, a police chief, clergy members and murder victims' representatives, began meeting in June and heard from scores of witnesses at five public hearings before issuing the 127-page report.

"Based on our findings, the commission recommends that the death penalty in New Jersey be abolished and replaced with life imprisonment without the possibility of parole, to be served in a maximum security facility," the report said. "The commission also recommends that any cost savings resulting from the abolition of the death penalty be used for benefits and services for survivors of victims of homicide."

If the Legislature did abolish the death penalty, it would be the first to do so since the United States Supreme Court halted all executions in 1972 — after which 38 states rewrote their laws to reinstate the practice. New Jersey restored the death penalty in 1982.

But a repeal would be in line with a nationwide retreat from executions, with the annual count declining by nearly half since 1999. A nationwide Gallup telephone poll in 2006 found Americans almost evenly divided when asked whether a death sentence or life without the possibility of parole was a preferable punishment for murder, after years of previous polls in which a majority supported the death penalty.

"We're in a period of national reconsideration of the death penalty," said Austin D. Sarat, a professor of political science and law at Amherst College in Massachusetts. "I believe what's happening in New Jersey will have a tremendously galvanizing effect."

Richard C. Dieter, the director of the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, attributed the sea change to the many wrongful convictions exposed by DNA evidence. "That is the wedge that has made the death penalty difficult to fix," Mr. Dieter said. "It's all related to the scientific revolution we've had in the last 10 years."

Professor Sarat, the author of the 2001 book, "When the State Kills," said the shift in public opinion had accelerated even in the last few months.

Two weeks ago, a botched execution in Florida underscored doubts about lethal injection and led Gov. Jeb Bush to suspend the death penalty. The same day, a federal court ruled that California's lethal injection procedures violated the constitutional prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment.

"If you'd asked me six months ago if they'd end up in this place, I'd have said no," Professor Sarat said of the New Jersey commission. "I would have said they'd take a more careful route."

New York, which has only one man on death row and has not carried out an execution since reinstating the death penalty, has had a moratorium since the state's Court of Appeals found its law unconstitutional in 2004. The Legislature has not moved to revise the statute.

In New Jersey, a bill to repeal the death penalty was introduced several years ago but never brought to a vote in the judiciary committee of either chamber. But Mr. Codey, the Senate president, said on Tuesday, "I think that will be done."

"What's the use of having a death penalty if at the age of 18 you commit a murder and then have to live longer than Methuselah to be executed?" he asked.

DOJ_NMG_0110637

Mr. Codey also pointed to the change in public opinion since the enactment of the death penalty law, as did the commission. The panel cited a 1999 Star-Ledger/Eagleton-Rutgers Poll in which 44 percent of New Jersey residents supported the death penalty and 37 percent preferred life imprisonment without parole, and a 2002 poll that asked the same question found that 36 percent supported the death penalty and 48 percent favored life without parole.

The commission's report, which recommended the life-without-parole alternative, drew stinging responses from several Republicans. "How can they possibly arrive at that conclusion when New Jersey has not enforced the current law even once since its enactment?" the Assembly's minority leader, Alex DeCroce, who represents Morris and Passaic Counties, asked in a written statement.

The dissenter on the commission, John F. Russo, a former State Senate president from Ocean County and a Democrat, said the problem was not in the law but in "the liberal judges and other individuals who have consistently disregarded the legislative will and refused to enforce the law as written."

Mr. Russo, a former prosecutor, recounted a death penalty verdict that he had fought for but left him in tears. "I realize the gravity of the issue," he said, adding that he believed the death penalty should still be available in cases of serial killings and terrorism.

Special Panel Urges New Jersey To Abolish Death Penalty (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hester Jr., Associated Press Writer

AP, January 3, 2007

(AP) - TRENTON, New Jersey-New Jersey should abolish its death penalty and replace it with life imprisonment without the possibility of parole, according to a special commission's report sent Tuesday to Governor Jon Corzine and legislators.

The report, obtained by The Associated Press, found no compelling evidence that New Jersey's death penalty, which has not been used in more than four decades, serves any purpose.

It also found abolishing the death penalty would eliminate the danger of executing an innocent person, and said the death penalty costs taxpayers more than prisoners serving life terms without parole.

"There is increasing evidence that the death penalty is inconsistent with evolving standards of decency," the report said.

"The alternative of life imprisonment in a maximum security institution without the possibility of parole would sufficiently ensure public safety and address other legitimate social and penological interests, including the interests of the families of murder victims," the report found.

One member of the group, former Senator John F. Russo, who wrote the state's death penalty statute when executions were reinstated in 1982, dissented from the commission's findings.

The 13-member commission was formed earlier this year to study capital punishment in a state that has not executed anyone since 1963. Nine men are on death row in New Jersey, but the legislation that created the commission imposed a moratorium on executions until 60 days after the panel completed its work. No execution was imminent when the moratorium was imposed.

The state already was temporarily barred from executing anyone under a February 2004 court ruling that said the state could not execute anyone until it revised procedures on how to impose the penalty. The court had raised concerns about lack of public access to executions and whether the state could handle last-second stays issued after lethal drugs were administered.

Corzine, a Democrat, opposes the death penalty. He is the first elected New Jersey governor to oppose it since Brendan Byrne, who left office in January 1982.

If lawmakers and Corzine implement the commission's recommendation, New Jersey would become the 13th state without a death penalty. New Jersey was the third state to impose a death penalty moratorium to study the issue, behind Maryland and Illinois.

State Prosecutors Getting Federal Help In Child Sex Cases (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

Until the state Legislature changes prison sentences for people who distribute child pornography, local prosecutors are getting help from federal officials in putting pedophiles in prison.

Investigators in Harnett County discovered 228 video clips and 124 still photos of child pornography - including some involving a toddler - on Christopher Paul Brady's computer.

In state court, the 31-year-old Brady received three years of supervised probation.

"I got the most I could get," said Assistant District Attorney Mary Wilson.

But federal prosecutors stepped in and charged the Lillington man with trafficking in child pornography. After being convicted, Brady was sentenced to more than 15 years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0110638

"We're saving some people some trauma. We're going to get a good sentence," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Exum, who works with prosecutors on child pornography cases in eastern North Carolina.

Exum works under Project Safe Childhood, a U.S. Justice Department program which was started last year and aims to put pedophiles in prison on lengthy sentences.

FBI statistics show child pornography and exploitation cases increased nationally from 113 in 1996 to 2,135 last year and prosecutors have seen a similar increase in cases coming to court - from 344 in 1995 to 1,576 in 2005.

The state Legislature convenes Jan. 24 and one task is to seek tougher penalties for child pornography charges. State law currently gives prison time to people who make child pornography, but a special legislative committee recommended tougher sentences.

"I think we will get a lot of support in the General Assembly," said Rep. Karen Ray, R-Iredell, and co-chairwoman of the committee. "This is a no-brainer."

Columbus County Assistant District Attorney Samantha Alsup handles pornography cases and said state law doesn't take it seriously.

"Until our state legislature gets tougher on people who look at child pornography, we're going to have to rely on the federal government to keep our communities safe," she said.

UTEP Professor Sues Federal Government (EPTIMES)

El Paso Times, January 3, 2007

A UTEP professor is suing the federal government hoping to force the release of documents surrounding the case of "Lalo," the former Immigration and Customs Enforcement informant involved in drug- related murders in Juárez.

Bill Weaver, an associate professor of political science at UTEP, filed the suit in mid-November against the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Department of Justice because the agencies did not answer his Freedom of Information Act requests from 2005, court documents showed.

What Weaver is seeking are the never-released conclusions of an internal audit looking at the conduct of special agents and prosecutors who monitored the informant, Guillermo Eduardo Ramirez Peyro, 35, known as "Lalo," as 12 men were tortured, killed and buried in a Juárez back yard in 2003 and 2004.

Weaver also wants a sound recording made by the informant of the gruesome killing of an associate, a Mexican lawyer named Fernando Reyes, in August 2003.

The professor said he wants to use the information for an upcoming book.

"If it had happened on the Canadian border, there would be hell to pay," he said. "That just offends me. That's not the business that the U.S. government should be in."

Ramirez was a lieutenant in the Vicente Carrillo Fuentes drug cartel in Juárez and also worked as a U.S. informant, first for the DEA and then for ICE. ICE memos and other documents suggest that ICE agents and U.S. attorney's office officials knew of the ongoing killings but did nothing to stop them.

Ramirez, who is currently fighting deportation to Mexico, said in an immigration hearing that his ICE handlers monitored his phone conversations and knew when a "carne asada," a barbecue, the code name for murder, was being planned.

In October, ICE officials said they considered the case closed.

But the case has lately attracted the attention of the international press and of a few government watchdogs.

Weaver said he will soon file two more lawsuits over his FOIA requests. One lawsuit will be against ICE for all information applying to Ramirez including payments and debriefings, and the other will be against the federal courts to see what ICE told the courts about Ramirez in order to obtain wiretapping warrants.

DEA officials in El Paso could not be reached for comment today.

The DEA answered Weaver s FOIAs in writing in December 2006, saying that some of the documents he asked for were in South America, correspondence show.

But Weaver in his lawsuit said the documents are readily available in Washington, D.C., and unclassified.

"The delay on this request is troublesome. Several DEA agents have informed me that all of the material requested is together, at headquarters office, and requires no searching of field offices or even any disparate offices at headquarters," he wrote in the lawsuit. "I have a hard time coming to any conclusion other than that my request is being purposefully stalled."

DOJ_NMG_0110639

Weaver is senior adviser to the Virginia-based National Security Whistleblowers Coalition, which counts as a member Sandalio Gonzalez, the former special agent in charge of the DEA in El Paso who was openly critical of ICE over the informant affair. The book Weaver is writing is about whistleblowers.

Defense Attorney Pleads For Life Of Truck Driver Convicted In Deadliest Human Smuggling Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 3, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-A truck driver convicted for his role in the deadliest immigrant smuggling attempt in the U.S. should not be sentenced to death because he is not the "worst of the worst," his defense attorney told jurors Tuesday.

But prosecutors said Tyrone Williams, 35, a Jamaican citizen living in New York state, should be executed because he committed a deliberate act of violence in a depraved manner that resulted in the deaths of 19 illegal immigrants trapped inside a sweltering tractor-trailer.

"The only justifiable punishment in this case should be death," Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rodriguez said.

After a nearly monthlong break due to the illness of an attorney and the holidays, the punishment phase in Williams' retrial resumed on Tuesday with opening statements.

Williams was convicted on Dec. 4 for his role in the May 2003 deaths of the illegal immigrants, who succumbed to the deadly heat in the back of his tractor-trailer as he was smuggling them from southern Texas to Houston.

Jurors now have to decide if Williams, who was convicted on all 58 counts of conspiracy, harboring and transporting, should be sentenced to death or up to life in prison.

During his opening statement, Craig Washington, Williams' lead attorney, told jurors his client never intended for the immigrants to die and continues to be remorseful about what happened.

Washington said other members of the smuggling ring Williams worked with were equally culpable for what happened, but none of them are facing a possible death sentence.

Washington said Williams can be rehabilitated and that his family, who was present in the courtroom, would be hurt by a death sentence.

But Rodriguez said Williams merits a death sentence because by not freeing the immigrants during the smuggling attempt, he intentionally committed an act of violence that put people at grave risk and caused their deaths.

Rodriguez said Williams' actions were done in a heinous and cruel manner that also put in danger the lives of the other immigrants trapped inside his trailer. More than 70 immigrants were stuffed inside the trailer.

Nineteen of the immigrants died of dehydration, overheating and suffocation after spending nearly four hours inside the oven-like container. Williams abandoned the trailer at a truck stop in Victoria, about 100 miles (160 kilometers) southwest of Houston.

Family members of the 19 victims are expected to testify during the punishment phase.

Williams is the only one of 14 people charged in the case who is facing the death penalty. In 2005, a jury convicted Williams on 38 transporting counts, but he avoided a death sentence because the jury could not agree on his role in the smuggling attempt. The jury deadlocked on the 20 other counts.

An appeals court granted Williams a new trial after his conviction in 2005 because the jury could not agree on his role in the smuggling attempt.

Division I-A Minority Coaches Grows To Seven (USAT)

By Thomas O'toole

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Floyd Keith isn't ready to proclaim great strides when it comes to hiring minority head football coaches in NCAA Division I-A. But with two moves already this month, the executive director of the Black Coaches Association said Wednesday that he is encouraged by what is happening.

"At the end of the day I still have to wait and see where the numbers end up," he said. "With two I-A hires, that brings it to seven, which, if there is one more hire, would equal the most."

DOJ_NMG_0110640

Mario Cristobal, who is Cuban-American, was hired at Florida International, and Randy Shannon, who is African-American, was hired at Miami (Fla.). They join five other current I-A minority head coaches. In 1998 there were eight. As recently as the 2005 season there were three. Eighteen of the 119 jobs in I-A have opened this season, with all but three filled.

Keith's organization began issuing an annual report card on hiring practice in 2004 as a way to bring pressure on schools to at least consider minority candidates. The group also wants recruits and their families to consider a school's BCA grade before signing.

The grade emphasizes minorities brought into the interview process as well as those hired. The third report card, which grades individual schools, was issued in September.

Keith says anecdotally he is encouraged by "what I'm hearing about the numbers of interviews in the current process. But it still gets to, at the end of the day, who's being hired."

Mass. Lawmakers Vote On Gay Marriage (AP)

By Steve Leblanc

AP, January 3, 2007

In a suspense-filled final day of the legislative session, Massachusetts lawmakers kept alive a proposed constitutional amendment Tuesday that would put a stop to gay marriage in the only state that allows same-sex couples to wed.

The vote came after weeks of mounting legal and political pressure on legislators from both sides in the debate.

With a combination of parliamentary maneuvering, flip-flopping and brinksmanship, lawmakers gave the first round of approval necessary for the amendment to appear on the ballot in 2008. The measure still needs the endorsement of the next legislative session.

If the amendment makes it onto the ballot and residents approve it, it will leave Massachusetts' 8,000 existing gay marriages intact but ban any new ones.

"This is democracy in action. It's not a vengeance campaign. It's not a hate campaign. It's just an opportunity for the people to vote," said Kris Mineau of the Massachusetts Family Institute, a conservative group that opposes gay marriage.

If lawmakers had failed to act on the amendment Tuesday, the measure would have died, and opponents of gay marriage who collected 170,000 signatures to try to put the issue on the ballot would have had to start over again.

The pressure on lawmakers came from all sides: Gay rights activists and Democratic Gov.-elect Deval Patrick called on the Legislature to let the measure die without a vote. Gay rights opponents — and Massachusetts' highest court — demanded an up-or-down vote.

The state Supreme Judicial Court — the same court that ruled in 2003 that gays have a constitutional right to marry — declared last week that lawmakers had shirked their constitutional duties by refusing to vote on an amendment submitted by the people. But the justices acknowledged they had no authority to force action.

To advance to the next round, the amendment needed the approval of only 50 of the 200 members of the Legislature. On Tuesday, 61 lawmakers voted in favor, while 132 were opposed.

A few hours later, the lawmakers agreed to reconsider. But then they largely affirmed the original result, with 62 voting in favor of the amendment.

Earlier in the day, the governor-elect, who supports gay marriage, met with the leaders of the Democratic-controlled Legislature to argue against a vote, calling it a "question of conscience."

Patrick charged that the amendment process was being used to "consider reinserting discrimination into the constitution."

"This is not just another question for popular decision. This is a question, under the equal protection clause, about what freedoms the minority is entitled to," Patrick said.

Patrick takes the oath of office Thursday. His predecessor, Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who is considering a run for president, opposes gay marriage.

On Tuesday, crowds of gay marriage supporters and opponents returned to the Statehouse to press lawmakers on the issue.

Proponents of the amendment stood at the foot of the Statehouse steps with signs reading "Let the People Vote."

"Legislators are sent to Beacon Hill to vote on a matter, not to not vote on a matter," said one of the sign holders, Paul Ferro, 30.

Opponents of amendment stood on the opposite side of the street, in front of a Civil War memorial, with their own banners. "Let the people marry," read one.

A person on the pro-gay marriage side held a sign that read, "Start Acting Like Christians." An opponent of gay marriage yelled from across the street, "We are Christians, just like you!"

In November, seven states approved gay-marriage bans, joining 20 that had done so in previous elections.

DOJ_NMG_0110641

Other states are moving in the opposite direction: New Jersey's gay couples gained new rights last week when the state legalized same-sex civil unions there. Vermont and Connecticut also allow civil unions.

Same-Sex Marriage Setback In Massachusetts (NYT)

By Pam Belluck

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

BOSTON, Jan. 2 — Massachusetts, the only state where same-sex marriage is legal, took a first step toward possibly banning it Tuesday when legislators voted to advance a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union between a man and a woman.

The amendment now requires the approval of at least 50 legislators in another vote in the 2007-8 session. Then it would be placed on the November 2008 ballot as a referendum question.

If it passed, the amendment would not invalidate the more than 8,000 same-sex marriages that have taken place since they became legal in May 2004. But it would prevent future marriages of gay men and lesbians.

"This is democracy in action," said Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute, which sponsored the amendment. "It's giving people the opportunity to vote on the most essential institution in human existence — marriage."

Arline Isaacson, co-chairwoman of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus, choked back tears.

"The price that our children and families will pay is so severe that we simply have to recommit ourselves to fight this some more," she said.

The swiftness of the vote on Tuesday surprised people on both sides of the issue, taking place without any debate, just minutes after the constitutional convention had been gaveled into session. Proponents of the amendment needed just 50 of the legislature's 200 lawmakers to support it; the final vote was 61 in favor of the amendment and 132 opposed.

Later in the day, supporters of same-sex marriage persuaded lawmakers to reconsider the amendment, but the second vote, 62 to 134, only affirmed the results of the first.

National groups on both sides of the issue said they would commit resources to help advocates wage battle here. This past Election Day, the tide had seemed to be turning slightly in favor of supporters of same-sex marriage, with the defeat of an opposition amendment in Arizona and passage of seven others by slimmer margins than similar amendments in 2004.

Just two months ago, at an earlier constitutional convention, the legislature appeared to have essentially killed the proposal to allow a vote. During that session, legislators recessed without voting on the amendment, tabling it until Jan. 2, the last day of the legislative session. Both sides said they expected that lawmakers would then vote to end the session without taking up the measure.

But last week, the state's Supreme Judicial Court, which three years ago ruled that same-sex marriage should be legal, threw a wrench into things.

The court chided lawmakers for their maneuvers to avoid a vote on the amendment, saying the legislature had demonstrated "indifference to, or defiance of, its constitutional duties."

The court said it was not empowered to order the legislature to vote on the amendment, which petitioners, including Gov. Mitt Romney, had asked it to do. But the court's criticism appeared to be enough to make some lawmakers, including some supporters of same-sex marriage, decide to allow a vote.

"Certainly, the court ruling changed the atmosphere this week," said Mr. Mineau, whose organization had gathered a record 170,000 petition signatures to get the amendment before the legislature.

Ms. Isaacson said, "The S.J.C. decision really tipped the scales against us."

Tuesday's vote was considered a victory for Governor Romney, a Republican who has used his opposition to same-sex marriage as a conservative rallying point as he has laid the groundwork for an expected run for the presidency in 2008.

In a statement Tuesday, Mr. Romney called the marriage vote "a huge victory for the people of Massachusetts."

By contrast, the vote was something of a rebuke to the incoming governor, Deval L. Patrick, a supporter of same-sex marriage who on Thursday will be sworn in as the first Democrat to occupy the governor's office in 16 years. On Tuesday, before the constitutional convention, Mr. Patrick met with the House speaker and the Senate president, both Democrats, to urge them to find a way to defeat the amendment, even if it meant adjourning without voting on it.

"I believe that adults should be free to choose whom they wish to love and to marry," Mr. Patrick said, adding that he objected to using the constitutional amendment process "to give a minority fewer freedoms than the majority."

After the vote, Mr. Patrick said in a statement, "We have work to do over the next year to turn this around."

The new legislature taking office this month includes more supporters of same-sex marriage. But people on both sides of the issue said it was not clear if the balance had tipped enough to sideline the amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0110642

Ms. Isaacson and other gay rights activists have said that, should the initiative get on the 2008 ballot, they fear losing to an expensive campaign that would draw opponents from around the country. Polls in Massachusetts have generally found that just over half of the citizens surveyed supported same-sex marriage, but about the same number wanted the constitutional amendment to come before voters.

On Tuesday, scores of demonstrators lined the street outside the Statehouse and spilled into the building.

"I think it is going to get defeated next time around," said Lea Roy, 38, a supporter of same-sex marriage from Fitchburg who hopes to marry her girlfriend. "It's something you always dream about growing up — getting married. Then it's like, I'm gay and we're not allowed to get married."

But David Wilson, who, along with his partner, Rob Compton, was a plaintiff in the original lawsuit that legalized same-sex marriage, was less optimistic.

"It feels like the rug has been pulled out from under us," said Mr. Wilson, who has married Mr. Compton. "Maybe I'll feel better tomorrow, but today I feel like I've been shot."

Bea Martins, 63, an opponent of same-sex marriage from Fall River, said she was "very pleased" by the vote. As the initiative winds its way through the rest of the process, Ms. Martins said, "my counsel is we continue praying to the dear Lord for justice to be done."

Mass. Gay Marriage Law Contested (WP)

By Michael Powell And Robin Shulman

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Massachusetts legislators approved a measure yesterday that next year could allow voters to overturn a historic same-sex marriage law in the only state in the nation where such unions are legal.

A bitterly divided state legislature voted to advance a proposed amendment to the state constitution that defines marriage exclusively as a union between a man and a woman. If the measure survives another legislative vote, it will go on the statewide ballot in 2008, a presidential election year.

"It's in the best interests of children and society for marriage to be defined as between a man and woman," said Glen Lavy, a senior counsel with the Alliance Defense Fund, which strongly favors banning same-sex marriage. "The battle to preserve marriage in Massachusetts as between a man and a woman is alive and well."

Voters in 26 states have passed initiatives that effectively ban same-sex marriages. Voters in only one state -- Arizona -- have failed to approve such a ban.

Yesterday's vote fell like a hammer on gay-rights advocates, who have fought a half-decade-long war to gain the right to same-sex marriage in Massachusetts. In 2003 the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled that same-sex couples have a right to marry, and 8,000 couples have since done so.

No gay or lesbian activist involved in this struggle tried to portray yesterday's action as anything but a setback.

"It's a profoundly disappointing vote," said Matt Foreman, executive director of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force. "It's always wrong to put the rights of a minority up to a popular vote."

Only two years ago, Janet Lawn, 46, and her longtime partner, Maryann Chaisson, obtained a legal marriage. She recalls standing in their back yard as a Unitarian minister sounded the words: "By the power invested in me by the state of Massachusetts, I pronounce you married."

"The whole crowd erupted," Lawn recalled. "It was really wonderful on many levels having the dignity and respect to be able to say, 'I'm married.' "

And how does she feel now?

"Pretty awful," she says. "It's painful to have people think that it's okay to vote on the validity of my life and my marriage."

Both sides forecast a wrenching battle if the amendment goes on the ballot in 2008. The Catholic Church and various evangelical denominations have poured money and manpower into the effort. Outgoing Gov. Mitt Romney (R), a social conservative and a likely presidential candidate in 2008, has worked the telephones and has urged legislators to approve a vote on the proposed amendment.

"This is a huge victory for the people of Massachusetts," Romney said in a statement. "In a democracy, the voice of the people is sovereign."

It is by no means clear that Massachusetts voters will overturn the same-sex marriage law, even if they have the chance. In the last few years, a decided majority of state legislators -- and Gov.-elect Deval Patrick (D) -- have supported same-sex marriage and vowed to try to sink the proposed amendment in a legislative session later this year.

DOJ_NMG_0110643

A Boston Globe poll last year found that 56 percent of respondents said same-sex marriages should be allowed by law, a sharp increase from a year earlier. "It's going to be wrenching and divisive, but it's a fight the entire gay movement will take on," Foreman said.

Grounded in state law, yesterday's vote was a peculiar one. Once supporters obtain enough signatures, they send the proposed constitutional amendment to the legislature. Only 50 of the 185 legislators need to approve a proposed constitutional amendment in sessions in two consecutive years for it to be placed on the state ballot.

Sixty-two legislators wound up voting for the proposed amendment yesterday; 134 voted against it.

More than a few activists see a bitter battle ahead, and one that could resonate in a presidential election year. "The Republicans use gay marriage as an issue to mobilize their base," Foreman said. "But the reality is that marriage in Massachusetts hasn't caused the sky to fall. The Red Sox even won the World Series since then."

Same-sex 'Marriage' Measure Advances (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

Massachusetts lawmakers yesterday twice passed a proposed constitutional amendment to outlaw same-sex "marriage," bending to a recent court ruling that said they had a duty to vote on the measure.

The measure has to pass another joint legislative session before it can be placed on the November 2008 ballot, but yesterday's votes brought relief to supporters.

"Today's victory is about restoring the integrity and authority of the people's constitutional right to petition their government," said Kris Mineau, president of the Massachusetts Family Institute and spokesman for VoteOnMarriage.org, which led the 2005 petition drive that garnered 170,000 signatures in favor of the amendment.

The measure seeks to redefine marriage in Massachusetts as the union of one man and one woman, essentially ending homosexual "marriage" in the only state where it is legal. The amendment would not be retroactive, and would not affect the 8,764 same-sex couples who have "married" in the state, according to the Massachusetts Registry of Vital Records and Statistics.

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court legalized homosexual "marriage" in November 2003 with its decision in the Goodridge v. Department of Public Health case. The nation's first legal same-sex "marriages" were performed in May 2004.

Homosexual rights activists expressed dismay with yesterday's votes.

It will be a disaster if the amendment goes to the ballot, said Arline Isaacson, a leader of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus.

"The state will endure one of the nastiest and most divisive debates you've ever seen with the radical-right money pouring in and an anti-gay campaign of the likes people could not possibly imagine," she said.

Gov.-elect Deval Patrick, a Democrat who will be sworn in this week, also decried the measure.

"I believe a vote to advance this question to the 2008 ballot is irresponsible and wrong," he said. "It would do nothing more than condemn us all to more years of debate and expense on a matter that is legally and practically settled."

The joint session yesterday was the final chance for a vote on the marriage amendment. Twice last year, Democratic leaders ended joint legislative sessions without voting on the measure, and a failure to vote yesterday would have effectively killed it.

When lawmakers sidestepped the issue in their November session, amendment supporters, including outgoing Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican, took their grievance to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

On Dec. 27, the court unanimously ruled that lawmakers have a constitutional duty to take yes-or-no votes on the merits of pending citizen-initiative amendments, although, the justices added, they did not have the power to force a vote.

Shortly after opening yesterday's joint session, state Senate President Robert E. Travaglini called for a vote on the amendment. Although the vote was 132-61, with the majority against the amendment, it won because it needed only 25 percent approval, or 50 out of 200 votes.

Lawmakers later agreed to reconsider the matter and took another vote in the late afternoon. That vote 134-62 also upheld the amendment.

"I'm very proud that we took a vote," said Democratic state Sen. Susan C. Tucker, an amendment opponent, said later. "I think we owed the people that. At the same time, I'm also equally proud of my 'no' vote," she added.

Crowds of homosexual "marriage" supporters and opponents held rallies outside the State House.

"Legislators are sent to Beacon Hill to vote on a matter, not to not vote on a matter," said Paul Ferro, 30, one of the many proponents with a sign reading "Let the People Vote."

Opponents of the amendment stood on the opposite side of the street with banners reading "Let the people marry."

DOJ_NMG_0110644

In November, voters in seven states approved constitutional amendments to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman, bringing the number of states with such amendments to 27.

Qualcomm Under Scrutiny By Korean Antitrust Agency (NYT)

By CHOE SANG-HUN

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea, Jan. 2 — The South Korean antitrust agency has formed a task force to investigate the licensing and business practices of the wireless technology company Qualcomm, the latest in a string of legal battles for the company, officials said on Tuesday.

In Japan, Europe and the United States, Qualcomm, which is based in San Diego, faces accusations by rivals that it has abused its market dominance in wireless technology to demand excessive royalties and block fair competition.

Qualcomm is known for developing code-division multiple access, or CDMA, wireless technology, which is a rival standard to the global system for mobile communications, or GSM, technology. It makes money by selling chips that power cellphones, as well as collecting royalties or licensing its technology to other chip makers and cellphone manufacturers.

The creation of a task force, which is modeled after the one investigating antitrust complaints against Microsoft, means that the case in question merits a full-blown investigation, said Na Yang-ju, a spokesman for the South Korean antitrust watchdog agency, the Fair Trade Commission.

But commission officials also acknowledged that the case against Qualcomm was more complicated than they had expected. A year ago, the commission ruled that Microsoft was guilty of breaching fair trade rules, a decision the company is appealing.

"We have been investigating Qualcomm's case since last April but we have found it to be a complicated case where facts are difficult to establish," a commission investigator, Lee Seung-kyu, said.

South Korea is home to several leading mobile phone makers as well as smaller companies that provide technology and components. More than 80 percent of the country's 48 million people carry cellphones, all based on Qualcomm technology.

"Companies here have constantly complained about Qualcomm demanding too much royalty," said Kevin Lee, an industry analyst at Woori Investment and Securities in Seoul.

"The investigation can be seen as political pressure on Qualcomm to be more friendly toward South Korean companies which use its technology," Mr. Lee added.

Executives at the company said they had no comment because they had not yet received official queries from the Fair Trade Commission.

Investigators from the commission searched Qualcomm Korea's two offices in April, seeking data on Qualcomm's business dealings with Samsung, LG and Pantech.

Qualcomm Korea said it was standing by a statement issued in April by its parent that its "business practices are lawful and procompetitive."

The investigation into Qualcomm was set off last year by complaints from Nextreaming and Thin Multimedia, two South Korean companies that make software that allows cellphone users to download music, surf the Internet and display video over high-speed cellular networks.

Lim Il-tiek, president of Nextreaming, accused Qualcomm of undermining fair competition by bundling its multimedia software into its market-dominant cellphone chip sets.

Copyright Lawsuit Names Leading Technology Firms (NYT)

By JOHN MARKOFF And MIGUEL HELFT

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 2 — In 1997, Jonathan T. Taplin, a veteran film and television producer, stood up at a cable industry convention and asserted that in the future all movies would be distributed over the Internet. He recalls being laughed out of the room.

Mr. Taplin may laugh last. Online distribution of movies has arrived, at places like Apple Computer's iTunes Store. And even though Mr. Taplin's own video-on-demand company, Intertainer, shut down operations five years ago, it says it deserves some credit — and cash.

DOJ_NMG_0110645

Last week, Intertainer filed a broad lawsuit asserting that Apple, Google and Napster are infringing on a 2005 patent that covers the commercial distribution of audio and video over the Internet.

Founded by Mr. Taplin and two other Hollywood entertainment executives in 1996, Intertainer developed technology to distribute movies on demand through cable and phone lines for viewing on televisions and personal computers. It gained investors including Intel, Microsoft, Sony, NBC and Comcast.

"Intertainer was the leader of the idea of entertainment on demand over Internet platforms before Google was even thought up," said Mr. Taplin, now an adjunct professor at the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Southern California. He and a secretary constitute the entire remaining staff of Intertainer.

Theodore Stevenson, a partner at McKool Smith, the Dallas firm representing Intertainer, said the company filed suit against Apple, Google and Napster because they were perceived as leaders in the market for digital downloads. He declined to specify the damages that Intertainer was seeking.

Apple, Google and Napster all declined to comment on the lawsuit.

Intertainer's tale is somewhat different than other intellectual property suits brought by technology licensing firms. By 2002 the company seemed to have a growing business, with 125,000 Internet subscribers for its servers and 35,000 TV subscribers through the Comcast cable system.

But in the fall of 2002, the company shut down its service and filed a lawsuit against some of the backers of Movielink, a competitor backed by five Hollywood studios, including Sony, Universal and Warner Brother. At the time Mr. Taplin said the studios were using Movielink as a price-fixing vehicle to kill Intertainer.

An antitrust investigation by the Justice Department into Movielink was dropped in 2004.

The studios settled the lawsuit last March for an undisclosed sum, and Mr. Taplin said in a phone interview Tuesday that Intertainer would henceforth pursue a patent licensing business.

The company holds nine patents, including United States Patent No. 6,925,469, which was issued in 2005 and is intended to cover the management and distribution of digital media from various suppliers.

Despite initial backing from Microsoft and Intel, Mr. Taplin said the two companies were not involved in the decision to bring the Apple, Google and Napster lawsuit. He said that decision was made by Intertainer's board and that none of his original corporate backers have board seats. Several of the company's original investors have taken patent licenses, he said, but he would not name the companies.

Despite the company's decision to file the case in a federal district court in Texas that has traditionally looked favorably on plaintiffs in patent lawsuits, several digital media experts said that Intertainer might have a difficult time enforcing its patent because of its relatively recent filing date, in 2001.

By that time, for example, Real Networks, the Seattle-based pioneer in streaming digital media, had begun a Internet subscription service for digital content.

Legal experts said it was difficult to handicap Intertainer's claims. "There are so many of these lawsuits nowadays," said Eric Goldman, director the High-Tech Law Institute at Santa Clara University School of Law. "It is hard to figure out which ones are a serious threat and which one are not."

Mr. Goldman also said it was unclear what specific technology or service was covered by the Intertainer patent.

"I have the same problem with this patent as so many of the patents of the dot-com boom days: I don't know what it means," Mr. Goldman said.

Mr. Stevenson, the Intertainer lawyer, said the patent covers a system that can be used by content owners to upload their content and used by consumers to download it. "It is pretty basic to the architecture of digital content delivery nowadays," he said.

Mr. Taplin, who once worked as a road manager for Bob Dylan and produced several movies including "Mean Streets," "The Last Waltz" and "To Die For," has a history of activism on technology issues. In 2002, he encouraged those attending a technology conference to urge the Federal Communications Commission to ensure that broadband providers would not be able to block specific Web sites — an early version of a hot-button issue that has become known as network neutrality.

Earlier that year, he testified before the Senate against legislation that would have forced high-tech manufacturers to incorporate technology to prevent piracy in their software and hardware.

Nucor Agrees To Buy Harris Steel Of Canada For $1.07 Billion (NYT)

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

CHARLOTTE, N.C., Jan. 2 (AP) — The Nucor Corporation, the maker of steel products, said Tuesday that it had agreed to acquire the Harris Steel Group of Canada for $1.07 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0110646

Nucor, which makes steel from recycled metal at its minimill operations across the United States, said the deal would broaden its geographic reach and give it opportunities to grow.

Nucor bid 46.25 Canadian dollars ($39.69) for each Harris Steel share, a 6 percent premium over the Friday closing price of 43.49 Canadian dollars ($37.32) for Harris shares on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

Harris also had 123 million Canadian dollars ($105.5 million) in debt at the end of September.

The tender offer will be open for at least 35 days and has the support of the boards of both companies, Nucor said.

The companies said John Harris, chairman and chief executive of Harris Steel, and other members of the Harris family and Paul Kelly, Harris Steel's president and chief operating officer, agreed to tender their shares to Nucor, giving Nucor more than 50 percent of Harris Steel shares.

The two companies already have a partnership that dates from 2004, when Nucor paid $21 million to acquire a 50 percent stake in Harris's 11 reinforcing-steel-products operations in the United States.

Harris, based in North York, Ontario, has 23 additional plants in Canada.

The deal requires regulatory approval in the United States and Canada. Nucor, which is based in Charlotte, plans to allow Harris Steel to operate as a separate, wholly owned subsidiary once the deal is completed.

Nucor, which has operations in 18 states, expects the acquisition to bolster earnings immediately.

Shares of Harris rose 2.55 Canadian dollars, to 46.04 Canadian dollars ($39.51) on Tuesday. The New York Stock Exchange was closed Tuesday because of the day of mourning for former President Gerald R. Ford.

Nucor Bets On Finished Steel (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

With its $1.07 billion acquisition of Harris Steel Group Inc. in Canada, Nucor Corp. is breaking from its nonunion tradition and offering a glimpse of where it sees growth in the steel industry.

The move by the Charlotte, N.C., steelmaker also answers a question that has followed Nucor and other steelmakers: where to invest sizable cash reserves from three years of strong steel prices? With this deal, Nucor shows it sees opportunity in finishing steel products for its customers and in distribution rather than adding steelmaking capacity.

The deal comes amid rising concern by some in the steel industry over the potential for raw steelmaking overcapacity. Nucor had said fourth-quarter earnings would be less than expected because of lower shipments and prices.

While many large steel companies are buying other primary steelmakers around the world, Nucor -- which had $1.69 billion in cash on its balance sheet in the third quarter -- is focusing its investment and growth largely in North America's manufacturing infrastructure. Nucor said it sees the construction market growing, with increasing demand for bridges, tunnels, airports and hospitals.

Harris -- which fabricates steel into reinforced steel bar, platform grating and wire mesh for construction products ranging from bridges to airports and stadiums -- serves that market. The move "significantly advances Nucor's downstream growth initiatives," said Nucor Chairman and Chief Executive Dan DiMicco.

In a big challenge for Nucor, about half of Harris's 3,000 employees belong to a mix of ironworker, auto-worker and steelworker unions. Nucor is famously nonunion. "It's definitely a stretch for Nucor, culturally," said Timna Tanners, a steel analyst in New York with UBS Research. "They haven't been quiet about their distaste for unions over the years."

Nucor has managed to keep its other operations nonunion by offering higher salaries and production incentives. But Ms. Tanners suggests the company doesn't have many nonunion options left in North America when it comes to acquisitions and expansions. "We understand that opportunity comes with unions," says Nucor Executive Vice President Hamilton Lott.

Nucor had a joint venture with Harris, which also makes cold-drawn bar products used to make farm machinery, power tools and auto parts, for the past three years and already owned a 50% stake in Harris's U.S. rebar-fabrication division, which produces concrete-reinforcing bar -- a round and ridged bar product used in construction.

To buy the remaining interest in Harris, Nucor has offered 46.25 Canadian dollars (US$39.67) a share, a 6.3% premium to Harris's Friday close of C$43.49 on the Toronto Stock Exchange. The offer has the support of both companies' boards. Harris will keep its name, as a Nucor subsidiary, and be led by current Chairman and CEO John Harris. The Harris board, however, will consist of three Nucor representatives and Mr. Harris.

Harris reported net income of C$25.62 million in the third quarter and C$63.5 million in the first nine months of 2006. Sales totaled C$387 million in the third quarter and C$1.08 billion in the first nine months of 2006.

Previously, the largest acquisition Nucor made was the 2002 purchase of Birmingham Steel for about $615 million. In past decades, Nucor grew by building new steel minimills and shunned acquisitions. But, in recent years, consolidation swept the global steel industry and brought new competitors such as minimill competitor Gerdau SA, of Brazil, which acquired numerous minimills in the U.S. Nucor, in turn, has been acquiring smaller steel minimill operations that have come up for sale.

Gerdau Ameristeel, the North American subsidiary of Gerdau SA, and Dallas-based Commercial Metals Inc. are large players that produce rebar and deliver and install the material on job sites. Reinforcing bar is the largest business segment for Harris Steel, and Nucor now has a similar method of producing steel and distributing it all the way to construction sites.

In Brief Seminoles Face Lawsuit Over Hard Rock Deal (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Baltimore development firm Cordish Co. and affiliate Power Plant Entertainment LLC filed suit in Broward County Circuit Court in Florida, claiming the Seminole Tribe of Florida was able to buy the Hard Rock chain of cafes and casinos through collusion and bid rigging. The plaintiffs allege Hard Rock Cafe International Inc. management secretly negotiated with the Seminoles for seven months before plans to sell were announced in July. Power Plant, a partnership between Cordish and Coastal Development LLC, was the original developer of two Seminole Hard Rock casinos and hotels in Tampa and Hollywood, Florida. The Seminoles last month agreed to buy the chain for $965 million from the U.K.'s Rank Group PLC. In a statement, the Seminoles accused Cordish of being "a sore loser" and insisted the deal went through "a lengthy and open bidding process." They said the lawsuit "has no merit." Rank Group shareholders are scheduled Monday to vote on the sale.

Inquirer Begins Layoffs

The Philadelphia Inquirer began a round of long-expected layoffs amid a drop in circulation and ad revenue. In all, 68 newsroom employees were expected to be laid off, a company spokesman said. The Inquirer and the Philadelphia Daily News were purchased for $562 million by Philadelphia Media Holdings, an investment group led by Brian Tierney, a former advertising executive who is now the papers' chief executive and publisher. In November, Mr. Tierney announced that layoffs in the 415-worker newsroom were unavoidable. Layoffs aren't expected at the Daily News.

Starbucks Trims Fats

Starbucks Corp. is cutting trans fats from the doughnuts, muffins and other treats in half of its U.S. stores, and plans to eventually drop the artery-clogging fats from all company-operated U.S. coffeehouses. Spokesman Brandon Borrman said the Seattle company's standalone stores in Seattle, San Francisco, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Diego, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington and Portland, Ore., will have no trans fats in their food as of today. In December, New York became the first American city to ban artificial trans fats in restaurants and eateries. With some exceptions, restaurants will be barred from using spreads and frying oils containing artificial trans fats by July 1.

Protecting Internet Democracy (NYT)

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

One of the big winners in the last election may turn out to be the principle, known as net neutrality, that Internet service providers should not be able to favor some content over others. Democrats who are moving into the majority in Congress — led by Ron Wyden in the Senate and Edward Markey in the House — say they plan to fight hard to pass a net neutrality bill, and we hope that they do. It is vital to preserve the Internet's role in promoting entrepreneurship and free expression.

Internet users now get access to any Web site on an equal basis. Foreign and domestic sites, big corporate home pages and little-guy blogs all show up on a user's screen in the same way when their addresses are typed into a browser. Anyone who puts up a Web page can broadcast it to the world.

Cable and telephone companies are talking, however, about creating a two-tiered Internet with a fast lane and a slow lane. Companies that pay hefty fees would have their Web pages delivered to Internet users in the current speedy fashion. Companies and individuals that do not would be relegated to the slow lane.

Creating these sorts of tiers would destroy the democratic quality of the Internet. Big, wealthy voices would start to overpower the smaller, poorer ones. Innovation would be threatened if start-ups and small companies could not afford the new fees. The next eBay or Google might never be born.

A net neutrality law would require cable and telephone companies to continue to provide Web sites to Internet users on an equal basis. Mr. Markey, of Massachusetts, will be taking over a key subcommittee that handles Internet issues. He has promised to hold hearings to educate Congress and the public, and to reintroduce his strong net neutrality bill. Mr. Wyden, of Oregon, plans to reintroduce an equally solid bill in the Senate.

Passing the legislation will not be easy. The cable and telephone companies have fought net neutrality with a lavishly financed and misleading lobbying campaign, because they stand to gain an enormous windfall. But there is growing support from individuals and groups across the political spectrum, from MoveOn.org to the Gun Owners of America, who worry about what will happen to their free speech if Internet service providers are allowed to pick and choose the traffic they carry.

DOJ_NMG_0110648

In the last week, there was a limited but important victory for net neutrality. As a condition of approving the AT&T-BellSouth merger, the Federal Communications Commission required AT&T to guarantee net neutrality on its broadband service for the next two years. The commission was right to extract this concession, but it should not be necessary to negotiate separate deals like this one. On the information superhighway, net neutrality should be a basic rule of the road.

Dge To Decide Dispute Over Fort Reno Land (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

EL RENO, Okla. — A federal judge in Washington will decide whether the federal government wrongfully took about 7,000 acres of land belonging to the Cheyenne-Arapaho Tribes of Oklahoma.

Attorneys for the Cheyenne-Arapaho filed an 18-page response on Friday to the government's motion to dismiss the tribes' lawsuit over the land. The tribes want to do oil exploration on the land and use it for development of retail, offices and possibly a casino, Cheyenne-Arapaho Gov. Darrell Flyingman said.

"It's valuable land," he said. "There's hundreds of oil and gas wells right around Fort Reno. That's one of the reasons they're trying to keep it."

In 1869, the Cheyenne-Arapaho were moved from Colorado onto 5 million acres west of Oklahoma City. Fourteen years later, a presidential order whittled 9,000 acres off their reservation to create Fort Reno. The tribes believe the land was to revert to them when the government no longer needed it for military purposes.

When the cavalry abandoned the post in 1908, it became a "remount station," where horses and mules were raised and trained for the military. When the remount station closed in 1954, the government announced the property would be set aside for possible military use.

James M. Upton, the Justice Department attorney representing the government, did not reply to messages seeking comment.

According to the government, which is seeking to dismiss the tribes' lawsuit, the Cheyenne-Arapaho claim on the land died in 1891, when the reservation was allotted and the tribes signed an agreement ceding the remaining 400,000 acres, which then were opened to non-Indian settlement.

The tribes say they never ceded the Fort Reno land and that the government remained bound to its promise to return it to them when no longer needed for military use.

"It's our land. We never gave it up," Flyingman said.

The tribes received 2 cents per acre in 1891, then $15 million more in 1965 after filing a lawsuit under the Indian Claims Commission Act, which was designed to correct past injustices in land dealings with Indian tribes.

The tribes say the payment covered the rest of the old reservation, excluding the Fort Reno land.

A bill in Congress, the Fort Reno Mineral Leasing Act, would've authorized the Agriculture Department secretary to open the land to oil and gas exploration.

The measure, co-sponsored by Sen. Jim Inhofe, R-Okla., died when the 109th Congress adjourned Dec. 9, but Flyingman suspects it will be re-introduced in the coming session.

"We have a big fight on our hands. We're taking on the Oklahoma delegation plus the oil companies," he said.

In a statement in November, Inhofe, said the measure "... allows USDA to lease the property, while at the same time allowing some of the funds from the leasing to be put toward renovating and maintaining the historic buildings at Fort Reno."

Since 1948, the U.S. Department of Agriculture has operated a research station at Fort Reno and hosted Historic Fort Reno, a nonprofit organization that runs the old fort as a historic site.

Should the tribes prevail, Flyingman said both will be invited to stay.

Feds Alter Timetable For Trial In Reactor Case (TOLB)

By Tom Henry, BLADE STAFF WRITER

Toledo Blade (OH), January 3, 2007

Davis-Besse trio charged with lying

Federal prosecutors veered off their timetable for having criminal charges against two former Davis-Besse engineers and a contractor heard in U.S. District Court by the end of this fall - partly because of the complexity of the case, and partly because of recent finger-pointing among the trio.

The case now may be split into at least two trials.

DOJ_NMG_0110649

Defendants Andrew Siemaszko, of Spring, Texas; David Geisen, of DePere, Wis., and Rodney N. Cook, of Millington, Tenn., face up to five years in prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted on charges of making false statements to a federal agency.

Mr. Siemaszko and Mr. Geisen are former Davis-Besse engineers. Mr. Cook is a contractor who had been associated with the Ottawa County nuclear plant for years.

Each is accused of jeopardizing northern Ohio's safety five years ago by lying about Davis-Besse's old reactor head when the Nuclear Regulatory Commission was debating whether the plant was too dangerous to keep operating in the fall of 2001.

Siemaszko

Zoom | Photo Reprints The NRC, based on what it learned in subsequent months, said acid melted so much steel off the massive lid that it nearly blew open and allowed radioactive steam to form in containment for the first time since the partial meltdown of Three Mile Island Unit 2 in 1979.

The agency ultimately said there's no question FirstEnergy Corp., in hindsight, should have shut down the plant at least six weeks earlier than it did on Feb. 16, 2002.

Sometime early this year, Judge David Katz of U.S. District Court in Toledo is expected to hear arguments about keeping the case as one trial or splitting it into two.

U.S. Department of Justice attorneys want one trial. Mr. Siemaszko's attorneys have asked for their case to be heard separately from Mr. Geisen and Mr. Cook, and vice versa.

All defendants claim in separate filings that the government's case centers around five letters that FirstEnergy sent to the NRC in the fall of 2001.

None of the three defendants signed the letters. But all are alleged to have helped prepare or approve the information in them.

Based on conflicting information about their roles, a jury "could disbelieve all three of the defendants but, if tried together, it cannot believe all three defendants," a brief from the Siemaszko defense team said.

It claims "his former colleagues are now severely antagonistic towards him and accuse him of providing them the information submitted and upon which they relied."

A brief from the attorneys representing Mr. Geisen and Mr. Cook said their clients have likewise been victims of antagonistic behavior on the part of Mr. Siemaszko, and claim that statements he has made about them to investigators are false.

Chuck Boss, a Maumee attorney and part of Mr. Siemaszko's defense team, said he believes his client's case would go first if the judge grants two trials.

"The defenses of these people are diametrically opposed to one another. They're 180 degrees apart." Chuck Boss, a Maumee attorney on Andrew Siemaszko's defense team Mr. Siemaszko has been held up as a whistle-blower by the Union of Concerned Scientists and Ohio Citizen Action.

Both groups maintain that he is being punished for trying to shed light on Davis-Besse's problems.

In September, Mr. Siemaszko sued FirstEnergy for wrongful termination and breach of contract in Ottawa County Commons Pleas Court. That case also is pending.

Federal court records claim both sides believe neither can get a fair trial if the criminal cases are heard together. Jury selection for a single trial has been tentatively scheduled for April 16, although that date is subject to change if two trials are granted.

Mr. Siemaszko's attorneys also are trying to subpoena FirstEnergy computer records that they consider vital to his defense.

Cynthia Magnuson, Justice Department spokesman, last week reiterated the government's policy of declining comment on pending litigation.

Mr. Geisen's attorney, Richard Hibey, of Washington, had little to say beyond acknowledging that motions are to be heard. Mr. Cook's attorney, John Conroy, also of Washington, could not be reached for comment.

Last January, FirstEnergy Corp. was handed a $28 million fine, the largest in U.S. nuclear history, for its corporate role in covering up evidence about Davis-Besse's old reactor head.

Indictments were announced the same day against the trio. They are the only current or former employees to be charged. Federal prosecutors said at the time they expected either to get pleas from the three defendants or have their cases heard by late fall 2006.

The government wound up asking for more time. It cited the complexity of the case and its 20,000-plus documents.

Bush Tipped To Talk Tough On Energy But Snub Kyoto (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Energy will be a central theme of President George W. Bush's state of the union speech this month, as it was in last year's address when he briefly caught national attention with the claim that the country was "addicted to oil".

But his critics doubt that he will do much more than call for more spending on alternative fuels, and again fail to embrace international efforts to agree a post-Kyoto regime to tackle greenhouse emissions.

"We've had the hydrogen economy, then alternative fuels, and 'addicted to oil'," said a senior industry lobbyist. "Yet on close Senate votes, such as drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, he has not put his prestige on the line by making personal calls. Energy policy has been the creation of Congress. Almost anything Bush says in the speech is irrelevant the day after he says it."

The administration rejects that, with one senior official noting: "It's a lot more than rhetorical: what was done with the 2005 act was substantial." Mr Bush has identified energy as a key area for bipartisan co-operation in the next two years.

Al Hubbard, chairman of the National Economic Council, who is co-ordinating White House energy policy, has also raised expectations. In a speech at De Pauw University he predicted "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence".

"One of the challenges is how they differentiate themselves from last year," warned Spencer Abraham, energy secretary in Mr Bush's first term. "You have had a big commitment to hydrogen and to ethanol. We thought $1.7bn over five years on hydrogen was big bucks but it was seen as insufficient by our critics. Maybe $10bn is enough to get attention. But the question is whether it is actually implemented by Congress."

Current and former administration officials admit that the $2bn announced last year in loan guarantees for alternative fuels, such as clean coal technologies, has been snarled in bureaucracy. The deadline for applications has now been extended.

Growing concern from US executives was underscored in the report last month from the Energy Security Leadership Council, a high-profile group of executives and retired generals. They called for increasing the supply of domestic oil but also giving more attention to energy efficiency, notably raising Corporate Average Fuel Economy standards, designed to improve vehicle fuel efficiency by 4 per cent annually.

The latter would be popular. According to a recent Wall Street Journal poll, 74 per cent of Republicans would support higher standards even if it increased vehicle prices. A Democratic aide on the House energy committee said: "Doing something meaningful on vehicle fuel efficiency would be a major step forward for this administration."

Robert Hormats, vice-chairman at Goldman Sachs and a leadership council member, briefed senior White House officials, including Mr Hubbard, on the report. "Discussion was most extensive in alternative sources of energy and the idea of additional drilling," he said. "There was some discussion of Cafe standards, but the point was if they prove to be technologically undoable, they are harmful."

Another participant at the meeting said: "It was not just a courtesy meeting. They were most interested in the specifics and why 4 per cent was chosen as an annual increase, and whether the group would seriously engage or go back to running their companies."

Mr Hormats told the Financial Times that he would like to see Mr Bush create a commission, using the council as a prototype, "with both financial and military people to develop critical mass to address this issue, like Alan Greenspan did in 1983 with social security."

There is some optimism that the White House could move on Cafe standards. David Conover, director of the US Climate Change Technology Programme until February, said: "It is conceivable that he could endorse a set of principles giving him administrative flexibility to set Cafe standards, but more likely it will be a call on Congress to respond to his 10-month request to strengthen standards."

Such a move could bolster Mr Bush's credibility on energy but would face a difficult vote in Congress, given the lobbying power of car makers and the fact that John Dingell, who represents Detroit, will chair the House energy committee. In December Bob Lutz, vice-chairman of General Motors, warned that changing the standards would in effect "hand the truck and SUV market over to the imports, particularly the Japanese".

There are fewer hopes of an administration shift on climate change. In spite of pressure from leaders such as Tony Blair, the British prime minister, senior officials resist deeper engagement on limiting greenhouse gas emissions after the Kyoto protocol ends in 2012, and remain privately dismissive of the conclusions in the British Stern report on global warming, which called for 1 per cent of gross domestic product to be spent on fighting climate change.

US Reliance On Opec Highest In 15 Years (FT)

By Ed Crooks And Javier Blas

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110651

US dependence on the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries for its oil imports has risen to its highest level in 15 years, following Angola's arrival this week as the 12th member of the oil producers' group.

Angola's entry was agreed at the Opec meeting in Abuja, Nigeria, last month, and was formalised on Monday. The African country is the first new member to join the oil cartel since 1975.

The move comes at a time when Opec is trying to exert more influence, as seen in its decision at the December meeting to cut 500,000 barrels a day from its output from February.

Including Angola, Opec now supplies more than 54 per cent of the oil imports of the developed countries, its highest level for five years. For the US, the increase is even sharper: at more than 52 per cent, Opec's share of US oil imports is at its highest since 1992.

Angola is particularly significant because it is one of the fastest-growing producers. Reasonable projections suggested it would have provided about a quarter of the total increase in non-Opec oil production this year.

Important new fields developed by Total of France, Chevron and Exxon Mobil of the US, and BP of the UK are either just coming on stream or are expected to begin producing in the next couple of years. That is helping to lift Angola's production from about 1.45m b/d towards the end of last year to an expected 2m b/d by the end of this year. The World Bank expects production to peak at 2.6m b/d in 2011 – more than the current output of Nigeria, Africa's biggest producer.

However, Angola's entry into Opec is unlikely to have much impact on the price of oil. It has yet to agree a production limit with the group, and Opec officials have suggested that its planned production increase is likely to be accommodated by the group. As a result, the global balance of supply and demand is not expected to change. As one Opec official put it: "It is just a question of moving Angola's production from one column into the other."

Edward Morse, chief energy economist of Lehman Brothers, suggested Angola's entry could cause problems for the group.

"For Opec it implies greater overall market share for the producer group, but at the cost of uncertainty over Angola's eventual compliance with a quota that has as yet to be assigned. It certainly makes Saudi efforts to control the group's overall production more tenuous."

Mr Morse added that maintaining discipline could be more difficult because Angola had a record of paying "lip service only" to production agreements.

That assessment was echoed by Rafael Morais, an Angolan freelance journalist, who suggested that the government could want to join Opec for "a kind of cartel's protection, leverage and a sort of club's prestige" while not necessarily wanting to abide by all its rules.

He said: "It can join Opec and still produce as much as it wants and sell at pleasure through non-transparent channels. It's like having the cake and eating it too."

Gansler Vows 'All-Out Assault' On Bay Polluters (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Douglas F. Gansler, Montgomery County's longtime prosecutor, pledged an "all-out assault" on those who pollute the Chesapeake Bay as he was sworn into office yesterday as Maryland's first new attorney general in two decades.

In the Senate's marbled chamber in Annapolis, where the outgoing Republican governor administered the oath of office, Gansler, a Democrat, ticked off a list of the estuary's environmental woes. He cited swimming bans at Sandy Point State Park in Annapolis and declining oyster harvests, saying, "Some fish don't even know if they're boys or girls anymore -- it's gotten that bad.

"We're going to wage an all-out assault on those who pollute our air and water," Gansler said.

The pledges echoed campaign promises that helped carry Gansler to a comfortable victory in November in his bid to fill the seat left vacant by J. Joseph Curran Jr., a fellow Democrat who, after two decades as the state's chief legal officer, decided not to run for another term.

Gansler, 44, had been Montgomery state's attorney since 1998. He drew attention last year by winning convictions against John Allen Muhammad and Lee Boyd Malvo, the snipers who terrorized the region in 2002.

Despite the dire proclamations about the health of the bay, yesterday's ceremony in many respects had the feeling of a family affair. Gansler spoke of his wife, Laura, and their two sons, who, he jokingly said, did not understand the concept of spending $2 million to win a job that pays $125,000 a year.

The ceremony was emceed by Gansler's father, an undersecretary of defense in the Clinton administration, who shares his son's gift for ease with public speaking.

"Tell a joke," Gansler called out to his father as the crowd waited for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. to arrive.

DOJ_NMG_0110652

Jacques S. Gansler did not exactly tell a joke, but laughter rippled across the chamber as he spoke of his efforts years ago at the Pentagon to start meetings on time. The elder Gansler spoke of close media scrutiny -- "abuse from the press," he called it -- and said public service is often not rewarding.

"I'm so pleased that my son's willing to take that kind of responsibility on," he said.

Ehrlich, who leaves office this month, arrived a moment later to administer the oath to Gansler. Afterward, Gansler and the governor shared a hug and patted each other on the back.

In his address, Gansler said he was "very, very, very honored" that Ehrlich participated in the ceremony. "I look forward to being your lawyer for the next two weeks," Gansler told the governor.

Gansler also paid tribute to Curran, whom he described as a "wonderful person" of uncommon popularity. "Nobody can serve 48 years in public service and be beloved as he is," Gansler told Curran.

Curran, who praised Gansler, said that he is not sure what he will do next but that he has been approached about leading the Injured Workers' Insurance Fund, a quasi-state agency whose director stepped down last week. "As one door shuts, another one opens," Curran said.

With its staff of 420 lawyers, the attorney general's office acts as the legal counsel to many institutions of state government. It also represents the government in all cases in state and federal appellate courts. In addition, it has the power to prosecute a range of criminal activity, including white-collar crimes, health-care fraud and multi-jurisdictional crimes.

Gansler has promised to take an "activist approach" to the job. In addition to standard fare such as consumer protection and antitrust matters, he said in an interview that he plans to push legislators to enact a racketeering law that would give state prosecutors powers similar to those that federal prosecutors have used to fight gangs.

He said he will also establish an antigang task force that could work with local state's attorneys on those cases, which generally involve multiple defendants and are resource-intensive.

On the environment, Gansler singled out coal-burning power plants, saying that they tend to be in less-affluent areas and are responsible for respiratory ailments that disproportionately affect African Americans.

In an approach that underscores his pledge to use the power of his office in innovative ways, Gansler said the prevalence of those ailments should be viewed as a civil rights issue, one that could presumably be addressed in court.

Gansler, whose election has also been seen as emblematic of the diffusion of political power once centralized in Baltimore, said he will move one division of the office, fewer than 20 lawyers, to a location not yet selected in the Washington suburbs.

As Costs Of Wildfires Grow, So Does A Question: Who Should Pay? (NYT)

By Kirk Johnson

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

DENVER, Jan. 2 — The steeply rising cost of preventing and suppressing wildfires, which burned more of the American landscape in 2006 than in any other year since at least 1960, is creating a rift between Washington and state and local governments over how the burden ought to be shouldered.

The scorched landscape adjoining a residential development near Los Angeles bears witness to a fire last month that gutted five houses.

A study issued in November by the inspector general's office of the United States Department of Agriculture, the parent agency of the Forest Service, said the nature of the wildfire threat was changing as private homes and communities pushed ever closer to the boundaries of once-remote public lands. Those communities and landowners, rather than federal taxpayers, should have to pay for more of their own fire protection, the report concluded.

States and local governments are gearing up to fight back in Congress, arguing that decades of federal mismanagement of national forests and open spaces, not development, created the threat and that little communities with few resources are neither responsible for it nor equipped to make a difference.

The pattern of wildfire distribution during the recently ended fire season, which charred more than 9.8 million acres, supports either side. According to federal statistics, more state, county and private lands burned than in any other year since 1997 — about half the total 2006 losses — primarily because of monstrous blazes in Oklahoma, in Texas and across the Upper Plains, regions where most property is privately owned.

That finding, though also driven by broader factors like drought and heat that have little to do with residential development in fire-prone areas, supports the federal contention that the government has had to shift an increasingly large share of its resources from the task of protecting its own forests to firefighting elsewhere.

In some places, though, the issue is more complex. In Stillwater County, Mont., north of Yellowstone National Park, for example, the small, long-established towns of Nye and Fishtail are bordered on two sides by national forest. In early July, the first of two huge fires erupted in the forest and roared into those communities, where 100,000 acres of mostly private land and 32 homes were burned. The blaze was the worst in the county's history, local officials say.

"The forest is very dry and primed for fires started by lightning, and when that occurs in a forest not managed as well as it could have been, it soon gets out of control and meets the community," said Ken Mesch, the Stillwater County disaster and emergency services coordinator. "If the federal government started pulling back money for fire suppression, they would be hanging us out to dry."

Federal land managers say protection of private land at the boundaries of public space — called the wildland-urban interface — is the fastest-growing component of the nation's firefighting budget. In 2003 and 2004, the inspector general's report estimated, the Forest Service spent at least half a billion dollars, and perhaps as much as a billion, protecting private property in such areas.

The trend is similar at the Interior Department, which oversees hundreds of millions of acres of public lands in the West through the Bureau of Land Management, the Fish and Wildlife Service, and the National Park Service. Fire prevention activities — controlled fires or thinning of burnable vegetation — have shifted there toward the interface lands, said Lynn Scarlett, deputy interior secretary.

Ms. Scarlett said that almost half the 1.1 million acres treated by the Interior Department for fire-risk reduction in 2006 were in interface zones, about double the proportion as recently as 2002. She said her department, too, was considering that it demand increased cost-sharing by state and local governments, though she emphasized that any outcome would have to be collaborative.

"One of the last things you want in an emergency is people squabbling over who's going to pay," she said.

The report from the Agriculture Department's inspector general said a major problem was simply the weight of accumulated assumptions: fire response in the West has long meant federal authorities' riding to the rescue, with no questions asked and no cost too great to bear.

"Public expectations and uncertainties about protection responsibilities," the report said, "compel the Forest Service to suppress fires aggressively and at great expense when private property is at risk, even when fires pose little threat to National Forest system land."

About 8.5 million homes were built at the wildland-urban interface within the interior West in the 1990s alone, according to the Forest Service. But state and local officials say they already pay their share to protect those communities and homeowners, partly because the residential growth has coincided with years of federal budget cuts. Arizona, for instance, now has 12 to 14 air tanker firefighting aircraft under contract, up from 2 to 4 in 2005, as a result of reduced federal spending on tankers, said Lori Faeth, a policy adviser to Gov. Janet Napolitano.

"Our forests are in the condition they are because of poor federal management," Ms. Faeth said. "They've put us in this position, and they have the responsibility to pay for it."

The Forest Service's director of fire and aviation management, Tom Harbour, said the agency would follow up on the inspector general's recommendations. "We're not going to walk away," Mr. Harbour said, "but we will engage in a vigorous debate with our partners about the right way to split the pie."

Still, money is only part of the issue, he said. Communities and developers in the West should be thinking in new ways as well, he said, including the use of fire-wise construction techniques and preparedness plans that involve residents in their own defense even before fires start.

Many land experts say hardly anyone is addressing the most tangled and emotional question raised by the debate: how much or how little voice federal land managers should have in land-use decisions.

"Thinking through in advance the fire implications of a new subdivision next to a national forest boundary — that doesn't happen," said James L. Caswell, administrator of the Idaho Office of Species Conservation.

Given the property rights issue and the tension between local governments and Washington that has shaped the West's culture for the last century, a system of planning that allows federal officials veto power would seem unlikely.

Mr. Caswell said better planning must be part of the solution. "A thousand houses next to a boundary could overwhelm all the other cost-control issues," he said.

"But," he added, "that's a very emotional topic, so it's really hard to deal with."

Hurricane Expert Mayfield Warns Of Potential Disaster (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110654

MIAMI, Florida — Frustrated with people and politicians who refuse to listen or learn, National Hurricane Center chief Max Mayfield ends his 34-year government career tomorrow in search of a new platform for getting his unwelcome message: Hurricane Katrina was nothing compared to The Big One yet to come.

Mayfield, 58, leaves his high-profile job with the National Weather Service more convinced than ever that U.S. residents of the Southeast are risking unprecedented tragedy by continuing to build vulnerable homes in the tropical storm zone and failing to plan escape routes.

He pointed to the 7 million coastal residents of southern Florida.

"We're eventually going to get a strong enough storm in a densely populated area to have a major disaster," he said. "I know people don't want to hear this, and I'm generally a very positive person, but we're setting ourselves up for this major disaster."

More than 1,300 deaths across the Gulf Coast were attributed to Hurricane Katrina, the worst human toll from a weather event in the United States since the 1920s.

But Mayfield warns that 10 times as many fatalities could occur in what he sees as an inevitable strike by a killer storm during the current highly active hurricane cycle, which is expected to last another 10 to 20 years.

His apocalyptic vision of tens of thousands dead and millions homeless is a different side of the persona he established as head of the hurricane center.

Mayfield attained national celebrity status during the tempestuous 2004 and 2005 seasons, appearing on network television with hourly updates as hurricanes Charley, Ivan, Frances and Wilma bore down on the Caribbean and the U.S. Southeast. His calm demeanor and avuncular sincerity endeared him to millions of TV viewers seeking survival guidance.

And he argues that his own dire predictions don't have to become reality.

The technology exists to build high-rise buildings capable of withstanding hurricane-force winds and tropical storm surge even more powerful than experienced in the past few years. Much of Hong Kong's architecture has been built to survive typhoons, and hotels and apartments built in Kobe, Japan, after a 1995 earthquake devastated the city are touted as indestructible, he said.

What is lacking in the United States is the political will to make and impose hard decisions on building codes and land use in the face of resistance from the influential building industry and a public still willing to gamble that the big one will never hit, he said.

"It's good for the tax base" to allow developers to put up buildings on the coastline, Mayfield said in explaining politicians' reluctance to deter housing projects that expose residents to storm risks.

"I don't want the builders to get mad at me," he said, "but the building industry strongly opposes improvement in building codes."

Consumers also have yet to demand sturdier construction, Mayfield added. A builder gets a better return on investment in upgraded carpet and appliances than for safety features above and beyond most states' minimal requirements, he said.

As a senior civil servant, Mayfield was prohibited from making job inquiries in the private sector while still in the government's employ. But he said on Tuesday, his last day in office, that he hopes to launch a second career as a consultant in emergency planning and disaster response. He has particular interest in a potential public-private initiative to mine natural disaster scenes for their educational value.

He envisions a natural disaster assessment service equivalent to the National Transportation Safety Board that probes the causes and consequences of aviation and other transport accidents.

Mayfield said he is also pondering collaboration with advocates of tougher building standards and land use regulations.

One particularly disturbing statistic he cites is that even after the devastating hurricane seasons of 2004 and 2005, fewer than 50 percent of those living in storm-prone areas make plans for evacuating in the event of an approaching hurricane.

While he has been critical off the Federal Emergency Management Agency in its response to Katrina's devastation of New Orleans, he warns against depending too heavily on the federal government after natural disasters.

"You don't want the federal government to be your first-responders," he said. "The government can't do everything for people and it shouldn't or else you create a culture of dependence."

Mayfield praises the Florida state government for a well-oiled disaster response program and steps toward improving building safety, in contrast with other states along the Gulf of Mexico that he says still have no statewide building standards.

At the hurricane center on the Florida International University campus, Mayfield will be succeeded by Bill Proenza, the National Weather Service's director for the southern region.

Though Mayfield's name and face recognition are the envy of some presidential hopefuls, he laughs out loud at the notion of running for office.

"Oh, good gosh, no! That is just not my thing," he says.

At the hurricane center on the Florida International University campus, Mayfield will be succeeded by Bill Proenza, the National Weather Service's director for the Southern region. Home to 77 million, the region has "the most active and severe weather in the world," according to the weather service's parent agency, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Proenza, 62, began his meteorological career at the Miami office as an intern in 1963. As director of 50 regional offices and 1,000 employees in the Southern region for the last eight years, he has long experience collaborating with the hurricane center staff on forecasts and tracking.

"That's why I don't have any problem walking out the door," said Mayfield, declaring himself fearful that the mild 2006 hurricane season left those in the storm zone ever more complacent.

Polar Bear Politics (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Unless you've been hibernating for the winter, you have no doubt heard the many alarms about global warming. Now even the Bush Administration is getting into the act, at least judging from last week's decision by Interior Secretary Dirk Kempthorne to recommend that the majestic polar bear be listed as "threatened" under the Endangered Species Act. The closer you inspect this decision, however, the more it looks like the triumph of politics over science.

"We are concerned," said Mr. Kempthorne, that "the polar bears' habitat may literally be melting" due to warmer Arctic temperatures. However, when we called Interior spokesman Hugh Vickery for some elaboration, he was a lot less categorical, even a tad defensive. The "endangered" designation is based less on the actual number of bears in Alaska than on "projections into the future," Mr. Vickery said, adding that these "projection models" are "tricky business."

Apparently so, because there are in fact more polar bears in the world now than there were 40 years ago, as the nearby chart shows. The main threat to polar bears in recent decades has been from hunting, with estimates as low as 5,000 to 10,000 bears in the 1950s and 1960s. But thanks to conservation efforts, and some cross-border cooperation among the U.S., Canada and Russia, the best estimate today is that the polar bear population is 20,000 to 25,000.

It also turns out that most of the alarm over the polar bear's future stems from a single, peer-reviewed study, which found that the bear population had declined by some 250, or 25%, in Western Hudson Bay in the last decade. But the polar bear's range is far more extensive than Hudson Bay. A 2002 U.S. Geological Survey of wildlife in the Arctic Refuge Coastal Plain concluded that the ice bear populations "may now be near historic highs." One of the leading experts on the polar bear, Mitchell Taylor, the manager of wildlife resources for the Nunavut territory in Canada, has found that the Canadian polar bear population has actually increased by 25% -- to 15,000 from 12,000 over the past decade. * * *

Mr. Taylor tells us that in many parts of Canada, "polar bears are very abundant and productive. In some areas, they are overly abundant. I understand that people not living in the North generally have difficulty grasping the concept of too many polar bears, but those who live here have a pretty good grasp of what that is like." Those cuddly white bears are the Earth's largest land carnivores.

There is no doubt that higher temperatures threaten polar bear habitat by melting sea ice. Mr. Kempthorne also says he had little choice because the threshold for triggering a study under the Endangered Species Act is low. The Bush Administration was sued by the usual environmental suspects to make this decision, which means that Interior will now conduct a year-long review before any formal listing decision is made.

Nonetheless, the bears seem to have survived despite many other severe warming and cooling periods over the last few thousands of years. Polar bears are also protected from poaching and environmental damage by the Marine Mammal Protection Act, so there is little extra advantage to the bears themselves from an "endangered" classification.

All of which suggests that the real story here is a human one, namely about the politics of global warming. Once a plant or animal is listed under the Endangered Species Act, the government must also come up with an elaborate plan to protect its habitat. If the polar bear is endangered by warmer temperatures, then the environmentalist demand will be that the government do something to address that climate change. Faster than you can say Al Gore, this would lead to lawsuits and cries in Congress demanding federal mandates to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Think we're exaggerating? No sooner had Mr. Kempthorne announced his study than Kassie Siegel of something called the Center for Biological Diversity told the New York Times that "even this Administration" would not be able to "write this proposal without acknowledging that the primary threat to polar bears is global warming and without acknowledging the science of global warming." Her outfit was one of those who had sued the feds in the first place over the polar bears, notwithstanding its location in the frozen tundra of Arizona. But no matter. For want of a few hundred polar bears, the entire U.S. economy could be vulnerable to judicial dictation. * * *

With that much at stake, Mr. Kempthorne could have shown a stiffer backbone in resisting this political pressure. At the very least he now has an obligation to ensure that Interior's year-long study be based on real science and the actual polar bear population, rather than rely on computer projections. Any government decision to limit greenhouse gases deserves to be debated in the open, where the public can understand the consequences, not legislated by the back door via the Endangered Species Act.

A Light Bulb Goes On (NYT)

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Bad habits can be hard to break. So it's great news that Wal-Mart is putting its considerable heft behind one of the easiest ways to reduce energy consumption and the production of global-warming gases: the corkscrew-shaped light bulbs of the future.

Light bulbs don't have tailpipes to remind us that their use adds to pollution. But more than half of the nation's electricity comes from coal-burning plants. Switching from familiar bulbs to longer-lasting, energy-saving compact fluorescent lamps makes sense economically and environmentally.

As Michael Barbaro reported in The Times yesterday, Wal-Mart is pushing to sell 100 million compact fluorescents a year. Because they use 75 percent less electricity, that would save customers $3 billion on their electricity bills and save the world from 20 million metric tons of greenhouse gases.

But it will also take a lot of work to persuade consumers to make the change. There's the strange shape and the general lack of familiarity, of course, but probably the biggest impediment is that while the bulbs are cheaper to use, they cost more to buy. Compact fluorescents are often eight times more expensive, but each one saves consumers $30 over its lifespan because they last longer and use less electricity. It's a quirk of our human brains that people generally have a hard time paying more for something today even if it's a better deal in the long run. That will take some work to overcome.

The poorest consumers — those who are behind on their bills and living paycheck to paycheck — may not be able to absorb the extra cost upfront. Every effort should be made to get the bulbs for those who need them most, including expanding programs to distribute them to recipients of energy-assistance programs for the poor.

Defense Keys On 'Coercive Tactics' (TT)

Tampa Tribune, January 3, 2007

TAMPA - Scott Schweickert's defense is asking a judge to block the prosecution from introducing at trial Schweickert's statements about how he helped Steven Lorenzo drug, sexually torture and kill two men.

Defense attorney Pedro Amador argues in court papers that Schweickert's statements "were made as a result of coercive tactics employed by government agents."

Schweickert was not given a lawyer during several interviews, even though he "requested a lawyer from his first contact with law enforcement," Amador wrote.

Schweickert faces a federal trial next week on charges of conspiracy and drug facilitated crimes of violence. Lorenzo is serving 200 years in federal prison on charges he drugged and sexually tortured nine men, including the two victims authorities say Lorenzo and Schweickert killed: Jason Galehouse and Michael Wachholtz.

According to an arrest affidavit filed at the time of Schweickert's arrest in May 2005, Schweickert was interviewed by U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Scott A. Albrecht and other detectives on May 10 and 19 in 2005, after being advised of his Miranda rights.

According to the affidavit, Schweickert told investigators that he and Lorenzo met online and struck up a conversation about their mutual interest in dominant sexual activities. Although Schweickert said that a majority of the chats about violence, abduction and drug use were pure fantasy, he said some of the fantasies became reality in 2003.

That Dec. 19, Schweickert told detectives, he and Lorenzo met Galehouse at the nightclub 2606. Galehouse accompanied the two to Lorenzo's house. Later, Schweickert told detectives, he helped subdue a struggling Galehouse, who went limp and died. Schweickert told investigators he helped Lorenzo dismember and dispose of Galehouse's body.

The next night, Schweickert told detectives, he and Lorenzo returned to 2606, where they met Wachholtz, who also went with them to Lorenzo's house. Schweickert said he helped subdue Wachholtz while Lorenzo administered ether. During a struggle, Wachholtz died, and Schweickert helped dispose of the body, he said.

Amador wrote in his motion that Schweickert also was interrogated on Nov. 2, 2004, during a search of his Peru, Ill., home. According to the motion, Schweickert was handcuffed and questioned without his rights being read to him. During the interrogation, he was read his rights and then requested a lawyer.

The interrogation was stopped, and Schweickert was never provided a lawyer, Amador wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0110657

Schweickert was subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury in Tampa on May 10, 2005, Amador wrote. Upon arriving in Tampa, Schweickert requested a lawyer, Amador wrote, but was told he was not entitled to one. Before testifying, he was interrogated for several hours, Amador wrote.

After testifying, Schweickert was read his Miranda rights and did not request a lawyer "but had already been told he would not get one," according to the motion.

Schweickert did not request a lawyer when he was interrogated again on May 19, 2005, Amador wrote, even though he was read his Miranda warnings "because he was previously told by law enforcement that he was not entitled to a lawyer. He continued participating in the interrogation because of promises by law enforcement that he believed amounted to immunity."

Arizona Key Gateway For Pot (AR)

The Arizona Republic, January 2, 2007

Arizona, already the country's main entry point for illegal immigration, is gaining another dubious distinction: marijuana smuggling gateway.

The Border Patrol said agents seized over 331 tons (662,650 pounds) of marijuana worth $530 million last fiscal year, ending Sept. 30. That set a record for the fifth straight year. It nearly equaled the 350 tons seized in California, Texas and New Mexico combined.

Now, Arizona is on a pace to set a new record. Since Oct. 1, agents have seized over 106 tons, worth $170 million, nearly 20 tons more than the same period the previous year.

Marijuana seizures typically spike in late fall, after the harvest in Mexico, and a bumper crop this year means more pot to smuggle.

The record seizures indicate the Border Patrol, augmented by more agents, and National Guard troops, are doing a better job of stopping marijuana loads from getting through, officials said.

The size of some loads is staggering. On Dec. 6, agents seized an estimated $4.2 million worth of pot crammed inside two pickups in Nogales.

Arizona Sets Record For Pot Seizures Fifth Year In A Row (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

PHOENIX -- Agents with the U.S. Border Patrol have seized a record amount of marijuana from smugglers along the Arizona-Mexico border for the fifth year in a row.

The agency said it has seized more than 331 tons of marijuana worth $530 million last fiscal year, ending Sept. 30.

The record amount nearly equaled the 350 tons seized in California, Texas and New Mexico combined.

Officials say Arizona is on pace to set another record this year. Since Oct. 1, agents have seized more than 106 tons of pot worth $170 million. That's nearly 20 tons more than the same period the previous year.

The record seizures indicate the beefed-up Border Patrol and National Guard troops are doing a better job of stopping marijuana loads from getting through, officials said.

Arizona is the busiest entry point for illegal immigrants along the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border.

Azusa Council Poised To Approve Ban On Pot Dispensaries (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, January 3, 2007

AZUSA, Calif. - The city is poised to join several others across California in banning medical marijuana dispensaries.

The City Council planned to vote Tuesday on an ordinance designed to prohibit the so-called "pot clubs." Officials approved the new rule unanimously on its first reading last month.

Council member Keith Hanks said he understands that marijuana helps people who are sick, but the dispensaries can open up the possibility of abuse in the system.

"How do you become a legal possessor of marijuana and show that you only have it to distribute for helping people who are sick? How can the police enforce the marijuana control laws? They're put in a difficult position," he said.

But advocates for the clubs say regulating them is more effective than banning them.

"In many of the 27 cities and six counties (statewide) that have allowed dispensaries, they reduced crime and reduced complaints and helped patients," said Don Duncan, the Southern California coordinator for Americans for Safe Access.

If the ordinance is approved, Azusa would join several other cities that outlaw the dispensaries, including Pasadena, or have enacted moratoriums that prevent marijuana cooperatives from coming to town.

The measure reads, "Any business, operation or use that cannot be conducted or carried out without being in violation of state or federal law shall be prohibited."

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, legalizing the drug for therapeutic use. In 2003, state legislation was approved allowing counties to issue identification cards to medical users to protect them from prosecution by local law enforcement.

The U.S. Supreme Court ruled in June that federal authorities could still seize and destroy marijuana stashes and arrest growers and consumers even in the 11 states that allow medical marijuana use.

Federal law prohibits any marijuana use.

This Is Your Brain On Drugs, Dad (NYT)

By Mike Males

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WHEN releasing last week's Monitoring the Future survey on drug use, John P. Walters, the director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, boasted that "broad" declines in teenage drug use promise "enormous beneficial consequences not only for our children now, but for the rest of their lives." Actually, anybody who has looked carefully at the report and other recent federal studies would see a dramatically different picture: skyrocketing illicit drug abuse and related deaths among teenagers and adults alike.

While Monitoring the Future, an annual study that depends on teenagers to self-report on their behavior, showed that drug use dropped sharply in the last decade, the National Center for Health Statistics has reported that teenage deaths from illicit drug abuse have tripled over the same period. This reverses 25 years of declining overdose fatalities among youths, suggesting that teenagers are now joining older generations in increased drug use.

What the Monitoring the Future report does have right is that teenagers remain the least part of America's burgeoning drug abuse crisis. Today, after 20 years, hundreds of billions of dollars, and millions of arrests and imprisonments in the war on drugs, America's rate of drug-related deaths, hospital emergencies, crime and social ills stand at record highs.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the number of Americans dying from the abuse of illegal drugs has leaped by 400 percent in the last two decades, reaching a record 28,000 in 2004. The F.B.I. reported that drug arrests reached an all-time high of 1.8 million in 2005. The Drug Abuse Warning Network, a federal agency that compiles statistics on hospital emergency cases caused by illicit drug abuse, says that number rose to 940,000 in 2004 — a huge increase over the last quarter century.

Why are so few Americans aware of these troubling trends? One reason is that today's drug abusers are simply the "wrong" group. As David Musto, a psychiatry professor at Yale and historian of drug abuse, points out, wars on drugs have traditionally depended on "linkage between a drug and a feared or rejected group within society." Today, however, the fastest-growing population of drug abusers is white, middle-aged Americans. This is a powerful mainstream constituency, and unlike with teenagers or urban minorities, it is hard for the government or the news media to present these drug users as a grave threat to the nation.

Among Americans in their 40s and 50s, deaths from illicit-drug overdoses have risen by 800 percent since 1980, including 300 percent in the last decade. In 2004, American hospital emergency rooms treated 400,000 patients between the ages 35 and 64 for abusing heroin, cocaine, methamphetamine, marijuana, hallucinogens and "club drugs" like ecstasy.

Equally surprising, graying baby boomers have become America's fastest-growing crime scourge. The F.B.I. reports that last year the number of Americans over the age of 40 arrested for violent and property felonies rose to 420,000, up from 170,000 in 1980. Arrests for drug offenses among those over 40 rose to 360,000 last year, up from 22,000 in 1980. The Bureau of Justice Statistics found that 440,000 Americans ages 40 and older were incarcerated in 2005, triple the number in 1990.

Yet drug officials seem fixated on paper-and-pencil surveys of drug use by teens. In releasing its survey last week, the Office of Drug Control Policy trumpeted that "America's balanced strategy to reduce drug use is working." Representative Mark Souder, an Indiana Republican who has been a top supporter of federal antidrug efforts, says "the Bush administration is doing very well" on this front because "drug use, particularly among young people, is down."

But, some may say, don't teenage drug use rates predict future drug problems? To the contrary: 30 years of experience shows that fluctuations in the percentage of youths who report using drugs on surveys has almost nothing to do with the harm that drug abuse causes (addiction, disease, injury, death, crime, family and community distress), either in adolescence or later in life.

I compared teenage drug use trends reported annually by Monitoring the Future since the 1970s with trends for other behaviors and with federal crime, health and education statistics. In years in which a higher percentage of high school seniors told the survey takers they used illicit drugs, teenagers consistently reported and experienced lower rates of crime, murder, drug-related hospital emergencies and deaths, suicides, H.I.V. infection, school dropouts, delinquency, pregnancy, violence, theft in and outside of school, and fights with parents, employers and teachers.

The data also contradict Mr. Walters's claim that generations reporting lower rates of drug use enjoy "less addiction, less suffering, less crime, lower health costs and higher achievement." For example, baby boomers rarely used illegal drugs as youths.

In 1972, the University of Michigan researchers who carry out Monitoring the Future found that just 22 percent of high school seniors had ever used illegal drugs, compared to 48 percent of the class of 2005. Yet as that generation has aged, it has been afflicted by drug abuse and its related ills — overdoses, hospitalizations, drug-related crime — at far higher rates than those experienced by later generations at the same ages.

It's time to end the obsession with hyping teenage drug use. The meaningless surveys that policy makers now rely on should be replaced with a comprehensive "drug abuse index" that pulls together largely ignored data on drug-related deaths, hospital emergencies, crime, diseases and similar practical measures.

A good model is the California Department of Alcohol and Drug Programs' fledgling drug abuse index, which I helped compile and which aims to pinpoint which populations and areas are most harmed by drugs, both legal and illicit.

Few experts would have suspected that the biggest contributors to California's drug abuse, death and injury toll are educated, middle-aged women living in the Central Valley and rural areas, while the fastest-declining, lowest-risk populations are urban black and Latino teenagers. Yet the index found exactly that. These are the sorts of trends we need to understand if we are to design effective policies.

The United States' drug abuse crisis has exploded out of control. Scientifically designed strategies are urgently needed to target the manifest drug-caused damage that current policies are failing miserably to address.

Mexico Sends Troops,Police To Fight Drug Crime In Tijuana (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

TIJUANA, Mexico (AP)--The Mexican government is sending more than 3,000 soldiers and federal police officers to fight drug gangs in the violent border city of Tijuana, the latest offensive by President Felipe Calderon who has vowed to crack down on organized crime.

The force, backed by 28 boats, 21 planes and nine helicopters, will hunt down suspected traffickers, patrol the coast and man checkpoints in a city that is a popular smuggling route for cocaine, methamphetamine and marijuana entering the United States, Interior Secretary Francisco Ramirez Acuna said in a news conference Tuesday in Mexico City.

"We will carry out all the necessary actions to retake every region of national territory," Ramirez Acuna said. "We will not allow any state to be a hostage of drug traffickers or organized crime."

Tijuana, across the border from San Diego, California, is one of the world's busiest border crossings. Last year, there were more than 300 killings in the city, most of which stemmed from fighting between rival drug gangs, investigators say.

Tijuana Mayor Jorge Hank Rhon welcomed the soldiers, saying he would like them to work hand-in-hand with city police who are establishing random security checkpoints.

Calderon took office in December after winning a close election on a law and order platform.

Last month, he sent 7,000 soldiers and federal police to his native state of Michoacan, which has been plagued by execution-style killings and beheadings as rival drug gangs fight over marijuana plantations and smuggling routes.

The troops have arrested more than 50 people, including several suspected leaders of the feuding cartels, and seized large quantities of gold, bulletproof vests, military equipment and shirts with federal and municipal police logos.

Calderon is scheduled to make his first visit to the troops on Wednesday at a military base.

Calderon's predecessor, Vicente Fox, promised the "mother of all battles" against organized crime, sending in thousands of soldiers and federal police to some drug-embattled towns and arresting several major drug kingpins.

But the arrests appeared to spark more violence as gangsters battled to take over the smuggling routes of those killed or arrested.

ATF To Investigate Explosive Devices Found After PG Standoff (TEXGAZ)

Texarkana (TX) Gazette, January 3, 2007

The investigation into explosive devices found in the home of a man who gave himself up after a four-hour, Texas-side standoff will be made by the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives.

"Components of explosive devices were found in the building. It is unknown at this time what the intent of (the homeowner) was regarding the explosive components," said Shawn Fitzgerald, spokesman for the Texarkana, Texas, Police Department.

Texas-side police have not released the man's name, but neighbors and co-workers identified him as Todd Gingrich, 43.

Police were dispatched to Gingrich's home at 5814 Larry Drive at 12:37 a.m. Saturday to provide assistance to thwart a possible suicide. They were notified that he allegedly had access to a large number of weapons.

Family members said the collection included automatic and semi-automatic weapons, so the Metro SWAT Team was activated to negotiate with Gingrich.

Negotiators attempted to contact Gingrich over the next four hours, but were unsuccessful.

Fortunately, at 4:50 a.m., officers were able to take Gingrich into custody without injury after he reportedly became ill and exited the building on his own.

"No directed threats were made toward the Texarkana, Texas, police nor the Metro SWAT Team members during the incident," Fitzgerald said.

Criminal charges are not being sought by police because the only person clearly threatened during the standoff was Gingrich.

Though the layout of weapons found inside the game room and other indications make the scene appear otherwise, there is no proof that any police officers were clearly threatened.

Though the layout of weapons found inside the game room and other indications make the scene appear otherwise, there is no proof that any police officers were clearly threatened.

"A large cache of weapons was discovered in the building where the victim had been staying during the incident, but it is unknown at this time what the reason or intent was regarding the weapons," said Fitzgerald.

The Dallas Bureau of the ATF was contacted and responded to the scene. The ATF confiscated all weapons and devices, and the case has since been turned over to that agency, police said.

ATF may pursue criminal charges following a psychological evaluation.

"The primary concern of the police is to make sure he does not do himself bodily harm and to keep everyone else safe," Fitzgerald said.

Neighbors and co-workers verified the identity of Gingrich, a chemical specialist at Cooper Tire & Rubber whom they perceived as peculiar.

One co-worker at Cooper Tire & Rubber who has interacted with him on the job said Gingrich is reclusive.

"He was very secluded. He did not talk to anybody. I took him to be a bit of a recluse. He ate by himself and wouldn't talk to you in the hallway. I just took him to be a real peculiar fellow," the co-worker said.

Only a handful of neighbors notified by police chose to evacuate the area. Others who attempted to get into the neighborhood during the standoff were stopped at a secure perimeter maintained by officers.

"They had the roadblock in front of my house and wouldn't let anyone in or out. My dad had people visiting and they couldn't leave. The cops said under no circumstances, no one in or out," said Michael Riley, who lives on Sidney Drive, one street over from Larry Drive.

Riley said they previously lived across the street from Gingrich and described him as odd and antisocial.

"Last week we were walking by and he just went into his garage and stared. It was really weird," said Riley's brother, Neil Riley.

TAX:

Democrats To Target Oil And Gas Industry In Early Hours (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 3, 2007

Before adjourning last month, the Republican-led Congress gave oil and gas companies a parting gift: wider access to oil and gas drilling in the Gulf of Mexico.

What a difference a few weeks and a new majority make.

Among the first items Democrats want to pass are measures that at least some oil and gas companies oppose, such as a measure to repeal certain tax breaks included in a broad energy bill passed in 2005 and a bill to collect royalties on existing drilling leases.

Provisions that could cost the industry even more money, such as one imposing a windfall-profit tax, could follow in the Democratic-led Congress, although some of the harsher measures may strain caucus unity.

"People are very concerned, and concerned on a lot of levels," said one lobbyist at a major oil company.

Democrats could try as early as this week, though most likely next week, to force companies that signed leases in 1998 and 1999 to renegotiate those contracts so they pay royalties on oil produced in the Gulf when per-barrel prices pass a set threshold.

What appears to be an Interior Department error meant that the threshold typical of such contracts wasn't included in the leases signed during those two years. The error has left billions of dollars in royalties uncollected by the federal government.

Democrats are also considering repealing a manufacturing tax break that oil and gas companies now are able to claim, as well as other tax measures adopted in the broad energy bill adopted in 2005.

Democrats would use the additional revenues to pay for a new fund for conservation and development of renewable energy sources.

Political party affiliation doesn't necessarily determine how a member may view an oil and gas issue, so bills the industry opposes will not necessarily pass, particularly with President Bush, a former oil man, still in the White House. But the industry is much closer to Republicans in general than to Democrats, as evidenced in the ratios of PAC contributions.

Shortly after Democrats won majorities in the House and Senate in November, oil and gas lobbyists began preparing anew for the reintroduction of bills originally prompted by record industry profits and soaring gasoline prices. Some Republicans have supported these measures as well.

The industry is in the midst, for example, of a $100 million public relations and grassroots lobbying campaign to boost its sagging public image.

Lobbyists meanwhile have reiterated in Hill meetings their argument that bills that cut too deeply into corporate profits will drive companies to explore and drill in areas outside the United States, thereby raising this country's dependence on foreign oil.

That argument has bipartisan appeal, particularly in areas of the country where local economies are heavily reliant on the oil and gas industry. Staff aides from Democratic "oil-patch" offices have met leadership aides in the weeks leading up to the holiday break to discuss which measures are acceptable.

Oil and gas-friendly members plan to support the measure to force companies to renegotiate leases, which also has some support among Republican members, and the development of an alternative energy and conservation fund. Several companies have agreed to pay royalties in the future.

The Democrats' bill would forbid companies from future Gulf production contracts.

But some members will likely balk at the windfall-profits tax or another measure under consideration that would increase taxes on the industry by changing the accounting rules for oil inventories. Each approach would likely cost the industry billions of dollars.

Lobbyists said aides to the oil-patch members have sought assurances that what they might view as punitive measures are limited to the initial batch of bills contemplated to start the session, which would leave out profit and inventory tax changes.

But these members who support the oil and gas industry have apparently been unable to get that assurance from leadership offices, one lobbyist said.

Oil and gas companies are not united in their views. The major oil companies do not support certain tax breaks in the 2005 energy act, for example, and seem willing to accept the general parameters of the Democrats' early legislation. This, the companies calculate, will allow them to draw a line in the sand and oppose more financially onerous provisions later.

DOJ_NMG_0110662

Drew Hammill, a spokesman for Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said Democrats have not decided on the exact oil and gas provisions that will be included in their package for the 100-hour legislative push.

But Democrats are intent on setting up the energy reserve for renewable energy and conservation, repealing certain tax breaks, and forcing oil companies to renegotiate the 1998 and 1999 Gulf leases. The total revenues will amount to billions of dollars, Hammill said, although the exact figure depends on which breaks Democrats decide ultimately to target.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

What The Congress Can Do For America (WSJ)

By George W. Bush

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Tomorrow, members of the 110th Congress will take their oaths of office here in Washington. I will have the privilege of working with them for the next two years -- one quarter of my presidency, plenty of time to accomplish important things for the American people.

Together, we have a chance to serve the American people by solving the complex problems that many don't expect us to tackle, let alone solve, in the partisan environment of today's Washington. To do that, however, we can't play politics as usual. Democrats will control the House and Senate, and therefore we share the responsibility for what we achieve.

In the days and weeks since the November elections, I have been encouraged by the productive meetings I've had with many of the new leaders in Congress from both parties. I am hopeful we can find common ground without compromising our principles.

I believe we share many of the same goals for the people we serve -- and with good will and hard effort, we can find practical ways to advance the American Dream and keep our nation safe.

My principles are no secret. I have campaigned on them in my races for governor and in two presidential contests, and I have worked hard during my presidency to translate these principles into sound policy.

I believe that when America is willing to use her influence abroad, the American people are safer and the world is more secure. I believe that wealth does not come from government. It comes from the hard work of America's workers, entrepreneurs and small businesses. I believe government closest to the people is more responsive and accountable. I believe government plays an important role in helping those who can't help themselves. Yet we must always remember that when people are hurting, they need a caring person, not a government bureaucracy.

These are all common-sense principles, and they provide the basis for how I will approach governing with the new Congress. We've proved it can be done: When our nation was attacked, Republicans and Democrats came together to pass the Patriot Act and reform our intelligence agencies. When our economy was struggling, we worked together to pass tax relief that has helped our economy grow, create jobs, and raise the standard of living for the American people. When we saw that our public schools were failing our children, we came together to pass the No Child Left Behind Act, insisting on high standards, accountability and better options for parents.

The outcome of the elections has changed the balance of power in Congress, yet the priorities for keeping our country safe and prosperous go beyond party labels.

Our priorities begin with defeating the terrorists who killed thousands of innocent Americans on September 11, 2001 -- and who are working hard to attack us again. These terrorists are part of a broader extremist movement that is now doing everything it can to defeat us in Iraq.

In the days ahead, I will be addressing our nation about a new strategy to help the Iraqi people gain control of the security situation and hasten the day when the Iraqi government gains full control over its affairs. Ultimately, Iraqis must resolve the most pressing issues facing them. We can't do it for them.

But we can help Iraq defeat the extremists inside and outside of Iraq -- and we can help provide the necessary breathing space for this young government to meet its responsibilities. If democracy fails and the extremists prevail in Iraq, America's enemies will be stronger, more lethal, and emboldened by our defeat. Leaders in both parties understand the stakes in this struggle. We now have the opportunity to build a bipartisan consensus to fight and win the war.

America's priorities also include keeping our economy strong. The elections have not reversed the laws of economics. It is a fact that economies do best when you reward hard work by allowing people to keep more of what they have earned. And we have seen that businesses can expand and hire more workers when they have more money to invest -- and since August 2003, America's employers have added more than seven million new jobs.

It is also a fact that our tax cuts have fueled robust economic growth and record revenues. Because revenues have grown and we've done a better job of holding the line on domestic spending, we met our goal of cutting the deficit in half three years ahead of schedule. By continuing these policies, we can balance the federal budget by 2012 while funding our priorities and making the tax cuts permanent. In early February, I will submit a budget that does exactly that. The bottom line is tax relief and spending restraint are good for the American worker, good for the American taxpayer, and good for the federal budget. Now is not the time to raise taxes on the American people.

By balancing the budget through pro-growth economic policies and spending restraint, we are better positioned to tackle the longer term fiscal challenge facing our country: reforming entitlements -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- so future generations can benefit from these vital programs without bankrupting our country.

One important message I took away from the election is that people want to end the secretive process by which Washington insiders are able to slip into legislation billions of dollars of pork-barrel projects that have never been reviewed or voted on by Congress. I'm glad Senator Robert Byrd and Congressman Dave Obey -- the Democrats who will lead the appropriations process in the new Congress -- heard that message, too, and have indicated they will refrain from including additional earmarks in the continuing resolution for this fiscal year.

But we can and should do more. It's time Congress give the president a line-item veto. And today I will announce my own proposal to end this dead-of-the-night process and substantially cut the earmarks passed each year.

The strength of our economy also requires us to address some of the biggest issues facing the American people -- greater energy security, comprehensive immigration reform, and affordable health care. While progress has been made in each of these areas, we must do more. I look forward to working with Congress on these difficult issues. * * *

Our Founders believed in the wisdom of the American people to choose their leaders and provided for the concept of divided and effective government. The majority party in Congress gets to pass the bills it wants. The minority party, especially where the margins are close, has a strong say in the form bills take. And the Constitution leaves it to the president to use his judgment whether they should be signed into law.

That gives us a clear challenge and an opportunity. If the Congress chooses to pass bills that are simply political statements, they will have chosen stalemate. If a different approach is taken, the next two years can be fruitful ones for our nation. We can show the American people that Republicans and Democrats can come together to find ways to help make America a more secure, prosperous and hopeful society. And we will show our enemies that the open debate they believe is a fatal weakness is the great strength that has allowed democracies to flourish and succeed.

To the new members of the 110th Congress, I offer my welcome -- and my congratulations. The American people have entrusted us with public office at a momentous time for our nation. Let them say of these next two years: We used our time well.

Bush Remains Resolute On Tax Cuts (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As Democrats prepare to take control of Congress, President Bush sent a strong signal of his continued opposition to tax increases.

In an op-ed in today's editions of The Wall Street Journal, Mr. Bush contends that his deep tax cuts have kept the economy strong while shrinking projected deficits. "The bottom line is tax relief and spending restraint are good for the American worker, good for the American taxpayer, and good for the federal budget," Mr. Bush writes. "Now is not the time to raise taxes on the American people."

He also writes -- for the first time, but with few details -- that the budget he sends Congress next month would "balance the federal budget by 2012 while funding our priorities and making the tax cuts permanent."

Mr. Bush's comments reflect his administration's reliance on tax cuts as both an economic elixir and a political weapon. During the 2006 congressional campaign, as Republican scandals and the Iraq war increasingly dominated the debate, the White House leaned heavily on tax cuts as an antidote for bad news.

QUESTION OF THE DAY

· Which party is likely to be more responsible with taxpayers' money?1

BUSH OP-ED

· Commentary: What the Congress Can Do for America2

"The main reason for our growing economy is that we cut taxes," Mr. Bush said in his last weekly radio address before the election, broadcast live from a Colorado coffee shop, where he met with small-business owners. "Entrepreneurs like the ones I'm having breakfast with this morning have put that money to good use. They expanded their businesses, and they're creating jobs in their communities."

DOJ_NMG_0110664

He also frequently attacked Democrats on the campaign trail -- including incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi -- for claiming to support tax cuts while voting against many of his.

Mr. Bush's tax-cutting rhetoric, though, wasn't enough to save Republicans from what the president later termed a "thumpin'." And as he begins the final two years of his presidency, the impact of his arguments might again be muted.

Comments Sure to Resonate

Democratic House leaders have made it clear they aren't interested in any broad frontal assault on Mr. Bush's income-tax cuts, which for the most part are scheduled to last until 2010. Some Democrats have even signaled that they would like to find a tax cut of their own to pass, perhaps a longer-term fix for the alternative minimum tax.

Still, Mr. Bush's comments are sure to resonate on Capitol Hill in coming weeks, as the new Democratic majorities consider long-term budget resolutions that either don't balance the budget or allow at least some of Mr. Bush's tax cuts to expire down the road.

Ms. Pelosi and other Democrats have even discussed the possibility of raising income taxes for people above a certain level, perhaps $250,000. They also face pressure to reach a deal to restore the federal estate tax at some level after 2010.

Bringing the federal deficit to zero by 2012, while making permanent the tax cuts that are set to expire in 2009 and 2010, would require more restraint on spending than either the White House or Congress has shown of late. The last official White House budget forecast, issued in July, extended through fiscal 2011 and showed a $127 billion deficit that year. Since then, a continued surge in tax receipts has improved the outlook somewhat. The Congressional Budget Office's August 2006 baseline forecast -- which assumes the expiration of current tax cuts -- projected a 2012 deficit of $54 billion. By then, Mr. Bush will have been long out of office.

Still, he is sure to continue to challenge Democrats in coming months on spending -- especially so-called earmarks, special-interest projects in lawmaker's districts. He also will be tempted to veto spending bills, which so far he has failed to do.

Theme of Federalism

While praising Democrats' efforts to limit earmarks, he promised to announce a permanent fix of his own today. More broadly, Mr. Bush sounded the theme of federalism, suggesting that "government closest to the people is more responsive and accountable" than Washington.

A senior aide to Mr. Bush said the president wasn't firing a fiscal shot across the bow at Democrats, but was simply "articulating a long-held view that tax relief has worked." He added that Americans "want their leaders in Washington to cut wasteful spending. The president's budget will do just that."

Mr. Bush sought to set a tone of bipartisan cooperation in the op-ed piece, saying he was hopeful he can "find common ground" with Democrats, mentioning affordable health care, energy and immigration reform as possible areas of agreement.

Bush Warns Against Merely Political Bills (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

President Bush, facing a Democratic-controlled Congress for the first time, is urging lawmakers to work with his administration and warning that "political statements" in the form of legislation would result in a stalemate.

"Together, we have a chance to serve the American people by solving the complex problems that many don't expect us to tackle, let alone solve, in the partisan environment of today's Washington," Bush wrote in a guest column for today's Wall Street Journal. "To do that, however, we can't play politics as usual. Democrats will control the House and Senate, and therefore we share the responsibility for what we achieve."

Bush, while sounding a tone of bipartisanship on the eve of the new session of Congress that begins Thursday, repeated long-held positions on the war in Iraq, tax cuts and other issues often criticized by Democrats. He has vetoed only one bill, but he reminded readers that the Constitution calls on the president to use his judgment in deciding which bills to sign into law.

"If the Congress chooses to pass bills that are simply political statements, they will have chosen stalemate," Bush wrote. "If a different approach is taken, the next two years can be fruitful ones for our nation. We can show the American people that Republicans and Democrats can come together to find ways to help make America a more secure, prosperous and hopeful society."

Bush planned to meet with his Cabinet today to discuss domestic priorities and to court about a dozen members of Congress, Democrats and Republicans, at a social reception tonight. The schedule represents Bush's official return to work after a Christmas vacation at his Texas ranch.

Dems To Inherit Agenda Dominated By War (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110665

Now the majority party, Democrats will inherit an agenda dominated by the war in Iraq when the new Congress convenes Thursday, increasing their exposure to what has mostly been a politically damaging issue for Republicans.

In the weeks ahead, the new Democratic Congress will be confronted with President Bush's new plan for Iraq and a White House request that lawmakers authorize an estimated additional $100 billion to pay for the war.

Democrats also may be asked to support a plan lifting restrictions on reserve deployments to ease the strain on active-duty troops.

While Democrats may try to deflect as much attention as they can toward Bush — citing the president's ownership of the war and congressional limitations on foreign policy — they no doubt will find themselves playing a starring role in a debate that cost Republicans votes in the midterm elections last fall.

"They'll have to show they can govern and govern in a way that will help the executive branch resolve this," said James Thurber, director of American University's Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies.

But resolving Iraq won't be easy, and Democrats run the risk of going too far in criticizing the president. Recent polls show Americans remain frustrated with Bush's handling of the war, but don't think Democrats have offered much of an alternative.

"They will be in the majority, and they will be blamed if they try to block the president from implementing an exit strategy," Thurber said.

The president is thought to be considering a plan to increase the number of forces in Iraq. But the specifics of how many troops will be added to the existing 140,000 force and for how long are not known.

Bush said last week he planned to engage lawmakers before making his announcement later this month. Congressional leaders planned to attend a White House reception expected at midweek.

Foreshadowing the debate to come, Democrats swiftly rallied against the notion of sending more troops, saying Iraqis must take a stronger role in security matters.

"The Iraqis need to understand that the responsibility for the future of that country is theirs," Rep.-elect Jerry McNerney, D-Calif., said Saturday in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

"I have not heard from our military, clamoring for additional soldiers," Rep. Jim Marshall, D-Ga., said upon returning from a trip to Iraq with Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff.

Marshall and Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., who also visited Iraq during the Christmas holiday, reported that some progress was being made in Anbar province where Iraqi security forces and local leaders were collaborating to push out al-Qaida fighters. But, Skelton said, violence in Baghdad has accelerated and additional U.S. troops might not help.

"I will look carefully and with an open mind at any proposal the president may make, but my view remains that removing some number of American troops — however small — would send a more powerful message to our Iraqi partners than raising force levels," Skelton said.

The debate will play out in hearing rooms this month. Skelton and Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., who will head the Senate Armed Services Committee, have invited Defense Secretary Robert Gates to testify. Levin said he would like that hearing to take place Jan. 11.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has promised to testify before his committee after Bush makes his announcement.

Democrats say they also want to hear from independent military experts and members of the Iraq Study Group.

The debate also will play out in Congress's review of the president's spending requests for the war. The Pentagon says it needs an additional $99.7 billion to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan until the end of the current fiscal year in September. That request is expected to arrive on Capitol Hill in February.

Democrats are eyeing ways to attach conditions to war funds that won't hurt troops and may even attract Republican support.

John Podesta, former President Clinton's chief of staff and now president of the liberal Center for American Progress, recommends lawmakers demand in that spending bill that the president seek lawmakers' approval if troop levels exceed 150,000 in Iraq.

Democrats in 2007 may be confronted with another politically sensitive Iraq issue regarding whether to support increased involuntary call-ups of Guard and Reserve troops. In December, Schoomaker warned that the Army will break without adding more active-duty soldiers to the ranks and changing current mobilization policies backed by Pentagon civilians.

The issue of allowing lengthy involuntary deployments is a tricky one for lawmakers who want to reduce the pressure on active-duty forces but also hear from reservists that they too are facing serious hardships.

Biden and other Democrats agree that Iraq will dominate much of their work next year, but contend they must not be blamed for a war run ultimately by the president. "This is President Bush's war," Biden said.

But political experts say the public might not agree.

"When you're in the minority, you don't have to do much more than criticize the status quo that wasn't working," said Norman Ornstein, a scholar with the American Enterprise Institute. "When you're in the majority, people will look to you for leadership."

Activists On The Left Applying Pressure To Democratic Leaders (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Democratic leaders set to take control of Congress tomorrow are facing mounting pressure from liberal activists to chart a more confrontational course on Iraq and the issues of human rights and civil liberties, with some even calling for the impeachment of President Bush.

The carefully calibrated legislative blitz that Democrats have devised for the first 100 hours of power has left some activists worried the passion that swept the party to power in November is already dissipating. A cluster of protesters will greet the new congressional leaders at the Capitol tomorrow. They will not be disgruntled conservatives wary of Democratic control, but liberals demanding a ban on torture, an end to warrantless domestic spying and a restoration of curbed civil liberties.

The protest will be followed by an evening forum calling for the president's impeachment, led by the Center for Constitutional Rights, antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan and a pro-impeachment group called World Can't Wait.

Those priorities will not be in evidence inside the Capitol, where the newly sworn-in Democratic Congress will immediately begin work on new ethics rules, the reinstitution of federal deficit controls and new policies designed to increase civility in House proceedings. In the coming weeks, Democrats plan to pass bills designed to raise the minimum wage, lower prescription drug costs for Medicare recipients and interest rates for student borrowers, bolster homeland security and boost alternative energy research.

Nowhere in the Democrats' consensus-driven agenda is legislation revisiting last year's establishment of military tribunals and suspending legal rights for suspected terrorists. Nor is there a revision of the civil liberties provisions of the USA Patriot Act, a measure curbing warrantless wiretapping by the National Security Agency or an aggressive confrontation of the president on his Iraq war policies.

To Democratic activists and some lawmakers, the agenda skirts the larger issues that damaged the president's approval ratings and torpedoed Republican control of Congress.

"We've been told for many years, 12 years now, 'Wait until we get in power. Then you'll see things change,' " said Debra Sweet, national director of World Can't Wait, a pro-impeachment group helping to organize the protest. "We'll give them a couple of months or a few weeks to see what they come up with, but if they don't do something very decisive around the war and these other issues, I think there will be trouble."

"If the first 100 hours is going to be characterized by an increase in the minimum wage and improved health and education benefits for Americans, that's fine," said Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), a liberal firebrand who ran for president in 2004 and has announced for 2008. "But then let's talk about the second hundred hours, because we cannot let this war be lost. We cannot abandon the troops in the field to temporizing."

To most Democratic lawmakers, such activism presents a quandary. House Republican leaders spent years trying to placate their conservative base with agendas built around opposition to same-sex marriage, antiabortion votes and tax cuts, said Sen.-elect Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.). The partisan tone enraged Democrats and ultimately alienated moderates and independents, who swept the GOP from power in November after a dozen years in control.

"The Democrats have to be careful not to fall into these traps that I think paralyzed the Republicans," Cardin said.

But Democratic lawmakers -- especially the freshmen who capitalized on voter discontent -- said their core supporters' anger is real and must be acknowledged.

"Those people protesting on Thursday care deeply about their country," said Carol Shea-Porter of New Hampshire, an incoming House freshman who ran as an ardent opponent of Bush and the war. "I think we do need to pay attention. People are begging us to remember the Constitution, what made this country great."

One lawmaker, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of alienating such voters, said wherever he goes, he hears from activists calling for Bush's impeachment. Cutting off funding for the Iraq war comes in a close second.

"For most progressive activists, there is generally speaking, an open mind but also a real fear that the 110th [Congress] will not be as aggressive as many of us want it to be," said Ralph G. Neas, president of the liberal People for the American Way. "On the other hand, there is a lot of pragmatism as we go into the 2008 election season. There's this high-wire act for everybody, not only for the House and Senate leadership but for the progressive community, too."

DOJ_NMG_0110667

The high-wire act will be on display almost as soon as the new Congress is sworn in. The first motion from the House floor will be a parliamentary inquiry from Rep. Rush D. Holt (D-N.J.) on the disputed election to replace retired Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.). In November's balloting, Republican Vern Buchanan beat Democrat Christine Jennings by 369 votes.

But more than 18,000 ballots that day did not record a vote in the closely contested race, an "undervote" rate of nearly 15 percent, mainly from the Democrat's stronghold of Sarasota County. An academic study, commissioned by the company that made the electronic voting machines, found "that there is essentially a 100 percent chance that Jennings would have won" had Sarasota voters cast their votes with different machines and ballots.

Holt's inquiry will make clear that Buchanan's swearing-in tomorrow should not prejudice or compromise a House investigation or ongoing legal challenges to his election. But that falls well short of activist demands that the seat be left vacant, or even that the House simply seat Jennings.

Holt said he is willing to take the heat for that decision.

"There are some Democrats who say we should seize that seat any way we can," he acknowledged. "But if in a heavy-handed way, we just say we've got the votes and we're going to throw out Vern Buchanan, we would undermine the principle we say we are fighting for."

Will Dems Deliver? (USAT)

By Mario M. Cuomo

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Will Dems deliver? Americans are looking for dramatic ideas and courageous leadership. The party's congressional agenda doesn't seem to rise to the challenge. As JFK did, its leaders need to boldly step forward.

By Mario M. Cuomo

In 1962, President Kennedy succeeded in captivating Americans by explaining the advantages of being the first country to reach the moon and the dangers of allowing another nation to beat us there. As a result, we did beat the Russians to the moon, and every year for the past four decades, we have invested billions of dollars in space exploration with little political or public opposition and produced brilliant success.

(Illustration by Keith Simmons, USA TODAY)

Kennedy's call to arms is frequently cited when we go in search of examples of bold vision and daring leadership in our nation's recent history, probably because there are so few comparable moments and far too many other examples when our nation's leaders have taken the easier path rather than the right, but more difficult, one.

For the first time after six years of GOP rule, the Democrats will take the reins of Congress. Voters clearly want to see what Democrats can do, that Republicans have not. This gives Democrats the chance not only to control Congress but also to elect a president in 2008.

After years of chaos in Iraq, which has led to neglect of many critical domestic issues, voters are looking for dramatic ideas and courageous leadership to deal with the nation's most difficult challenges. Will Democratic leaders step forward with big ideas and seize the opportunity they have been given?

A 'light list'

So far, the Democratic agenda for the 110th Congress, which opens Thursday, offers a laudable but light list of issues, such as increasing the minimum wage, greater stem cell availability, job training benefits and adopting ethics reforms. I doubt that kind of agenda would be enough to keep control of the Congress, let alone to win the next presidency.

As Kennedy did, prospective Democratic presidential candidates, and the party's leaders in Congress, need to confront the most difficult questions of the day. Here are just a few of the most daunting:

War on terrorism. Not only are we losing control in Iraq, we have lost momentum in the war on terror. Clear evidence of that fact can be seen in Afghanistan and scattered throughout the world. Our ability to re-energize that effort goes beyond enhancing Iraq's military force and police power to injecting economic and social aid into the country and the region to combat the kind of poverty and desperation that invites jihadism.

Economic divide. Our economy continues to be wonderfully rewarding for high-level corporate executives and big stockholders but not for millions of American workers who are falling behind, often, in part, because of a lack of higher education. Further down the ladder, we have more poor citizens than we had five years ago, and about 13 million of these poor Americans are children deemed to be at risk of poverty, illiteracy and abuse.

Despite President Bush's best efforts, many more children are being left behind. Poor children in unstable families require special assistance. Mentors, after-school programs, smaller class sizes, well-trained, adequately paid teachers and longer school years are all essential. So is accountability as featured by No Child Left Behind, but that program requires funds yet to be delivered. Resources to provide higher education in the form of Pell grants and tax deductibility for tuition are also needed.

Energy crisis. We should make the all-out effort on conservation and new forms of energy the same kind of big idea that Kennedy made of the space program. It would provide better jobs, a cleaner environment and freedom from foreign oil. We must develop all useful alternative sources — wind, water, ethanol, clean coal and battery-driven automobiles. We should also take a fresh look at nuclear energy that uses uranium, a fuel that is available, less expensive and cleaner than fossil fuels, which produce dangerous emissions.

Great ideas, you say, but how would we pay for all of this? Well, it can be done. In fact, it has been done in the not-so-distant past. In 1980, Ronald Reagan promised that by the magic of supply side economics, he could cut taxes and increase spending while still producing a balanced budget in three years. George H.W. Bush, then one of Reagan's presidential opponents, called the idea "voodoo economics," and he was right: It was a costly blunder that led to a runaway federal debt.

Don't fear taxes

How did they deal with the problem? Presidents Reagan, Bush and Clinton all raised taxes on the wealthiest taxpayers. After those raises, we had a balanced budget and a potential surplus of more than $5 trillion.

The way to reduce our debt and start providing needed federal investments is by cutting other spending and mitigating President Bush's huge tax cuts. Not the part of the tax cuts that go to the struggling middle class because they will put the money back into the economy by buying things. Instead, I'd repeal the part that goes to the 1.5% who represent the wealthiest taxpayers, and that would provide several hundred billion dollars over a decade.

Spending cuts should be made by reducing Social Security and Medicare benefits for those rich enough not to be injured by any reductions. And we should return to the pay-as-you-go budgeting that was so successful in the '90s.

So the resources are available to finance the investments we need, if we have the intelligence and the boldness to make a new agenda clear to the American people.

Which of our leading Democrats will be the first to do so?

Democrats Pressed To Show Progress In First 100 Hours (USAT)

By Deborah Barfield Berry

USA Today, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democratic leaders will be pressed in coming weeks to move their legislative agenda and show voters they made the right choice in November to shift control of Congress.

"Democrats have an urgent need to show they can make a difference," said Hugh Price, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, adding that Democrats have to "demonstrate to voters that by putting them in charge of Congress that's not a continuation of business as usual."

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker of the House, has vowed to push six key measures during the first 100 legislative hours of the 110th Congress, which begins Thursday.

During the campaign, Democrats touted an agenda that would increase the minimum wage and fund stem cell research. It also included repealing tax breaks for oil companies, cutting interest rates for college student loans, adopting remaining recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and eliminating a ban on government negotiations for lower drug costs.

"It is about the issues that are relevant to the American people's lives," Pelosi, D-Calif., said. "It is a new direction. It is what they sent us here to do, and we will do it first and foremost by making this the most honest and open Congress in a spirit of integrity, civility and bipartisanship and in a way that is fiscally sound."

In a separate move, lawmakers are expected to vote as soon as this week on a measure that outlines rules for the House, including changes to how representatives interact with lobbyists.

"We need to honor those promises right out of the gate," said Kristie Greco, a spokeswoman for Rep. Jim Clyburn, D-S.C., the incoming majority whip. "The American people obviously want a change. We have the momentum."

Political experts, however, question whether the agenda can be accomplished in 100 legislative hours, which could take several weeks. And while several agenda items are not controversial, some will face strong opposition from the administration, experts say.

For example, President Bush would likely veto a stem cell research bill if comes back to his desk, said Thomas Mann, also a senior fellow at Brookings and co-author of The Broken Branch: How Congress Is Failing America and How To Get It Back on Track. The stem cell research bill is the only measure Bush has vetoed in six years.

Mann said any change in Medicare drug price negotiations also could be a veto target.

Still, Mann said, "It is a pretty modest agenda, mostly enjoying broad support among Democrats and some among Republicans."

DOJ_NMG_0110669

The expedited process — bypassing committees and hearings — may open Democrats up to the same criticism they launched at Republicans, said Michael Franc, an analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

"The irony is that the only way to make all these bills happen ... is to establish legislative marshal order," Franc said.

But Pelosi said the issues are not new to Congress and that many House committees have already held hearings on many of the topics.

Democrats Plan First 100 Hours, Give Or Take A Speech (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 2 — House Democrats intend to kick off their new regime with a 100-hour legislative blitz that would allow them to post a series of quick victories before President Bush even delivers his State of the Union address toward the end of this month.

But don't pull out that stopwatch to begin the countdown just yet.

Even as Democrats filtered back to Capitol Hill on Tuesday in anticipation of the opening of the 110th Congress on Thursday, there was a bit of confusion about just when the 100 hours would officially begin. Would it be as soon as the new Congress was sworn in and began voting on internal rules changes? Or when the House takes up its first actual legislation next Tuesday?

And since it is 100 hours of strictly legislative activity, the clock would be on pause when House members give their customary one-minute speeches at the start of each day and during the "special orders" at night when members reserve floor time to carry on about their favorite issues for the C-Span audience.

And next Monday is out since the House, despite Democratic pledges of a disciplined five-day work schedule, will not be in session. The day off was scheduled to allow freshman lawmakers time to return from an orientation session — and others to attend the college football national championship game.

At the same time, House Republicans, forced to the Congressional sidelines for the first time in 12 years, were growing increasingly agitated about the Democratic timetable. They said that the rush by Democrats to force through legislation on national security, the minimum wage, student loan costs and energy without a full slate of hearings — and with limits on the ability of Republicans to offer alternatives — undercut the pledges of Democrats to run things in a more transparent, collegial way than the Republicans had when they were in power.

Democrats eventually decided Tuesday that the 100-hour timer would be started next Tuesday, when the House is scheduled to take up H.R. 1, a measure enacting recommendations from the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission that never made it out of the Republican-controlled Congress.

And they brushed aside complaints from the Republicans, saying Democrats campaigned specifically on this initial flurry of legislation, much of which has been considered, run through committee and ultimately rejected by Republicans in the past.

"These are deliverable," Brendan Daly, a spokesman for the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, said of the 100-hour topics. "These are things we said we would do if we are in charge and would make a direct impact on Americans' lives."

Under the current Democratic schedule, the Sept. 11 measure would be followed by a vote on increasing the federal minimum wage to $7.25 over two years. Next would come legislation expanding embryonic stem cell research that was vetoed last year by Mr. Bush. Democrats would then move to eliminate a prohibition on federal officials' negotiating with pharmaceutical companies for lower prices for those enrolled in the Medicare drug program.

After that, Democrats are planning to take up a proposal to cut the interest rate on federally subsidized student loans to 3.4 percent from 6.8 percent. Lastly, Democrats hope to wind up on Jan. 18 with legislation that seeks to make sure that oil companies pay adequate royalties on disputed leases, rolls back some industry subsidies from a recent energy bill and creates a renewable energy reserve to try to spur investment in new technologies and conservation.

Before getting to those bills, House Democrats said they would move immediately upon taking control Thursday to pass broad ethics rules including a ban on gifts and meals from lobbyists and restrictions on travel provided by outside groups. On Friday, they will vote on disclosure of earmarks and new budget rules to prohibit deficit spending.

The leadership plans to allow some of the party's freshmen to sponsor changes so they can begin building a record and reputation to defend their seats in 2008.

The pace of activity is to be much slower in the Senate, and passage of any of the legislation by the House does not guarantee that it will be sent to the White House, given the Senate's thin 51-49 Democratic majority.

Leading Senate Republicans have indicated that they could support the minimum wage increase, for instance, only if it is tied to tax relief for small businesses. As a result, that measure is likely to either stall or be changed, leading to negotiations with the House.

DOJ_NMG_0110670

The Senate plans to convene Thursday and swear in its new members. But both parties plan to hold retreats on Friday, and aides said the only legislation that could come up for a vote this week would be a resolution honoring former President Gerald R. Ford.

House Republicans, who were not known for giving Democrats much say on legislation when they ran the House, began an orchestrated campaign on Tuesday to pressure Democrats to allow full committee review of the 100-hour legislation.

"As we both know, homeland security is far too important an issue to play politics with, and any new homeland security measure should be given the review and oversight it deserves," Representative Peter T. King of New York, the top Republican on the Homeland Security Committee, wrote to Representative Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the incoming Democratic chairman.

Democrats said the legislation at issue had already been vetted and in many cases voted on in the past. They said Republicans would be given their chance once the 100 hours had elapsed. "After that, we will go back through regular order," said Mr. Daly, Ms. Pelosi's spokesman.

Dems Finalize New Rules (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan And Jackie Kucinich

The Hill, January 3, 2007

House Democrats hurried yesterday to put the finishing touches on ethics reforms that would ban lawmakers and staffers from accepting trips, gifts and meals from lobbyists and prevent the new majority from holding votes open to change the outcome.

Democrats will adopt and then amend the House Rules package tomorrow to ban all travel paid for by lobbyists or organizations that employ lobbyists, require the ethics committee to pre-approve travel paid for by outside groups, enact a total gift ban, and require lawmakers to pay the market cost of flying on a corporate jet, said Democratic staffers and officials with government watchdog groups.

And, because they feel they lost the 2003 Medicare prescription drug benefit vote because GOP leaders held it open for three hours, during which they flipped opponents into the "yes" column, Democrats will include a provision in the rules to prevent any sort of repetition, said aides to incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Democrats also will eliminate the practices of changing conference reports after members have signed them and excluding elected members from conference committees.

Until now, Democrats have not had to propose specifics or explain how they would work in practice. The biggest challenge for the new majority has been translating political rhetoric into tightly drafted legal language without loopholes, said Democratic aides. The concern is that language could be exploited for loopholes or yield unintended consequences.

New House rules could take eight weeks or longer to go into effect because the ethics committee (the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct) might be required to clarify and interpret issues, such as how to define a lobbyist and how a pre-approval requirement for travel would function.

State and local government agencies and some foundations, such as AIPAC and the Aspen Institute, want to be exempted from the new rules.

"We're interested in the basic bans on paying for travel, bans on gifts and entertainment and making sure there are no loopholes in the provisions," said Fred Wertheimer, the president of Democracy 21, a campaign-finance watchdog group.

Senior Democratic staffers, who returned to work on a day when the federal government was closed to mourn the death of former President Gerald Ford, planned to make the proposed rules changes public this afternoon at a press conference. Some aides who have jumped from the campaign trail into Congress have, as yet, no computers and only limited access to telephones.

Leadership aides plan today to brief chiefs of staff and press secretaries working for rank-and-file lawmakers.

Meanwhile, GOP Reps. Tom Price (Ga.), Eric Cantor (Va.), and Patrick McHenry (N.C.) plan to introduce a resolution next week modeled on legislation that Pelosi introduced in 2004.

Pelosi's "Minority Bill of Rights" demanded that legislation move through the committee process before reaching the House floor and urged GOP leaders to give lawmakers 24 hours to review legislation before it is considered and voted on by subcommittees or on the House floor.

McHenry expressed concern that excluding Republicans from the legislative process would set a bad precedent. GOP Reps. Buck McKeon (Calif.), Peter King (N.Y.) and Jim McCrery (La.) yesterday urged the Democrats who will chair their committees to conduct hearings on proposals that Democrats will consider in the first 100 legislative hours.

Democrats justified excluding Republicans by saying that the bills had already been discussed in the 109th Congress.

"It is a choice between leading with integrity and leading by force," McHenry said. "To say they are advocating [fairness] is ludicrous on its face by their opening hours of action."

DOJ_NMG_0110671

Democrats and political observers rejected the GOP proposal, noting that the Republican majority never considered Pelosi's legislation.

"I think they risk being laughed out of town," said Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.), the incoming chairwoman of the Rules Committee.

Norm Ornstein, a congressional scholar with the American Enterprise Institute, added, "I don't blame them in the slightest for picking it up and introducing it, but the chutzpah is quite remarkable."

Some of Pelosi's proposed changes will be included in the Democratic rules package, said Stacey Bernards, a spokeswoman for Majority Leader-elect Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

Democrats complained vociferously about the House GOP's tactics during the past four years, such as preventing Democrats from offering amendments on the House floor, excluding them from conference committees, and holding votes open for much longer than the traditional 15 minutes.

In response to real and perceived legislative slights, Democratic candidates campaigned against a Republican "culture of corruption" and promised to tighten ethics rules, in part to put distance between lawmakers and lobbyists. Revising ethics rules may prove central to retaining their majority in the House in 2008.

"I think the most important thing we can do to ensure their reelection is to follow through on the commitments the Democrats … made to those voters," Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, told C-SPAN's "Newsmakers" program last week.

Democratic leaders plan to pair three freshman members with more senior lawmakers to lead the debate on the House floor on Thursday and Friday. Rep. Zack Space (D-Ohio), who won the seat vacated by former Rep. Bob Ney (R), will lead debate over new trip and gift rules. Ney has pleaded guilty to crimes stemming from the scandal surrounding Jack Abramoff, the convicted former GOP lobbyist.

The other two freshman Democratic lawmakers who are to play leading roles in the debate have not been chosen, but Democratic leaders are considering Reps. Chris Carney (D-Pa.), Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.) and Kirsten Gillibrand (D-N.Y.), said a senior Democratic aide. They each defeated a lawmaker ensnared in ethics controversies.

In addition to revising ethics rules, the Democratic majority on Friday will debate and vote on procedural and budgetary reforms — measures to ensure that members have 24 hours to review legislation, earmark reforms and pay-as-you-go requirements — said senior Democratic aides.

Time spent debating changes to the rules package will not count against Pelosi's 100-hour legislative blitzkrieg, set to begin the week of Jan. 8 and last approximately 10 legislative days, ending when President Bush delivers his State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Grassroots Lobby Girds For Battle (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, January 3, 2007

As the new Democratic Congress prepares to take up a package of lobbying and ethics rules changes, a coalition of nonprofits and communications firms is renewing the push against new grassroots lobbying disclosure rules and not ruling out a future court challenge to the provisions.

The Free Speech Coalition is now leading the fight against proposals for mandatory reporting by any group involved in paid efforts to stimulate grassroots communications — another term for the proverbial pleas to voters to "contact your congressman" on a particular issue. Led by conservative fixtures such as direct-mail guru Richard Viguerie and Free Congress Foundation chief Paul Weyrich, the coalition is pulling no punches.

"If they pass this, there would be a massive litigation effort, because this bill is much more expansive than the proponents are leading everybody to believe," predicted Mark Fitzgibbons, president of corporate and legal affairs at the Viguerie-led firm American Target Advertising.

Lawmakers supporting grassroots disclosure have aimed their calls for reform at so-called "astroturf" campaigns, funded by corporate interests but portrayed as genuine citizen drives. Sens. Joseph Lieberman (D-Conn.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.) cited fake grassroots groups created by disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff during their successful bid to add new disclosure rules to last year's Senate ethics bill. Registration and reporting would shed sunlight on grassroots activities, not curtail them, the senators noted.

But the coalition contends that the new rules would provide a loophole for corporations that confine their grassroots communications to employees and shareholders. Though grassroots disclosure is backed by most leading government watchdog groups, all of which could be affected by the new reporting rules, the coalition has trained its fire on Ralph Nader-founded Public Citizen in a letter that will be forwarded to every member of the new Congress this week.

"This … is a coalition of groups that have a financial stake and are worried that their business might be impacted negatively," said Laura MacCleery, director of Public Citizen's Congress Watch division. MacCleery acknowledged the possibility of a lawsuit against the new rules but cautioned the coalition against considering a challenge before legislative language emerges.

The debate on last year's Senate lobbying bill elicited an equally fierce drive against the grassroots provision, mounted by an alliance called LobbySense that included as members senior officials at Americans for Tax Reform, Concerned Women for America and the Family Research Council. Fitzgibbons said LobbySense informed him of the likely resurgence of the grassroots debate, and that he expected the old and new coalitions to join forces in the coming months.

The timeframe for consideration of grassroots lobbying rules could differ sharply between the Senate and House, however. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) plans to call up last year's Senate ethics bill, which contains Lieberman and Levin's grassroots provisions, as a starting point for debate next week.

But the House will take up only internal rules changes on lobbying and ethics this month, sending statutory changes such as the grassroots mandate through regular committee order, said Drew Hammill, a spokesman for House Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"We have made an effort to address the concerns of some of these groups as we move along with this," Hammill said.

The conservative blogosphere has lent its heft to the Coalition's campaign against grassroots disclosure, along with past Federal Election Commission Chairman Brad Smith, who was appointed by former President Bill Clinton. Smith also predicted that the grassroots provisions would merit a court challenge if they become law.

"It's a disaster, generally, the notion that the government should be checking up on attempts by citizens to communicate with citizens," Smith said. He argued that lawmakers are seeking the identity of firms paying for constituent calls for purposes of retaliation: "Can you think of any other reason that members of Congress need to know who's running grassroots ads in their district?"

The Senate bill's grassroots language is similar to that in the House Democratic leadership lobbying reform bill that is serving as a model for this year's effort. The provisions would require grassroots lobbying firms to register and report to Congress quarterly, only on communications to more than 500 members of the general public, with exemptions for members of nonprofits as well as corporate employees and shareholders.

MacCleery also singled out the proposal's minimum of $25,000 in grassroots expenses to trigger reporting by the firms contracted for any issue campaign. "That's a substantial amount of money on a grassroots lobbying effort, particularly in the age of the Internet," she said.

As for the coalition's rhetorical combat with Public Citizen, MacCleery characterized the specter of a lawsuit against grassroots rules as an attempt to generate a false opposition to reform.

"It's almost like they're flacks," she added, "like they're good at creating the appearance of controversy where none exists."

Think Twice About Empowering An Office Of Independent Ethics (HILL)

By Lanny J. Davis

The Hill, January 3, 2007

The current congressional-reformer rage is to create an independent office that would investigate and file ethics charges. This is the "solution" to the problem of the inherent conflict of interest in members of Congress investigating their colleagues, much less members of their own party. Such an office, reformers argue, would be "above politics" and avoid that conflict.

Hmmmmm. Seems like déjà vu all over again.

Remember Watergate? In 1978, the same problem of public corruption and the inherent conflict of interest in the executive branch investigating itself led to a similar "above politics" office: the Office of the Special Prosecutor (a few years later called the Independent Counsel). The result: a constitutional monstrosity who couldn't be hired or fired by someone voters elected (in this case, the president); and when he or she abused power, there was no political accountability. Indeed, no accountability at all.

Between 1978 and 1999, when the independent counsel statute was allowed to die with the support of both parties, 25 independent counsels spent over $175 million. In the final analysis, very few public officials were convicted of serious crimes. But dozens of innocent men and women were smeared, with ruined reputations that could not be cleared. In the 1980s, Democrats used and abused the process, forcing the appointment of numerous independent counsels who caused such damage to innocent people. Then in the 1990s, it was the Republicans' turn to play "gotcha" and repeat the same abuses that they had accused the Democrats of in the 1980s (when they had tried to kill the statute).

Let us never forget Ronald Reagan's former Labor Secretary Raymond Donovan. At the behest of Democratic congressional leaders, he was investigated three times by an independent counsel and each time no charges were brought.

Finally he was prosecuted by a Democratic, partisan district attorney in the Bronx, N.Y. When he was acquitted, he was asked how he felt. He asked: "[To] which office do I go to get my reputation back?"

So how to learn from the tragic mistake of the independent counsel experience while still overcoming inherent conflicts of interest and strengthening enforcement of congressional ethics? Some congressional reformers would argue that an independent office for congressional ethics would only be able to file the charges, leaving to the ethics committees the determination of innocence or guilt. But that was exactly the power the independent counsel had – to just file charges. And we all now know that the filing of charges itself can have a disastrous effect, even if the accused turns out to be innocent, with little or no consequence for the official who filed the charges.

So when the 110th Congress begins tomorrow, it might be a better idea to limit the independent congressional office to conducting professional investigations of charges filed by members of Congress with the respective ethics committees. That would build political accountability into all parts of the process. The member who files charges that turn out to be groundless would be subject to voter disapproval back home. If the ethics committee chooses to file charges, then there would be a fully transparent process to determine the truth, with due process safeguards available to the accused. If the committee chooses not to bring charges, so too would transparency rules apply — the committee would have to explain fully why the evidence did not support bringing a charge.

In all respects, the ultimate jury, the ultimate supreme court, would be the voters. Us. Not a perfect system. But better than the alternatives.

Poll Shows Support For Democrats' Goals (AP)

By Darlene Superville

AP, January 3, 2007

Two of the Democrats' top goals — a higher minimum wage and federal funding of embryonic stem cell research — enjoy broad public support as the party takes control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years.

An overwhelming majority also supports making it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries.

But the jury is out on incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi. Most people say they do not know enough yet to have an opinion of the California Democrat who will be the first woman in that office, an Associated Press-AOL News poll found.

The survey results come as the 110th Congress is set to convene at noon Thursday, with Democrats eager to keep their promises to pass several pieces of legislation in the first 100 hours of business, including the minimum wage increase and stem cell research funding. Voters, exasperated by investigations into the ethics of GOP lawmakers and unhappy with the situation in Iraq, toppled Republican majorities in the House and Senate last November.

Democrats will hold a 233-202 edge in the House and will control the Senate by 51-49.

A boost to the $5.15-an-hour federal minimum wage would be the first since 1997. Democratic leaders have proposed raising it in stages to $7.25 an hour. President Bush has said he supports the idea, along with help for small businesses.

Fully 80 percent of survey respondents favor an increase, too.

Support is strongest among Democrats, 91 percent, while 65 percent of Republicans back the idea. Women, men without college degrees and single women all are especially likely to favor a minimum wage hike.

Nearly seven of 10 adults, 69 percent, favor the government taking steps to make it easier for people to buy prescription drugs from other countries, where some medicines cost significantly less than in the U.S.

Importing prescription drugs to the United States is illegal, but the Food and Drug Administration generally does not bar individuals from bringing in small amounts for personal use. At the same time, the government has estimated that buying drugs from other countries would do little to influence what they cost at home.

Some 56 percent of adults support easing restrictions on using federal money to pay for research on embryonic stem cells. Supporters say such research could lead to treatments for everything from Parkinson's disease to spinal cord injuries. Bush and other opponents say the embryos from which the cells are extracted are human lives that should not be destroyed in the name of science.

Bush kept a promise in 2001 when he limited federally funded research to lines of embryonic stem cells that had been created by that time. Last summer, he used the first veto of his presidency to reject a bill that would have directed more federal dollars toward embryonic stem cell research.

Democrats have pledged to reverse that outcome, setting up a possible veto showdown with the president.

Achieving the Democrats' goals could help Pelosi raise her public profile.

DOJ_NMG_0110674

She is the first woman to lead a party caucus in either house of Congress — she was elected leader of the House Democrats in 2002 — and now will be the first female speaker, second in line to succeed the president.

Yet as much as the 10-term congresswoman has been in the news over the years and, more recently, since the Democratic election rout on Nov. 7, people say they just don't know her.

More than five in 10 adults, 55 percent, don't know enough yet about Pelosi to have an opinion of her. Those with opinions to share were split, with 22 percent viewing her favorably and 22 percent unfavorably.

The telephone survey of 1,004 adults was conducted Dec. 19-21 by Ipsos, an international public opinion research company. The margin of sampling error was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Most Support 2 Of Dems' Top Goals, Poll Says (USAT)

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Americans overwhelmingly support two of the Democrats' top goals — increasing the minimum wage and making it easier to buy prescription drugs from other countries — as the party prepares to take control of Congress for the first time in a dozen years, an Associated Press-AOL Poll indicates.

When Congress reconvenes Thursday, Democrats will hold a 233-202 edge in the House and a 51-49 advantage in the Senate (two senators were elected as independents but will caucus with Democrats).

Party leaders want to boost the federal minimum wage — in stages — from $5.15 an hour to $7.25 an hour. President Bush has said he supports that idea. So do 80% of those polled by AP-AOL.

On prescription drugs, 69% favor making it easier to buy them from other countries — where they may cost significantly less.

The telephone survey of 1,004 adults was conducted Dec. 19-21 by Ipsos, an international public opinion research company. The margin of sampling error: +/-3 percentage points.

FBI notes alleged harsh treatment at Guantanamo

FBI agents and other employees deployed to the U.S. military's Guantanamo Bay prison complex witnessed or were told of more than two dozen incidents of harsh treatment of detainees, documents released Tuesday by the bureau show. They include one case in which an unidentified interrogator was rumored to have dressed as a priest and performed a mock baptism on a Muslim prisoner.

The incidents represent the results of an internal FBI survey of 493 agents or employees who were deployed to Guantanamo since the 2001 terrorist attacks. The FBI review concluded that none of its agents or employees was involved in the questionable treatment, much of which was outlined in news accounts that first appeared in 2004. —Kevin Johnson

Newspaper: Giuliani's plans for White House run leaked

In 140 candid pages that lay out his presidential campaign plans, former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani and his aides include everything from how much money he needs to raise ($100 million this year) to the problems that could scuttle his bid (including being more "liberal" than most Republicans), the New York Daily News reported Tuesday (nydailynews.com).

The newspaper said it obtained the campaign plan from "a source sympathetic to one of Giuliani's rivals for the White House." It had apparently been left behind at a GOP campaign stop last year.

Giuliani spokeswoman Sunny Mindel told the Daily News that the person who leaked the plan must be worried about "Rudy's poll numbers in New Hampshire and Iowa." She called the leaking "suspicious activity." Giuliani has not formally entered the 2008 race, but notes in the plan show he began meeting with supporters last April, the newspaper reported.

Opposing View: Keep Cameras Focused (USAT)

By Donald Wolfensberger

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Opposing view: Keep cameras focused ‘Open House’ serves Americans; ‘open window’ serves Peeping Toms.

By Donald Wolfensberger

Granting C-SPAN free gazing rights on the House floor is a terrible idea. Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi is right to reject the request.

Such free-roaming lens-groping would defeat the original purpose of broadcasting House debates. According to the final Rules Committee report on the issue in February 1978, that purpose "is to provide a complete, uninterrupted, and accurate record of the official proceedings and business of the House — a kind of visual and audio parallel to the Congressional Record."

The report rejected network calls for allowing panning and reaction shots: "The broadcast media's view is attuned to news and dramatic values," and "the way in which they move and focus cameras and cover the proceedings will be conditioned to and colored by that view."

The report concluded, however, that such news aspects of coverage must be subordinated "to the more fundamental need for a complete, uninterrupted, undistracted, unbiased, and completely accurate record of the official actions of the House."

The following June, the full House overwhelmingly affirmed that view by authorizing a House-operated broadcast system under the direction and control of the speaker and by rejecting a network pool arrangement. Speaker Thomas "Tip" O'Neill subsequently directed that the remotely controlled cameras in the galleries show only tight shots of the members speaking. O'Neill had a strong aversion to allowing any reaction shots that could bring ridicule on the House by showing inattentive members chatting, reading, or sleeping.

Today, viewers can get a sense of the overall chamber from wide-angle shots provided in between speakers and during voting periods. But there's a big difference between the "open House" we see on TV today and the kind of "open window" for TV Peeping Toms some would prefer.

The speaker's insistence on preserving the decorum and integrity of House proceedings is not an "anachronism." It is the very essence of a dignified public body.

Donald Wolfensberger is director of the Congress Project at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars and a former staff director of the House Rules Committee.

A Fairer House (WP)

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

THE NEW Democratic House majority has an ambitious plan for its first 100 hours in power, from increasing the minimum wage to strengthening ethics rules to having the federal government negotiate prescription drug prices. Unfortunately, its plans don't include getting those provisions passed in the democratic fashion that the Democrats promised to adhere to once in the majority. When Republicans took over in 1995, they at least went through the motions of putting their "Contract With America" proposals through the normal committee process. Democrats under Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) have decided not to bother with that, nor to let Republicans offer amendments on the floor, nor even to put a GOP alternative up for a vote. This is exactly the kind of high-handed mistreatment that Democrats complained about, justifiably, when they were in the minority.

Democrats offer various rationales for their about-face. They say the streamlined process is necessary because they've pledged to accomplish so much in their first 100 legislative hours. But what makes living up to that self-imposed deadline -- which will stretch on for weeks, in any event -- more important than living up to their promise of procedural fairness? And why, even if that deadline is sacrosanct, couldn't Republicans at least be offered an opportunity to offer alternatives on the floor?

Democrats also argue that their proposals have been fully vetted and debated, but in fact many of them involve complex policy choices and some are new proposals. Democrats howled when Republicans moved unilaterally to change the rules governing the operations of the House ethics committee; why is it different for them to move unilaterally to change ethics rules? Questions such as whether the minimum wage increase should be combined with tax breaks for small businesses and whether the federal government should be the only party negotiating Medicare prescription prices ought to be put up for discussion and a vote. If that causes a fracture in the Democratic caucus, so be it.

Republicans, who were only too happy to strong-arm and ignore Democrats when the GOP was in the majority, are now, of course, moaning about being abused. In a nice bit of political theater, they plan to offer Ms. Pelosi's own "Minority Bill of Rights" from 2004, which would provide for, among other things, "open, full and fair debate consisting of a full amendment process."

Democrats say that they'll adhere to their previous promises once their first flurry of business is finished. We look forward to that. But if they don't reconsider, they will set an unfortunate precedent that fairness will be offered on sufferance, when the majority finds it convenient, and not as a matter of principle. That would not be a good start for the 110th Congress.

Pentagon Redefines 'Emergency' (WSJ)

By Jonathan Karp

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Lockheed Martin Corp.'s new Joint Strike Fighter plane won't be ready to see action for years. But that didn't stop the Air Force from inserting two of the jets into the coming emergency-funding request for operations in Iraq.

The Pentagon's supplemental budgets traditionally pay for war costs such as personnel, equipment repairs and ammunition. But as the Joint Strike Fighter request shows, the coming supplemental is being used by the military services for more than replacing what has been lost in Iraq and Afghanistan. It is being used to acquire future weapons that normally would be funded through the regular Pentagon budget.

The fighter-jet request, which was confirmed by a senior Air Force official, is part of the Pentagon's proposed $99.7 billion war-fighting budget for the current fiscal year, which began Oct. 1. It comes on top of $70 billion in war funds already approved and the regular U.S. defense budget of $436.6 billion. The emergency supplemental budget has been cleared by the Pentagon and is awaiting approval by the Office of Management and Budget, which oversees funding requests for the White House. It is to be formally submitted to Congress after President Bush next month unveils the fiscal 2008 Pentagon budget request, which defense analysts expect to be nearly $470 billion.

An October directive from Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England opened the floodgates by allowing the services to request emergency funds to replace equipment and upgrade to newer models for the "overall efforts related to the global war on terror," not just operations in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"It's a feeding frenzy," says an army official involved in budget planning. "Using the supplemental budget, we're now buying the military we wish we had," he says, referring to former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's 2004 quote about inadequate equipment for troops.

Each year, the president submits his federal budget request to Congress, which in turn makes changes and works to appropriate funds. Supplementals -- which aren't limited to defense spending and have been used for matters such as Hurricane Katrina relief -- move on a parallel track, but are targeted to specific areas. In recent years, they have been treated as emergency funds outside the budget entirely -- which has become a sore point in Congress.

Of the supplemental's total $99.7 billion, $34 billion is slated for weapons procurement. Much of the $47.6 billion for operations and maintenance also will be available to contractors to repair and modernize equipment they supplied. About half of the $9.75 billion slated for Iraqi and Afghan forces is likely to be used to buy weapons and equipment, says James McAleese, a defense consultant in McLean, Va.

About $21 billion in the supplemental is headed to the Army, and several companies stand to benefit. General Dynamics Corp. likely will snare business from $3.9 billion for armored vehicles such as its Abrams tank and $7.4 billion to buy radios. ITT Corp. and Harris Corp. likely will be the biggest beneficiaries of radio purchases. BAE Systems PLC will win work for its Bradley fighting vehicle, while Armor Holdings Inc., AM General LLC and Oshkosh Truck Corp. will divvy up the proposed $5.4 billion for trucks. Lockheed and Raytheon Co. are expected to gain from demand for short-range tactical missiles.

In another boost for combat-vehicle makers General Dynamics and BAE, the Army is requesting $3.67 billion to accelerate the reconfiguration of ground forces into smaller units -- a process normally funded through the regular budget.

Among Air Force requests is $62 million for ballistic missiles, an unusual supplemental-budget item because they are strategic assets that haven't been used in Iraq or antiterrorism operations. The Navy is requesting $3.04 billion for new and repaired aircraft, an amount that likely exceeds battle losses. The Navy appears to be using supplemental funds to secure money ahead of the fiscal 2008 budget, expected next month, when it will face pressure to cut aircraft purchases to free up billions of dollars for a new aircraft carrier.

Lockheed and Boeing Co. stand to gain from Air Force and Navy aircraft requests. The Air Force has budgeted for 17 Lockheed C-130 cargo planes. Boeing, which gained 10 C-17 cargo planes in the most recent supplemental budget, could receive fresh orders for its Navy F-18 fighter jet and V-22 tilt-rotor aircraft, which is made with Textron Inc.'s Bell Helicopter unit and has yet to be used in combat.

It is unclear whether new Defense Secretary Robert Gates will seek to change the supplemental budget, which awaits White House approval. The new largess is a turnaround from two years ago, when the Pentagon tried unsuccessfully to rein in weapons spending. Defense officials say they hope the prospect of defense-industry jobs will help ease passage in Congress. The coming Democratic leadership -- and many Republican members of Congress -- are wary of supplemental budgets because there is less room to review and change the funding. Even the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission led by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, criticized this funding method, saying the war should be paid for through the main Pentagon budget.

"The latest supplemental budget is wildly out of synch with the political system, which wants more discipline and oversight," says Loren Thompson of the Washington-area Lexington Institute think tank.

An 'Honest,' 'Open' House, Where Cameras Can't Zoom Out (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The House of Representatives is often called "the People's House." So wouldn't it be nifty if the "people" could see what was going on in their own house?

But those watching on TV really can't. Only tight camera shots of lawmakers speaking on the floor -- or of the presiding officer in the chair -- are allowed. The camera is not permitted to pan the chamber. Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) had promised that the Democrats would have "the most honest, most open and most ethical Congress in history."

So Brian Lamb, the head of C-Span, which got the electronic eye into the House and Senate in the first place nearly three decades ago, thought this would be a great opportunity to improve coverage. (The GOP turned him down in 1985.)

He wrote Pelosi asking for more cameras, saying the current system "does a disservice to the institution and to the public." For example, the fixed camera means "you can never get a reaction shot" during a debate, he told us, so it "takes out of the experience any soul" or sense of the give-and-take.

Not so, Pelosi said in a Dec. 22 letter to Lamb. "I believe the dignity and decorum of the United States House of Representatives are best preserved by maintaining the current system of televised proceedings," she wrote.

"Dignity"? "Decorum"? In a place that folks such as Jim Traficant, Duke Cunningham and Mark Foley used to call home? Okay, she's obviously joking, but still. . . . As The Who sang years ago: "Meet the new boss, same as the old boss."Wind Is Not the Only Alternative Natural Gas

Seems like almost every trade association and nonprofit sends out a new calendar this time of year. Our favorite is one from the American Wind Energy Association. "We hope you will enjoy this visual 'tour' of some of the wind energy products now operating in our country," an enclosed letter says.

One especially exciting picture appears to tout both wind energy and methane. Best to stay upwind if possible.Keep the Empty Seats Out of the Shot

There was a fine turnout yesterday at the National Cathedral for the funeral of former president Gerald R. Ford. Tickets were hard to come by, and latecomers were turned away. Even so, seems there were some empty seats.

Just before the service began, an usher approached a Loop colleague sitting in the cheap seats on the left, the seats where you really are better off watching the monitor if you want to see anything.

"Does anyone want to sit in the center section?" the usher asked. "We need 10 people" to fill in the crowd. So a group of people trooped to the rear of the center section, just in front of the Boy Scouts sitting in the last four rows, to watch from there.From Interior to Big Oil

Remember former interior secretary Gale Norton? She soon will be general counsel for a Royal Dutch Shell division in Denver that's focusing on oil shale exploration in the Rockies. House Democrats plan to investigate Norton's former agency, especially for its cozy relationship with the oil and gas industry.

Enviros naturally criticized Norton's hiring, with one even saying the move would "undermine" Shell's efforts to project an "image as a good environmental steward." Predictably, Rep. Ed Markey (D-Mass.), a senior member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, said Shell's move was just another example of the "hand-in-glove relationship between Big Oil and the Bush administration's top Interior officials."

Well, maybe Greenpeace wasn't hiring.If Only She Had Some References for the Job

At the United Nations, where there is no U.S. ambassador, idle chatterers are talking about Victoria Nuland, now ambassador to NATO, as a possible choice to succeed John R. Bolton. Nuland, who is a career Foreign Service officer and is married to Robert Kagan, a contributor to the Washington Post op-ed page, was top foreign policy adviser to Vice President Cheney and before that an aide to Clinton confidante Strobe Talbott when he was deputy secretary of state. Well, the bases can't get more covered than that.GSA Earning a Few Admirers Out West

The GSA's fame has spread across the country. This just in from the Austin American-Statesman: "It will be little comfort to anyone who has ever undergone the torture of a building project to know that bigger doesn't mean better -- or easier. U.S. District Judge Lee Yeakel is learning a lot about government construction projects as he helps oversee the construction of the proposed federal courthouse. . . . He notes with a chuckle that he was advised that the U.S. General Services Administration -- the agency in charge of getting the project built -- has a motto: 'We're not happy until you're not happy.' "

Goodbyes Galore At State Department (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr., The Washington Wire

The Wall Street Journal.com, January 3, 2007

In yet another high-level departure from the State Department, Condoleezza Rice's energetic head of political-military relations, John Hillen, has told his colleagues he is leaving the administration this month. Hillen, a former Army officer and Gulf War veteran, served as the principal link between State and the Pentagon and was leading the administration's effort to build better security ties with Arab allies in the Persian Gulf in a bid to contain Iran's growing influence.

In an email to colleagues the day after Christmas, Hillen said that he and his family decided that it was best not "to commit to being in the administration until 2009." The note suggests that the White House has requested that all top appointees either commit to staying through the end of the administration, or leave as soon as possible. "It was clear that I need to commit more fully to some of the unique and immediate needs of my growing family and give Secretary Rice a chance to give a new [assistant secretary] a full two years to keep the momentum going," Hillen wrote in his email.

Beyond the Hillen departure, Rice has lost her deputy, Robert Zoellick, her United Nations ambassador, John Bolton, and her counselor, Philip Zelikow. No replacements for any of these posts have been announced.

Lawmakers, Others Eager For Part D Enrollment Numbers (HILL)

By Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 3, 2007

The sign-up period for prescription-drug coverage under Medicare Part D ended Sunday, and the Bush administration and observers of the program are eagerly waiting to see whether beneficiaries enrolled in plans best suited to their needs.

Encouraging elderly and disabled participants to reevaluate their 2006 plans, which changed in many cases, and compare them to other options on the market was the chief challenge during the second year of the program.

The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS), lawmakers, members of the health-insurance industry, and beneficiaries' advocates widely predicted that most people enrolled in Part D would stick with the coverage they selected during the inaugural enrollment period, between November 2005 and May 2006.

Numerous opinion polls conducted in 2006 indicated that the majority of Part D beneficiaries were generally satisfied with their drug coverage, despite complaining that the program was too complicated.

But the private insurers that provide the drug coverage made numerous alterations to their plans for 2007, including changing premiums, deductibles, cost-sharing obligations and the drugs they cover.

Moreover, with the massive task of establishing a brand-new program completed, the administration scaled back its education and outreach programs for the 2007 enrollment period.

Nevertheless, the administration has expressed confidence that beneficiaries were smart shoppers during the six-week sign-up period.

In a conference call with reporters last week, acting CMS Deputy Administrator Herb Kuhn pointed to the high volume of calls to Medicare's toll-free telephone hotline and of visits to Medicare's website as signs that beneficiaries were not simply succumbing to inertia, even if most of them did not elect to change plans.

According to CMS, the "Plan Finder" website, which allows beneficiaries to compare Part D options, received 30 million page views between Oct. 15 and Dec. 27. Five million calls were made to the hotline.

At the close of 2005 and again when the sign-up period ended in May 2006, CMS experienced a spike in online and telephone inquiries and in enrollment. A CMS spokesman said yesterday that figures regarding how many beneficiaries looked for information or signed up for plans during the final days of this year's enrollment period were not yet available.

An AARP lobbyist who is the group's national coordinator for health issues, Kirsten Sloan, said, "I think you'll find that most Medicare beneficiaries did shop around."

AARP conducted its own multifaceted outreach program, which ranged from waging a national advertising campaign to hosting small educational events with beneficiaries. "There are a myriad of ways to get information," Sloan, who praised CMS's efforts, said.

The AARP famously endorsed the bill that created Part D, to the consternation of many Democratic lawmakers. AARP's affiliated business operation co-sponsors a Part D plan with United Healthcare.

One critic of the program remains concerned that many beneficiaries did not realize that their benefits had changed, although he acknowledged that a final assessment is impossible until CMS releases its enrollment data.

"What portion of the Medicare population was aware of these changes? … We simply don't know," said Ron Pollack, president of the liberal healthcare advocacy group Families USA.

"Most people seemed unable to bear a whole new examination this year," said Medicare Rights Center President Robert Hayes, who has been a fierce detractor of Part D. Hayes predicted that many beneficiaries will get unwelcome surprises as they learn about changes to their benefits later in the year, after it's too late to change plans.

In addition to defending the quality of the benefits themselves, CMS and the health plans have had to answer for problems beneficiaries encountered when signing up for the program and accessing their benefits during the early months of Part D's first year.

These problems generated intense criticism from congressional Democrats and some advocacy groups.

Hayes offered faint praise for CMS's performance during the enrollment period of 2007. "Administratively, CMS is treading water competently," he said. Hayes believes that the structure of Part D is too complex to administer and too difficult for beneficiaries to use.

Although the process appears to have gone substantially more smoothly for the 2007 coverage period, it has not been without problems.

CMS has acknowledged the some health plans, including United Healthcare, took too long to provide beneficiaries with information about alterations to their coverage. Approximately 250,000 people who did not receive an "annual notice of change" document by Oct. 31 will have until Feb. 15 to choose a plan, CMS said last week.

DOJ_NMG_0110679

The availability of timely and accurate information on Part D plans, or the lack thereof, has been a recurrent theme in Democratic criticism of the program.

Incoming Senate Finance Committee Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) was one of two Democrats who helped to write the bill that created Part D, but he frequently has expressed dissatisfaction with the administration's and the health plans' performance in disseminating information to beneficiaries.

The problems with the annual notices of change prompted strong words from Baucus. "It is unacceptable that a number of drug plans failed to uphold their fundamental responsibility to give this notice to Medicare beneficiaries," he said in a written statement provided by his spokeswoman.

"We need to make sure that folks are getting all of the information that they need to make decisions during the open enrollment period," Baucus said.

Baucus also reiterated his vow to pursue changes to Part D to make it "more consistent and simpler for seniors to use."

Clyburn Leads Southern Blacks' Ascent To Top Posts In Congress (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In this time of change in Congress, Rep. James Clyburn, a minister's son from South Carolina, takes his place tomorrow as the House Majority Whip -- the No. 3 Democratic post and highest ever held by an African-American from a Southern district.

The 66-year-old Mr. Clyburn, who was 25 before the Voting Rights Act was enacted, symbolizes the rise of a set of Southern black lawmakers, shaped by the region and with a distinctive approach to politics separate from that of black leaders representing urban Northern districts.

Georgia Rep. John Lewis, a sharecropper's son who won national fame in the civil rights movement, will be chairman of a panel within the House tax-writing committee. Rep. Bennie Thompson, once a Mississippi alderman, becomes chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. Rep. Mel Watt moves up in the Financial Services panel important to a Charlotte banking industry just miles from where he grew up in poverty in North Carolina.

"We have come from a part of the country where it was legal for people to treat people differently because of their color," Mr. Thompson says. "In many instances you find a passion for making sure that our systems are fair and equitable. On the other hand you find a greater interest in community."

Their often rural roots and the black educational and religious institutions that sustained them through segregation still influence their politics. "It's like the turtle on the fence post: he didn't get there by himself," says Rep. Sanford Bishop (D., Ga.) "I come from a district that believes in God, country, work, family and guns, and not necessarily in that order. For rural blacks, a shotgun was just another tool on the farm and a way to protect you from the Klan."

Southern black lawmakers also tend to be more conservative than their Northern counterparts on social issues. Political necessity has required them to reach out to business and agricultural interests to gain white support. And growing up under segregation put a premium on personal relationships, with both blacks and whites, that can make them adept at building coalitions in the new Congress.

"I fish in a lot of ponds." Mr. Clyburn says, emphasizing his willingness to work with different factions. "I'm basically a manager. I've been managing something since I was 24 years old."

In Congress, that has meant fostering ties to departing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.), with whom Mr. Clyburn worked on tax legislation in 2000 important to depressed rural areas. Even as he did so, Mr. Clyburn was confronting then-Sen. Jesse Helms (R., N.C.) by persuading a reluctant President Clinton to make a recess appointment of an African-American to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Mr. Clyburn, one of 13 black freshmen elected to the House in 1992 from the South, is a strong labor Democrat. But he admires former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin for "sticking to his guns" in a recent standoff with party liberals; in 2003, Mr. Clyburn himself broke with his party to support a ban on late-term abortions.

Mr. Clyburn has built upon a set of extended family relationships from the region -- and across racial lines. "I Too Am a Southerner" is the working title of a book he is writing about his life. He says racial injustice continues today in cases of white individuals manipulating property values for rural black homeowners. But this is also a man who has served on the board of a prominent South Carolina bank and maintains a friendship with a Washington oil lobbyist, whose white grandfather built a bowling alley for blacks in Charleston in the '60s and then hired Mr. Clyburn to teach black customers the game.

Segregation fostered its own competitiveness. "Your parents told you, you had to be 'twice as good' and that's simmering in all of us," says Elijah Rogers, a Clyburn friend from their years at South Carolina State, an historically black college in Orangeburg, S.C. "Still today we correct each other if there is a slip in grammar."

DOJ_NMG_0110680

Biblical verses are spliced into conversation: "Whither thou goest, I will go," Mr. Clyburn says, invoking Ruth's pledge to Naomi. After taking over the Democratic caucus chairmanship in the last Congress, Mr. Clyburn, an African Methodist Episcopal churchgoer, insisted on beginning party meetings with a prayer: "I was always taught: You lead by precept and example. ... I thought it would be sinful to lay out precepts if I were not going to be an example."

As Congress prepares to write a new farm bill this year, Mr. Clyburn plans to read a prayer for farm workers at an event tomorrow. And amid the outcry for ethics standards, he served on a special panel that investigated his friend, former Rep. Earl Hilliard, a black Alabama Democrat who lost his seat after being reprimanded for misusing campaign funds in support of private companies in which he or his family had an interest.

"It was one of the hardest things I ever had to do," says Mr. Clyburn, who remains friends with Mr. Hilliard. "I sat with him, just as I'm sitting with you, and I told him I'm sorry, you screwed up, and this is the best I can do."

That record could help him as Democrats try to move their own rules changes this week to address ethics and lobbying abuses. And on their agenda next week is a minimum-wage increase, a key issue for Mr. Clyburn's district, which includes many of the poorest communities in South Carolina.

The decade-long freeze at $5.15 an hour has made it harder for low-wage workers to qualify for the child tax credit, which was indexed to inflation in the same period. And he has little sympathy for Republican demands that Democrats must bring their bill -- seeking a $2.10 hourly increase -- through committee and not directly to the floor.

"Sometimes it's good to be smart, sometimes it's good to be symbolic," he says. "I think we ought to bring that bill straight to the floor. The old leadership refused to bring it to the floor and we're going to bring it."

Segregation's mark is clear in his protective reserve. "He is guarded.... Emotionally you never throw that off," said Rep. Barney Frank (D., Mass.).

"I wasn't born this way," Mr. Clyburn says. "I taught myself to be as reserved as I am in order to survive."

As a boy, Mr. Clyburn dreamed of being in politics, despite warnings from older blacks to keep his ambitions in check. The civil-rights movement thrust him forward in college, when he was arrested several times for demonstrations. In an early case, the late Rev. I. DeQuincey Newman, a mentor and South Carolina civil-rights activist, picked him to take the stand at the trial after Mr. Clyburn and other black students were arrested during an Orangeburg, S.C., demonstration.

It was common then for Southern newspapers to print the names of black student protesters on the front page, inviting retaliation against their families. Rev. Newman argued that in a white society the Clyburn family was safe from economic retribution: "Your daddy is a minister and he ain't preaching to no white people. Your mother is a beautician and she's fixing no white folks' hair. You're independent of the system. Nobody gets fired. So you're it."

Mr. Clyburn says, "It was my parents. It was because of them I was picked out of the crowd. Wherever it is you are, you don't get there on your own."

John West, an early progressive among South Carolina governors, tapped him to be the first black staffer to a sitting governor in modern times. Their friendship grew and Mr. Clyburn became the state's human rights commissioner soon after, a post he kept for more than 17 years.

He twice failed in statewide races, but his efforts in South Carolina's Sixth District helped to oust a conservative Democrat in the 1970s who had won until then by playing to white tobacco interests and ignoring the black population. And when lines were redrawn to create a majority black district in the early '90s, Mr. Clyburn won a crowded primary without a costly runoff.

And with Sen. Barack Obama (D., Ill), an African-American considering a presidential run in 2008, Mr. Clyburn's annual fish fry in April is a must-attend session because of South Carolina's early primary.

"Don't tell me things don't change," Mr. Lewis says. "Walk in my shoes; walk in Jim Clyburn's."

Ethics Panel Closes Conyers Probe (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

The Republican-led House ethics committee -- in possibly its last action before Democrats take over Congress -- closed the three-year investigation of Rep. John Conyers Jr. after he agreed to stop using staffers for campaign work and personal errands.

Mr. Conyers, a Michigan Democrat, acknowledged a "lack of clarity" in his dealing with the taxpayer-financed staffers, who reportedly worked on political campaigns and performed other nonofficial jobs, including baby-sitting Mr. Conyers' children and tutoring his wife.

The case against Mr. Conyers was closed without punitive action or a letter of reproval from the Committee on Standards of Conduct, the ethics panel, which is comprised of five Democrats and five Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0110681

Some Republican lawmakers and congressional watchdogs say the "slap on the wrist" for Mr. Conyers raises doubts about new ethics rules that Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, promises for the first 100 hours of the 110th Congress that convenes tomorrow.

"It's a slap on the wrist, but the fact that they did anything is a big deal for [the ethics committee]," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington.

She did not expect the committee to be any tougher under Democratic control.

"It is always hard for the party in power to deal with congressional corruption," she said.

Last month, the ethics committee decided not to take action against Rep. Jim McDermott, despite finding that the Washington Democrat broke ethics rules in 1997 by giving reporters illegally taped telephone calls involving House leaders.

A Republican lawmaker familiar with both cases said Democrats on the committee blocked punitive action against their colleagues.

"It certainly brings into question the Democrats being strong on ethics," said the lawmaker, who did not want to be identified discussing ethics cases. "In this case [against Mr. Conyers], they are clearly not willing to sanction their own Democratic members."

Promises of ethics reforms were key to Democratic wins in the midterm elections that gave the party the majority in Congress, but ethical concerns have dogged House Democrats as they prepare to take leadership.

Mrs. Pelosi weathered criticism for backing Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, in his ill-fated run for majority leader. Mr. Murtha was tainted by involvement in the Abscam scandal of the early 1980s.

Rep. Alan B. Mollohan, a West Virginia Democrat who stepped down from the ethics committee last year because he was the target of a federal corruption probe, is slated to head the subcommittee that oversees the Justice Department budget.

Mrs. Pelosi did not return a call seeking comment. House Democratic leaders will present the ethics legislation today.

Lawmaker To Take Seat Provisionally (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

A Florida Republican who narrowly won a disputed election will take his place with the new House tomorrow, but Democrats will continue to fight in the courts for a new election.

Rep. Rush D. Holt, New Jersey Democrat, will stand on the chamber floor and ask House leaders to recognize a court challenge against Rep.-elect Vern Buchanan from Florida's 13th Congressional District.

"Mr. Holt's action will make clear that the swearing in of any member does not prejudice the legal case or the congressional investigations," said House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's spokeswoman, Jennifer Crider.

Mr. Holt has advocated that electronic voting machines be accompanied by a paper trail. The Florida election used electronic machines with no paper record.

Christine Jennings, who lost to Mr. Buchanan by 369 votes, is fighting in court the results of the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris, the former secretary of state who played a decisive role in the 2000 presidential election, and has filed a notice of contest with the House Administration Committee.

Mrs. Jennings is appealing a judge's ruling last week that denied her access to the electronic voting machines used in Sarasota County. The court battle in Florida will drag on, likely for months.

About 18,000 ballots, out of a total of about 238,000, recorded no preference in the race between Mr. Buchanan and Mrs. Jennings.

Mrs. Jennings has said that the large number of "undervotes" is likely the result of computer malfunction.

"There are some very serious questions about what happened," Miss Crider said.

Mr. Buchanan has said that state tests verified the reliability of the voting machines.

"Mr. Buchanan believes that the machines performed perfectly," said Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbets.

Republican leaders say the matter should be dropped.

"There is a time for politics, and there is a time for governing. The time for politics has passed," said Rep. Adam H. Putnam, Florida Republican, who chairs the House Republican Conference.

One Republican official, who was present at the recount performed in Florida, said there was "no question" that some votes were lost.

"But to the extent there were undervotes, there were just as many on the Republican side as there were on the Democrat side," the official said.

The House committee could begin an independent investigation by the end of this month, if the new chairman, Juanita Millender-McDonald, California Democrat, decides to pursue it.

DOJ_NMG_0110682

The committee does have the power to dismiss Mrs. Jennings' notice of contest, to declare the seat vacant, or to remove Mr. Buchanan and install Mrs. Jennings in his place, said George Shevlin, the Democrat staff director on the committee. The full House must approve any committee report.

Since 1933, House records show that only three out of 105 contested elections have gone in favor of the challenger.

Wage Bill Will Iron Out An Abramoff Wrinkle (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 3, 2007

House Democrats led by Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) are aiming to undo a controversial vestige of the Jack Abramoff era in the first 100 hours of the 110th Congress. Miller plans to include language raising wages in the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in a broader bill increasing the U.S. minimum wage.

In the past few years as the scandal involving Abramoff has unfolded, former Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) have been scrutinized for their ties to Abramoff and their alleged efforts to block legislation aimed at raising labor and immigration standards in the islands.

The Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands (CNMI) hired Abramoff in 1994 to work with GOP leaders to prevent the extension of the federal minimum-wage and immigration laws to the islands. The government canceled its lobbying contract with Abramoff in 2002 amid over-billing concerns.

The Marianas economy relies heavily on garment factories where laborers, many from China and the Philippines, are paid far less than the U.S. minimum wage to make clothing eligible to carry a "Made in the U.S." label.

Miller has been trying to extend U.S. federal minimum wage and immigration laws to the islands since 1996 and clashed repeatedly with DeLay on the issues. In the past, Miller also called on the then-GOP-controlled House Resources panel to investigate Abramoff's work for the islands, to no avail. Former Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.) was then serving as chairman of the panel. He lost his reelection in November after a bruising race that highlighted his ties to Abramoff and DeLay.

Now that Democrats control the House and Senate, Miller finally may get his way. Last year, House Democrats attached to a spending bill an amendment that would have raised the minimum wage and extended it to the Marianas. That bill eventually stalled. The current language would increase gradually the islands' minimum wage from $3.05 an hour to the federal level, which is now $5.15 an hour but would increase to $7.25 if the umbrella U.S. minimum-wage hike passes.

"People are being exploited in the Marianas Islands and they deserve to have a minimum-wage increase," Miller's chief of staff, Daniel Weiss, said.

"The bottom line here is anyone who works under the American flag deserves to be paid a fair wage," incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) spokesman, Drew Hammill, said.

The CNMI government, however, strongly opposes any increase in wages, arguing that local businesses may shut down as a result. In late December, a spokesman for the islands' current governor, Benigno Fitial, told the Marianas Variety that a wage increase could cause business closures, higher unemployment, and decreased tax revenues.

Indeed, changes to international trade law that have eliminated or reduced quotas and duties from other textile-producing companies have taken a toll on the islands' garment industry, which faces increased competition from China and Vietnam. In late December a large garment factory employing more than 1,000 workers shut down, the 12th to close in last few years.

The value of CNMI shipments of garments to the U.S. dropped more than 16 percent between 2004 to 2005, to $677 million from about $807 million, down from a 1999-2000 peak of $1 billion, according to U.S. Department of Commerce data cited in a December Government Accountability Office report.

A Democratic aide blamed the islands' weakened garment industry on changes to international trade laws brought about by the World Trade Organization's actions, noting that Congress has "no jurisdiction" to change those laws. House Democrats can try to end "slave labor" practices and that's what they're trying to do, the aide said.

Fitial will have a difficult time fighting the wage increase. He has a long history with Abramoff, DeLay, and the islands' garment industry. He has called Abramoff a "close friend" and has long opposed Miller's efforts to raise labor and immigration standards on the islands. Fitial served in CNMI's House, where DeLay aides helped him win the speakership. He also has served as vice president of Tan Holdings, a family conglomerate that owns numerous clothing factories on the islands and one of the firms that made up the Saipan Garment Manufacturer's Association, an Abramoff client.

When Abramoff was scheduled for sentencing last year, Fitial was one of 260 people who wrote a letter asking the judge for leniency. In it, Fitial called Abramoff a "personal friend and political champion" of the "beleaguered" Pacific islands.

"He was a natural crusader and political activist, with great sympathy for our un-represented Commonwealth," Fitial wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0110683

In late December, a spokesman for the CNMI governor's office said it is looking for a strong lobbying voice in Washington to oppose the minimum wage hike. Dan Mattoon, a former aide to Rep. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), had represented the Saipan Garment Manufacturers Association in 2005, but that contract ended last year.

Now that Democrats are in control, the political tide has turned and the governor's office may have a hard time finding a firm willing to take on its agenda, especially considering the islands' history with Abramoff and the tough campaigns many of its champions in Congress faced last cycle.

Doolittle's Marianas record became an issue in his tough reelection campaign when his opponent attacked him for tolerating "forced abortion and sex slavery" by supporting Abramoff in his defense of the islands' garment industry. A former Doolittle aide, Kevin Ring, worked for Abramoff heading up the CNMI contract in 2001.

Doolittle defended himself, claiming that he had no knowledge of the abuses, and blasted his opponent for running a desperate, negative campaign. Doolittle won reelection by just three percentage points.

Doolittle's office was closed yesterday and his press secretary did not return a call for comment.

But It's Thomas Jefferson's Koran! (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, the first Muslim elected to Congress, found himself under attack last month when he announced he'd take his oath of office on the Koran -- especially from Virginia Rep. Virgil Goode, who called it a threat to American values.

Yet the holy book at tomorrow's ceremony has an unassailably all-American provenance. We've learned that the new congressman -- in a savvy bit of political symbolism -- will hold the personal copy once owned by Thomas Jefferson.

"He wanted to use a Koran that was special," said Mark Dimunation, chief of the rare book and special collections division at the Library of Congress, who was contacted by the Minnesota Dem early in December. Dimunation, who grew up in Ellison's 5th District, was happy to help.

Jefferson's copy is an English translation by George Sale published in the 1750s; it survived the 1851 fire that destroyed most of Jefferson's collection and has his customary initialing on the pages. This isn't the first historic book used for swearing-in ceremonies -- the Library has allowed VIPs to use rare Bibles for inaugurations and other special occasions.

Ellison will take the official oath of office along with the other incoming members in the House chamber, then use the Koran in his individual, ceremonial oath with new Speaker Nancy Pelosi. "Keith is paying respect not only to the founding fathers' belief in religious freedom but the Constitution itself," said Ellison spokesman Rick Jauert.

One person unlikely to be swayed by the book's illustrious history is Goode, who released a letter two weeks ago objecting to Ellison's use of the Koran. "I believe that the overwhelming majority of voters in my district would prefer the use of the Bible," the Virginia Republican told Fox News, and then went on to warn about what he regards as the dangers of Muslims immigrating to the United States and Muslims gaining elective office.

Yeah, but what about a Koran that belonged to one of the greatest Virginians in history? Goode, who represents Jefferson's birthplace of Albemarle County, had no comment yesterday.Love, Etc.

Sala's Choice (WP)

By Harold Meyerson

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Sala Galant Lipschultz Burton made two critical decisions during her lifetime, the full meaning of which could not have been apparent to her at the time she made them. The first, in the early 1950s, was to marry a young lawyer and Democratic activist named Phil Burton, who was to become the single most important member of the House of Representatives in the '60s and '70s.

As a leader of the California Young Democrats and a rising force in San Francisco politics, the young Phil Burton had already won a reputation for his political brilliance -- and for his explosive temper. Nobody worked harder for liberal causes. Nobody demanded more of his associates and staffers: If they didn't match his crazy hours, his ability to count votes or his understanding of the art of the deal, they'd be subjected to eruptions from the Burton volcano.

Throughout his career, in fact, the biggest obstacle to Burton's success was his rage. That he accomplished as much as he did was due in part to Sala. The late John Jacobs, whose 1995 biography of Burton, "A Rage for Justice," is one of the great political biographies of the past quarter-century, reported that Sala was Phil's confidante, co-strategist and champion, but that was only the beginning. "She cleaned up his messes," Jacobs wrote, "soothing and placating those he insulted or abused. She alone could intervene in a conversation to shut him up."

Phil Burton was first elected to the House in 1964. In his 19 years as a congressman -- he died of a ruptured aorta in 1983 -- he was responsible for the legislation that established Supplemental Security Income (SSI) for the aged, blind and disabled; created black-lung compensation for coal miners; increased the minimum wage; made strikers eligible for food stamps; greatly expanded the size and number of national parks; and abolished the House Un-American Activities Committee. More broadly, he broke the power of the old Dixiecrat barons in the House by subjecting committee chairmanships to secret ballot elections within the Democratic caucus. He engineered reapportionments of California that were greatly to his party's benefit, and he steered contributions to the Democratic candidates who needed them most.

When he died, Sala succeeded him in a special election. Just four years later, in January 1987, Sala herself lay dying of cancer. She asked Phil's brother, John Burton, who had represented an adjoining congressional district in San Francisco, to come to the hospital and told him that she wanted "Nancy" to succeed her. For a moment, John Burton was unsure which Nancy she was referring to, but as she explained to family and friends at her bedside, the woman in question was the former California Democratic Party chair Nancy Pelosi.

Pelosi had been associated with the Burtons since shortly after she and her husband had moved to San Francisco in the years when Phil's star was rising. The Pelosis had a large, attractive house, and the first thing she recalls Phil saying to her was, "We'll use this for fundraisers." But Phil's appreciation of Pelosi wasn't confined to her abilities as a hostess. He saw in her a commitment to progressive values and a clear political sense of how to turn those values into laws. When John stepped down from Congress in 1982, Phil asked Pelosi to stand for election to replace him, but she declined, saying her children were too young. Five years later, Sala, on her deathbed, evidently saw in Pelosi the same qualities that Phil had seen.

This time, her children older, Pelosi said yes, and in April she won a squeaker of a special election.

In the House, Pelosi has continually sought the counsel of another Burton protege, George Miller, whose district is right across the Bay from hers. Appointed early on to a seat on the Appropriations Committee, she demonstrated, says the committee's new chairman, Wisconsin's David Obey, that she was "operational" -- a Burton word meaning able to steer difficult measures to enactment.

When the Newt Gingrich Republicans swept to power in 1994, political almanac authors Michael Barone and Grant Ujifusa termed it "the collapse of the House that Phil Burton built." Nancy Pelosi, as smooth as Phil Burton was rough, is far more open to openness in the legislative process than her sometimes secretive mentor was. Politically, she understands the limits of the possible and that she can expand them only as far as the American people are willing to go. But she also knows that the American people want Congress to do any number of things that were stubbornly, and, in the end, suicidally resisted by the now-collapsed house that Newt Gingrich built.

The Burtonistas -- with different causes and methods for a new era, to be sure -- are back. Score two for you, Sala.

A Final Farewell To President Ford (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 2 — In a soaring tribute to a modest man, Gerald R. Ford was remembered on Tuesday as bringing the ordinary virtues of decency, integrity and humility to mend a broken government after the pain of war and scandal.

Gerald R. Ford was remembered at his funeral Tuesday in Washington as bringing decency, integrity and humility to government. Betty Ford, lower left, was escorted by President Bush as three former presidents, George Bush, Bill Clinton and Jimmy Carter, looked on. Pages A14-15.

"Amid all the turmoil, Gerald Ford was a rock of stability," President Bush told the gathering of generations of Washington's powerful at Washington National Cathedral. "And when he put his hand on his family Bible to take the presidential oath of office, he brought grace to a moment of great doubt."

The cathedral's grand setting and the pomp of a state funeral provided a counterpoint for the unassuming character praised by the eulogists.

President Bush's father called Mr. Ford "a Norman Rockwell painting come to life"; Tom Brokaw, the former television anchor, described "Citizen Ford" as a "champion of Main Street values"; and Henry A. Kissinger said the man he served as secretary of state "had the virtues of small-town America."

When the cathedral's limestone arches echoed, it was with the drums and brass of Aaron Copland's "Fanfare for the Common Man," and the ushers directing the capacity crowd of 3,700 to their seats were uniformed Boy Scouts, a tribute to Mr. Ford's youthful achievement of the rank of Eagle Scout. Among the hymns was "Eternal Father, Strong to Save," known as the Navy Hymn, a particular favorite of Mr. Ford, who served in the Pacific during World War II.

President Bush, overseeing a deeply unpopular war in Iraq and perhaps pondering his own legacy, lauded Mr. Ford's "firm resolve" in sending the Marines to rescue the crew of the American merchant ship Mayagüez when it was seized by Cambodia. He suggested that some acts widely condemned during Mr. Ford's administration in the 1970s had come to look wiser in historical perspective, including his pardon for his immediate predecessor, Richard M. Nixon.

In addition, Mr. Bush noted that Mr. Ford was criticized for signing the Helsinki Accords, the 1975 agreement that ratified borders in Soviet-dominated Eastern Europe while also setting new standards for human rights.

"History has shown that document helped bring down the Soviet Union as courageous men and women behind the Iron Curtain used it to demand their God-given liberties," Mr. Bush said.

Mr. Ford's coffin arrived at the cathedral by motorcade from the Capitol, a final journey through the city where he served as 13-term congressman, vice president and finally president, the only person to hold the nation's top two offices without being elected to either.

After the 90-minute Episcopal funeral service, Mr. Ford's body was flown from Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington to his hometown, Grand Rapids, Mich., for a burial service on Wednesday in a plot beside the museum that bears his name.

In Washington, the Gothic cathedral where Mr. Ford helped dedicate the nave in 1976, became for the morning a crossroads of the capital's past and present, with Supreme Court justices and members of Congress in the south transept facing scores of foreign ambassadors and former foreign leaders in the north transept.

Across an aisle from the diplomats sat Mr. Ford's honorary pallbearers, including in the front row Mr. Kissinger; Donald H. Rumsfeld, who served as defense secretary to both Mr. Ford and the current President Bush; Alan Greenspan, the former Federal Reserve chief who was Mr. Ford's top economic adviser; James A. Baker III, who ran Mr. Ford's unsuccessful 1976 campaign for president; and Brent Scowcroft, Mr. Ford's national security adviser.

Facing the altar, where Mr. Ford's coffin, draped by a flag, sat, were Mr. Ford's widow, Betty, who was escorted in and out of the cathedral by President Bush, and the Ford children, Steve, Jack, Mike and Susan.

Across the nave from the Ford family sat President Bush and Laura Bush, and Vice President Dick Cheney, who served Mr. Ford as chief of staff, with his wife, Lynne; several current cabinet members and three former presidents — the elder Mr. Bush with his wife, Barbara; Jimmy Carter and his wife, Rosalynn; and Bill Clinton and his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, and their daughter, Chelsea. With them was Nancy Reagan, the former first lady.

Like much of the outpouring of affection for Mr. Ford since he died at his home in Rancho Mirage, Calif., on Dec. 26 at the age of 93, the service focused on what President Bush called the "calm and healing" the former president brought to "one of the most divisive moments in our nation's history." Mr. Ford, the House minority leader, succeeded first Vice President Spiro T. Agnew and then President Nixon after both men were forced from office by scandal.

"Gerald Ford brought to the political arena no demons, no hidden agenda, no hit list or acts of vengeance," said Mr. Brokaw, who explained that Mr. Ford had asked him to address the funeral as a representative of the press corps. "He knew who he was, and he didn't require consultants or gurus to change him."

Mr. Kissinger in particular emphasized the substantive achievements of Mr. Ford in foreign policy, saying the "deserved commentary" on Mr. Ford's character "has sometimes obscured how sweeping and lasting were his achievements." In remarks perhaps intended to reflect on his own record as well as Mr. Ford's, he credited the former president with keeping ethnic conflicts in Cyprus and Lebanon from spiraling out of control, producing the first peace agreement between Israel and Egypt and presiding over "the final agony of Indochina with dignity and wisdom."

Historians, Mr. Kissinger added, will find "that the cold war could not have been won had not Gerald Ford emerged at a tragic period to restore equilibrium to America and confidence in its international role."

A few hours after the service, the plane carrying Mr. Ford's body circled over the University of Michigan football stadium, where he had been a standout center and linebacker, then landed at the airport named for him in Grand Rapids. The university's marching band, which arrived on a red-eye flight from California after the Rose Bowl game on Monday, solemnly played its fight song, "The Victors."

About 200 friends and local dignitaries invited by Mr. Ford's family attended the brief ceremony before the 13-mile motorcade to his presidential museum in downtown Grand Rapids, passing thousands of residents who lined the streets, some holding signs that said "Welcome home." Billboards around the city declared "Gerald 'Our' Ford: 1913-2006."

Despite a fierce, bitter wind blowing off the Grand River, Tim Micho waited with his video camera and 7-year-old daughter, Tessa, for two and a half hours to watch the motorcade pass by.

"She'll probably never get to see something like this again," Mr. Micho, 43, said. "It's so moving to see this many people out here to support him."

A single bagpiper played "Amazing Grace" as Betty Ford and the rest of the family made their way slowly behind the coffin into the museum, a geometric, glassy structure along the water. Inside, they held a brief service for family and honored guests, including former President Carter.

Like many along the streets in Grand Rapids, Gov. Jennifer M. Granholm spoke of Mr. Ford's deep roots in the region.

Here, Ms. Granholm said, Mr. Ford had learned from his family "some good Midwestern values like hard work and sportsmanship and integrity and honesty." Here, he had played high school football (with a few men, now frail, in attendance on Tuesday), had married and had been elected to Congress.

"Welcome home," Ms. Granholm said, "to the people that you reflected so well when you were in Washington."

Country Honors Ford (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The last hurrahs of the nation's capital rang out Tuesday for Gerald R. Ford, honoring a common man with uncommon decency and humility who ran a brief but consequential presidency at a time of great political turmoil.

Eulogists from President Bush to former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger praised the nation's 38th president for using old-fashioned Midwestern qualities to cool the nation's Watergate passions.

But in their laudatory remarks at Washington's National Cathedral, there also appeared to be an undercurrent of unspoken regret that such values have become rarer in America's politics. Indeed, analysts have criticized a higher degree of nastiness and lack of authenticity in today's politics.

"Gerald Ford assumed the presidency when the nation needed a leader of character and humility, and we found it in the man from Grand Rapids," President Bush said in his eulogy, also citing Ford's "courage and common sense."

The president's father, former President George H.W. Bush, said: "As Americans, we generally eschew notions of the indispensable man, and yet during those traumatic times, few if any of our public leaders could have stepped into the breach and rekindled our national faith as did President Gerald R. Ford."

In some respects, Ford was different because he was an anomaly in the White House. He rose to power in Congress, where compromise is a way of life, and never aspired to be president. Only through the resignations of Vice President Spiro Agnew and then President Richard Nixon was he thrust into the office in 1974 during the middle of the Watergate scandal.

Former NBC television anchor Tom Brokaw said Ford came to office with "no demons, no hidden agendas, no hit lists, no acts of vengeance" that he implied other presidents might have had. Brokaw said Ford knew who he was and didn't require consultants or gurus to change him. And, he called Ford "the most underestimated" president.

The senior Bush added, "To know Jerry was to know a Norman Rockwell painting come to life, an avuncular figure quick to smile, frequently with his pipe in his mouth."

The comments weren't always this kind when Ford was in office. There were questions about his qualifications, his intelligence and his inability to appear "presidential"—that is, imperialistic or official or regal. And, on television, he was lampooned for being a stumbler.

Yet, on this day, he was honored as a man with many achievements not generally recognized at the time, a man who presided over the end of the Vietnam era and played a big role in the international arena. The president had declared a national day of mourning. The government and the financial markets were closed.

Kissinger cited a number of Ford foreign-policy initiatives, including in the Middle East and in adoption of an international human-rights standard that he said helped bring about the demise of the former Soviet Union.

"Few [historians] will dispute that the Cold War could not have been won had not Gerald Ford emerged at a tragic period to restore equilibrium to America and confidence in its international role," Kissinger said.

The sun was bright but the wind was stiff as official Washington—and former Washington officials—paid their last tribute to Ford, who died a week ago Tuesday at the age of 93. Later in the day, his body was flown to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich., where he will be buried on Wednesday.

Tuesday's ceremony had some of the same pomp and circumstance common to state funerals of other fallen heads of state, but the Ford family—true to the late president's wishes—had trimmed some of the more elaborate touches here in Washington, such as a horse-drawn carriage and a military fly-over.

The cathedral was jammed with political VIPs, from former Presidents Bill Clinton, Jimmy Carter and George H.W. Bush (and their wives) to former First Lady Nancy Reagan. The late president's wife, Betty, sat in the front row with her family and fought back tears.

Clinton, sitting next to his wife Hillary, now a senator and likely presidential candidate, could be seen wiping away a tear during the ceremony.

Though there were many young people in the audience, the crowd included many political figures that Ford either appointed or influenced in their careers—Vice President Dick Cheney, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, former Secretary of State James Baker, and former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan.

For the most part it was a solemn service, but President Bush's father added a touch of humor that brought laughter to the audience, including Mrs. Ford and her family.

The senior Bush said he and Ford shared a love for golf and that Ford's play was suspect. Bush reported that Ford told friends that "I know I'm playing better golf because I'm hitting fewer spectators."

Bush said that Ford could laugh at those who mimicked him, and then added: "I remember that lesson well, since being able to laugh at yourself is essential in public life. I'd tell you more about that, but as [comedian and Bush mimic] Dana Carvey would say, 'Not gonna do it. Wouldn't be prudent.'"

At the ceremony, Ford's son, Jack, and his daughter, Susan Ford Bales, read scriptures from the Bible. It was a traditional Christian funeral with music provided by military bands and, in one case, by opera star Denyce Graves, who sang "The Lord's Prayer."

Ford's body was brought to Washington on Saturday from California, and there was a service Saturday night in the Capitol Rotunda. Thousands visited the Capitol to view the coffin over the holiday weekend.

On the way to the cathedral, the motorcade rolled down Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House, and then it passed by the vice president's residence on Massachusetts Avenue a short distance away.

It was a long Washington farewell for the man from Michigan. As he closed his eulogy, Brokaw said: "Farewell, Mr. President. Thank you, citizen Ford."

In State Funeral, A Farewell To Ford (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Gerald Rudolph Ford, the Boy Scout, football star and congressman thrust by history rather than ambition into the presidency at a fateful moment for his nation, was bidden farewell by Washington in a regal state funeral yesterday and taken home to Michigan for burial.

As cannons boomed and bells pealed and 10,650 organ pipes echoed through the cavernous Washington National Cathedral, Ford received a sendoff he could hardly have imagined as a young Midwestern boy abandoned by his father shortly after birth 93 years ago. A "Norman Rockwell painting come to life," as one successor put it, Ford was honored as a man of little pretense whose impact extended beyond his 895 days in office.

"Gerald Ford assumed the presidency when the nation needed a leader of character and humility, and we found it in the man from Grand Rapids," President Bush told 3,772 heads of state, justices, lawmakers, military officers, Cabinet secretaries, diplomats and other mourners. "President Ford's time in office was brief, but history will long remember the courage and common sense that helped restore trust in the workings of our democracy."

Betty Ford, 88, endured the fifth straight day of official ceremony with grief playing out on her face, and yet the former first lady never lost her composure and even smiled wistfully as Bush recounted funny stories from the early days of her 58-year marriage. She and her family then headed to Andrews Air Force Base, boarded one of the presidential jets that serve as Air Force One and took her husband's body to Grand Rapids, Mich., where it will be interred today in a hillside tomb at his presidential museum as 21 aircraft fly overhead in a missing-man formation.

The day's events brought together all four living presidents and leaders of both parties for Washington's second state funeral in 2 1/2 years. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) shook hands and sat behind outgoing Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), while former presidents Bill Clinton and George H.W. Bush cheerfully renewed their friendship. But as Democrats assume control of Congress tomorrow, the bipartisanship that many extolled in Ford appears little more than a testimonial to the past. Just minutes before Ford's casket was brought into the cathedral, the office of House Republican leader John A. Boehner (Ohio) e-mailed reporters a statement assailing Democrats for being partisan in their plans for the new Congress.

Ford knew what it was like to be in the minority. A lawyer who served in the Navy during World War II, the Republican was elected to the House in 1948 and over the course of a quarter-century rose to be minority leader in a chamber long dominated by Democrats. His greatest aspiration was to be speaker, but his fate changed when his party was engulfed by scandal.

President Richard M. Nixon appointed him vice president in 1973 to replace Spiro T. Agnew, who was forced from office by corruption allegations, and then on Aug. 9, 1974, Ford succeeded Nixon, who was forced from office by Watergate. In the process, Ford became the first commander in chief never to have been elected president or vice president.

His pardon of Nixon for any crimes he may have committed became Ford's signature decision, one that may have cost him the 1976 election but over time has come to be seen as an act of statesmanship that saved the nation the wrenching ordeal of putting a former president on trial. Ford's eventful presidency also saw the ignominious end of the Vietnam War, a stubborn recession at home, a Middle East cease-fire, a daring raid to rescue a merchant marine crew captured by Cambodians, and treaties with the Soviet Union.

"In recent days, the deserved commentary on Gerald Ford's character has sometimes obscured how sweeping and lasting were his achievements," former secretary of state Henry A. Kissinger said in a eulogy at the cathedral.

The state funeral was a classic Washington affair, soaked in power and pageantry even if not quite as elaborate as the one held for Ronald Reagan in June 2004. For two hours before it began, many of the men and women who have run the country for the past three decades flowed into the vaulted cathedral.

Boy Scouts stood at strategic points holding up signs reading "SS" and "Green" to indicate sections where guests were supposed to sit, according to a peculiar Washington hierarchy that distinguishes between political rock stars and the merely powerful. The south transept was for congressional leaders and Supreme Court justices, including John Paul Stevens, the oldest member of the court and Ford's only appointee. The north transept was for the diplomatic corps and the honorary pallbearers.

In front of the altar sat the honored guests: the Ford family and the former presidents. Before the service began, Jimmy Carter, sitting in the front row with his wife, Rosalynn, leaned back over his chair to chat with Clinton, as Chelsea Clinton talked with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. When the elder Bushes arrived, Barbara headed straight to her seat, while the 41st president stopped to shake hands with former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres.

As Carter, Clinton and the elder Bush greeted one another, it served as a reminder that the world's most exclusive club has shrunk considerably in the past few years. Nancy Reagan, last at the cathedral to memorialize her own husband, arrived wearing dark glasses. When former NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw forgot to mention her as he greeted the first families in his eulogy, she whispered to Rosalynn Carter, then made a slight, sardonic wave in Brokaw's direction.

Ford's Washington farewell began at the Capitol, where his casket lay in state over the weekend. About 36,000 people came through the Rotunda to pay respects, a considerable showing but a fraction of the estimated 200,000 who showed up for Reagan. The casket, initially brought to the House doors to remember his time there, was moved yesterday morning to the Senate doors to mark his service as vice president and Senate president.

Draped in a flag and borne aloft by a nine-man military honor guard, the casket left the Capitol to a 21-gun salute, and the motorcade paused by the White House en route to the cathedral, where it was welcomed to the strains of "Hail to the Chief." As the organ played "America, the Beautiful," President Bush escorted Betty Ford down the center aisle, her eyes focused forward, never glancing at the crowd.

She stood in the front row amid her children, Susan, Jack, Michael and Steven, as the honorary pallbearers entered, including Vice President Cheney, former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, former national security adviser Brent

Scowcroft, former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, all Ford administration veterans. The honor guard brought in the casket and lay it on a catafalque before the pulpit.

Jack Ford recited a passage from Isaiah and Susan Ford Bales from James. Her voice quavered a bit as she read. The elder Bush lightened the atmosphere, telling stories illustrating the former president's less serious side. Ford, he said, understood the value of laughing at himself. Bush said he could elaborate but would not, then imitated comedian Dana Carvey imitating Bush: "Not gonna do it. Wouldn't be prudent."

Brokaw likewise mixed seriousness and humor, joking that some of Ford's 1970s-era jackets should be "eligible for a presidential pardon." But he praised him as "the most underestimated" president. "Gerald Ford brought to the political arena no demons, no hidden agenda, no hit list or acts of vengeance," Brokaw said. As he finished, he turned to the casket: "Farewell, Mr. President. Thank you, Citizen Ford."

In his homily, Ford's pastor from California, the Rev. Robert G. Certain, recalled that the former president shortly before his death raised with him the subject of the Episcopal Church schism over the consecration of a gay bishop and the blessings of same-sex unions. "He said that he did not think they should be divisive for anyone who lived by the great commandments and the great commission to love God and to love neighbor," Certain said.

After two hours, the casket was brought out of the cathedral and the bourdon bell tolled 38 times for the 38th president as the cortege made its way to Andrews for the final trip home. Accompanying the family was Jimmy Carter, who defeated Ford in 1976 but later grew to be a close friend. At Ford's request, Carter will speak at today's service.

In contrast to the Washington pomp, Ford's return to Grand Rapids took place on a more personal scale. The casket was greeted at Gerald R. Ford International Airport by the marching band from the University of Michigan, where Ford was a football star, playing the school's rousing fight song.

As thousands of Michigan residents lined the streets near the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum on a cold, windy afternoon, a sign in Beaner's Coffee read, "Gerald Our Ford." Outside the Gerald R. Ford Federal Building, a young fan wore a Michigan football jersey and draped a school flag over his shoulders in Ford's honor. Dozens of Boy Scouts from the Gerald R. Ford Council saluted as the hearse passed. Lines snaked out of the museum, where his casket was set for an all-night viewing.

"Michigan's president," he was called by the state's Democratic governor, Jennifer Granholm. A man of intellect and achievement, she said, "in a plain brown wrapper."

'Sincere' Ford Honored (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

The humble yet extraordinary life of Gerald R. Ford was heralded yesterday in a solemn and sometimes humorous service at the National Cathedral that brought together four presidents, dozens of Cabinet secretaries and lawmakers and some of the former president's friendly foes members of the Washington press corps.

With 3,000 mourners packed into the massive church, and strains of "Fanfare for the Common Man" still wafting in the air, eight U.S. service members carried a flag-draped casket down the long aisle, their crisp steps echoing in the silent nave. Betty Ford, 88, and her children, along with Ford grandchildren and great-grandchildren, looked on as the body of Mr. Ford, who died Dec. 26 at 93, passed by.

Throughout the 90-minute service, speakers praised the humility and constancy of the former president, who once said his lifelong ambition was to become speaker of the House, not president.

"When he thought that the nation needed to put Watergate behind us, he made the tough and decent decision to pardon President Nixon, even though that decision probably cost him the presidential election," President Bush said in his eulogy.

"In President Ford, the world saw the best of America, and America found a man whose character and leadership would bring calm and healing to one of the most divisive moments in our nation's history."

Other speakers recalled Mr. Ford's "sincerity, serenity and integrity," as former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger put it, but each returned to the theme that the humble Midwesterner nearly single-handedly saved the presidency by pardoning Mr. Nixon a month after he took office to end what he called "our national nightmare."

Former President George Bush said that just the swearing-in of Mr. Ford as president "instantly restored the honor of the Oval Office and helped America begin to turn the page on one of our saddest chapters."

"Jerry Ford's decency was the ideal remedy for the deception of Watergate. For this and for so much more, his presidency will be remembered as a time of healing in our land," the elder Mr. Bush said.

In his eulogy, Mr. Kissinger, who served under Mr. Ford, countered the notion that the man who held the office for just 29 months served only as a caretaker president with no real achievements in office. Mr. Kissinger said Mr. Ford quelled violence in

Cyprus and Lebanon, presided stoically over the end of the Vietnam War and played a key role in the Cold War that ended 15 years after his presidency.

"Historians will debate for a long time over which president contributed most to victory in the Cold War. Few will dispute that the Cold War could not have been won had not Gerald Ford emerged at a tragic period to restore equilibrium to America and confidence in its international role," Mr. Kissinger said.

Mrs. Ford, who was married to the former president for 58 years, kept her eyes closed through most of the service, which included biblical readings, performances by the Armed Forces Chorus and the U.S. Marine Orchestra, and a homily by the Rev. Robert Certain, the rector at the Fords' California parish.

Former Presidents Jimmy Carter, who defeated Mr. Ford in the 1976 election, and Bill Clinton did not speak at the funeral. But former NBC News anchor Tom Brokaw was asked last year by Mr. Ford to deliver a eulogy. The newsman said the White House changed the day Mr. Nixon left.

"In Gerald Ford, the man he was in public, he was also that man in private. Gerald Ford brought to the political arena no demons, no hidden agenda, no hit list or acts of vengeance," Mr. Brokaw said. "We could be adversaries, but we were never his enemy, and that was a welcomed change in status from his predecessor's time."

In the crowd, reporter Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, whose coverage of the Watergate scandal helped bring down Mr. Nixon's presidency, nodded as, nearby, Sam Donaldson, former White House correspondent for ABC News, looked on.

In a moment of levity, Mr. Brokaw noted that Mr. Ford had the unfortunate fate to be president in the 1970s, when "we were all trapped in what passed for style with lapels out to here, white belts, plaid jackets."

"The rest of us have been able to destroy most of the evidence of our fashion meltdown, but presidents are not so lucky. Some of those jackets I think that they're eligible for a presidential pardon, or at least a digital touch-up," he said to laughter.

The elder Mr. Bush, 82, also broke up the crowd when he observed that Mr. Ford, a college football standout and avid sportsman, was parodied as a stumbling buffoon, especially by "Saturday Night Live" star Chevy Chase.

"On the lighter side, Jerry and I shared a common love of golf and also a reputation for suspect play before large crowds. 'I know I'm playing better golf,' President Ford once reported to friends, 'because I'm hitting fewer spectators,'" he said.

Among the attendees at yesterday's service were former Secretaries of State Colin L. Powell and James A. Baker III, former Vice President Al Gore, Supreme Court Justices John G. Roberts Jr. and Clarence Thomas, Nancy Reagan who mourned her husband, Ronald, at the cathedral in 2004 and former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. Vice President Dick Cheney, who was Mr. Ford's chief of staff, was one of the honorary pallbearers and, at the end of the ceremony, walked alone behind the casket as the service members carried it out of the cathedral.

Former Defense Secretary and Ford Chief of Staff Donald H. Rumsfeld and Bob Dole, Mr. Ford's 1976 running mate, also were in attendance.

Mr. Ford was the only former Eagle Scout to become president. Decorated Eagle Scouts served as ushers at the funeral.

The cathedral bells that had tolled 38 times as the 38th president's cortege arrived on a brisk day were silent as his hearse pulled away, en route to Andrews Air Force Base. Along the route, spectators stood by the road, some waving flags, others with their hands on their hearts, one woman holding a sign that said simply "Thank You."

At the base, the casket was lifted aboard a presidential Boeing 747 amid the strains of "Going Home" and flown to Grand Rapids, Mich., Mr. Ford's final resting place. The marching band from the University of Michigan his alma mater, where he played center on the football team that twice won national championships greeted the plane, which carried members of his family and others in the funeral party, including Mr. Carter and his wife, Rosalynn.

In Grand Rapids, which the Nebraska-born Mr. Ford adopted as his hometown and represented in Congress for a quarter century, Mr. Ford's presidential museum was opening its doors for an 18-hour public viewing, stretching overnight, before his burial this afternoon.

Former President Ford Remembered For His Decency (MCT)

By William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON - Washington's political elite and ordinary citizens said goodbye to Gerald R. Ford on Tuesday at a final state funeral at Washington National Cathedral, fondly remembering the 38th president as a common man who guided the country through the uncommon times of Watergate and the end of the Vietnam War.

The service at the majestic cathedral highlighted a day of pageantry and poignancy, in which Washington's old guard, three former presidents and a host of foreign luminaries assembled to pay tribute to the humble Midwesterner who aspired to be speaker of the House of Representatives but wound up occupying the Oval Office instead.

"In President Ford, the world saw the best of America, and America found a man whose character and leadership would bring calm and healing to one of the most divisive moments in our nation's history," President Bush told the 3,000 invitation-only mourners who packed the hilltop cathedral.

Eulogizing Ford, the current and former Presidents Bush and former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger spoke of a good man whose word was solid, whose politics were principled and whose heart was devoid of lust for power.

"In his understated way he did his duty as a leader, not as a performer playing to the gallery," Kissinger said. "Gerald Ford had the virtues of small-town America: sincerity, serenity and integrity."

Former President George H.W. Bush recalled Ford as "a Norman Rockwell painting come to life, an avuncular figure quick to smile, frequently with a pipe in his mouth," and someone with "a heart as big and open as the Midwest plains on which he was born."

He was one of several speakers who suggested that Ford's unassuming manner may have resulted in his being underappreciated, if not an underrated president. The elder Bush equated Ford's leadership after Richard Nixon's Watergate resignation as one of history's great presidential moments.

"History has a way of meshing man and moment," he said. "Just as President Lincoln's stubborn devotion to our Constitution kept the union together during the Civil War, and just as FDR's optimism was the perfect answer to the despair of the Great Depression, so, too, can we say that Jerry Ford's decency was the ideal remedy for the deception of Watergate."

Kissinger noted that Ford left office with a thick portfolio of international accomplishments, including the first political agreement between Israel and Egypt, helping to keep ethnic conflicts in Cyprus and Lebanon from igniting into a regional war and helping to establish the modern human-rights movement by backing the Helsinki Accords of 1975.

At the time, Ronald Reagan and other conservatives criticized that agreement as a land giveaway to the Soviet Union, despite a provision forcing Moscow to recognize human and religious rights.

"History has shown that it helped bring down the Soviet Union, as courageous men and women behind the Iron Curtain used it to demand their God-given liberties," the current President Bush said.

The elder Bush lightened the solemn service by recalling Ford's sense of humor and his approval of comedian Chevy Chase's stumbling, bumbling imitation of him on NBC's "Saturday Night Live," even though Ford was, in fact, a superb athlete.

Bush said Ford taught him to laugh at himself. The former president wanted to tell more but, breaking into an imitation of "Saturday Night Live" alum Dana Carvey imitating him, said, "Na gonna do it. Wouldn't be prudent."

If Ford was underappreciated in life, he's been viewed with reverence and purpose since his passing Dec. 26 at age 93. Thousands lined up to view his flag-draped casket as it lay in state at the Capitol Rotunda over the weekend.

In a solemn ceremony Tuesday, the casket was moved from the Capitol to a hearse as Army gunners fired a 21-gun salute and a military band played "Hail to the Chief." A slow motorcade left the Capitol and made a brief pass by the White House, which Ford occupied from Aug. 9, 1974, to Jan. 20, 1977.

The Right Rev. John Bryson Chane, the Episcopal bishop of Washington, greeted Ford's casket at the cathedral steps and said a prayer over it.

Inside, President Bush escorted a frail but stoic widow Betty Ford down the long central aisle to the front pew, which housed the rest of the Ford family.

All three living former presidents - the elder Bush, Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton - attended the service, as did three former secretaries of state: Kissinger, Colin Powell and James A. Baker III. Former Republican New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y. - each a possible presidential candidate - also attended.

Former Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., who was Ford's vice-presidential running mate in 1976, served as an honorary pallbearer, along with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Vice President Dick Cheney, former National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft and members of Ford's Cabinet.

After the service, Ford's body was flown aboard a presidential 747 to Grand Rapids, Mich., where he was raised. His remains were moved to the Gerald Ford Presidential Museum, where they were to lie in repose for public viewing until Wednesday.

A private family funeral is scheduled for Wednesday, followed by private burial at the Ford museum.

Nation Honors Gerald R. Ford (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — The nation's capital bade a stately farewell today to Gerald Rudolph Ford, the nation's 38th president, at a formal state funeral where he was lauded by the current president as "a good and decent man" whose affability cloaked a "firm resolve."

DOJ_NMG_0110692

"Gerald Ford assumed the presidency when the nation needed a leader of character and humility, and we found it in the man from Grand Rapids," President Bush told the august crowd in Washington's National Cathedral, gilded by former presidents and first ladies and serenaded by a half-dozen choirs and orchestras.

"President Ford's time in office was brief," Bush said, "but history will long remember the courage and common sense that helped restore trust in the workings of our democracy."

The funeral culminated four days of ceremonies in Washington that reflected the character and career of the man: the earnest Midwestern House member, the high-minded congressional leader and the accidental president who led the country through one of its most turbulent periods.

"History has a way of matching man and moment," said former President George H.W. Bush, comparing Ford to other presidents who ruled in dark times. "And just as President Lincoln's stubborn devotion to our Constitution kept the union together during the Civil War, and just as FDR's optimism was the perfect antidote to the despair of the Great Depression, so too can we say that Jerry Ford's decency was the ideal remedy for the deception of Watergate."

After the services at Washington's imposing National Cathedral, Ford's body was flown aboard Air Force One to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich., where his presidential library is located and where he will be buried Wednesday.

It was the second presidential funeral in less than three years for the nation's capital, which pulled out all the stops for a regal sendoff for Ronald Reagan in 2004.

By contrast, while Ford's funeral had all the military trappings accorded a former commander-in-chief — multiple 21-gun salutes, honor guards, military choruses — there were also notes of the ordinary. Ford's children greeted members of the public who came to pay their respects as their father lay in state in the Capitol Rotunda. Ford's casket was carried from the Capitol to the cathedral in a conventional hearse instead of a horse-drawn caisson. At Andrews Air Force Base, a troop of Boy Scouts, one in blue jeans, saluted to say goodbye.

And when Ford's casket was unloaded in Michigan, the marching band from the University of Michigan — where he had been a star football player — struck up a somber version of the Michigan fight song. As president, Ford had preferred that tune to the usual fanfare of "Hail to the Chief."

Former NBC anchorman Tom Brokaw, whom Ford had asked to deliver his eulogy, praised him for bringing "Main Street values" to the White House.

"Once there, he stayed true to form, never believing that he was suddenly wise and infallible because he drank his morning coffee from a cup with the presidential seal," Brokaw said.

The funeral for a transitional president came during another time of transition in the nation's capital, as political leaders prepared for this week's transfer of congressional power from Republicans to Democrats.

Ford's Funeral Draws Array Of Politicians And Dignitaries (NYT)

By RACHEL L. SWARNS

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 2 — Scores of politicians and dignitaries from across the political spectrum poured into Washington National Cathedral on a clear and blustery Tuesday to mourn President Gerald R. Ford at his funeral service here.

Skip to next paragraph President Bush, who escorted Mr. Ford's widow, Betty, into the church, addressed the invited guests. Three former presidents — Bill Clinton, George Bush and Jimmy Carter — also came to pay their final respects, accompanied by their wives, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York; Barbara Bush; and Rosalynn Carter. Nancy Reagan, the widow of President Ronald Reagan, whose funeral was held in the cathedral in 2004, also attended the service.

The mourners included Shimon Peres, the former Israeli prime minister, and several members of Congress, including Representatives Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming House speaker, and J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois, the outgoing speaker. John G. Roberts Jr., the chief justice of the United States, took his seat in the cavernous cathedral as did Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York City. Adrian M. Fenty, who was sworn in as mayor of Washington on Tuesday morning, also attended.

For many former Ford administration officials, the service was a somber reunion. The honorary pallbearers included Vice President Dick Cheney and Donald H. Rumsfeld, former defense secretary, who both served as chief of staff to Mr. Ford; Henry A. Kissinger, former secretary of state; Brent Scowcroft, former national security adviser; and Alan Greenspan, who led Mr. Ford's council of economic advisers years before he became chairman of the Federal Reserve.

The prominent guests included:

BUSH ADMINISTRATION OFFICIALS Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates; Secretary of the Treasury Henry M. Paulson Jr.; Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency; Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales; and Robert S. Mueller III, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

SUPREME COURT JUSTICES Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Anthony M. Kennedy, John Paul Stevens and Clarence Thomas.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS Senators Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts; Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona; Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan; Richard G. Lugar, Republican of Indiana; Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania; and Representatives Steny H. Hoyer, incoming House majority leader and Democrat of Maryland; and John A. Boehner, incoming House minority leader and Republican of Ohio.

EX-LAWMAKERS George Allen, former senator, Republican of Virginia; Newt Gingrich, former Republican House speaker; Alan K. Simpson, former senator, Republican of Wyoming; and Fred Thompson, former senator, Republican of Tennessee.

EX-WHITE HOUSE OFFICIALS Colin L. Powell, former secretary of state; John R. Bolton, former United States ambassador to the United Nations; Madeleine K. Albright, former secretary of state; and Dan Quayle, former vice president.

OTHER DIGNITARIES Rudolph W. Giuliani, former mayor of New York; Vernon E. Jordan Jr., Washington lawyer and prominent Democrat; and Anthony A. Williams, former mayor of Washington.

Congress Says Goodbye To The Late President Gerald R. Ford (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich And Kelly Mccormack

The Hill, January 3, 2007

Capitol Hill's memorial ceremonies for former President Gerald Ford ended yesterday as members of his family and many of Washington's elite silently watched his flag-draped casket being carried down the Senate steps.

Under clear skies on a cold, bright day, eight members of the honor guard slowly carried the coffin to the hearse down a line of official mourners, including Vice President Dick Cheney, former Secretaries of State James Baker and Henry Kissinger, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and former Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.).

Betty Ford and other family members huddled together against the wind, which whipped around the Capitol.

Before Ford's coffin was driven from Capitol Hill to the National Cathedral, the former president was given a 21-gun salute and the military band played "Hail to the Chief."

After the memorial service at the cathedral, Ford's body was driven to Andrews Air Force Base and then flown to Michigan for further ceremonies.

Ford's coffin had been on display to the public since Saturday evening after a ceremony in the Capitol Rotunda. The casket had arrived on Saturday to the sound of an artillery salute that sent slight tremors through building. The United States Army Band played "The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

Saturday's service was interrupted briefly when former Michigan Rep. William Broomfield (R) collapsed. He was treated by outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and the attending physician, and transported to George Washington Medical Center.

Outgoing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) and Cheney recalled Ford in speeches at the service.

"In judgment, he was sober and serious, unafraid of decisions … calm and steady by nature … always the still point in the turning wheel," said Cheney, who served as Ford's chief of staff in the White House. "He answered courtesy with courtesy; he answered discourtesy with courtesy."

Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.), talking to reporters, choked up as he recalled his interactions with the former president, whose congressional seat he now holds.

"He was exactly what we needed at the time of Watergate," Ehlers said. "People finally are starting to realize what he did for this country."

Ford represented his Michigan district for nearly 25 years, and for eight of them was minority leader, before being chosen by President Richard Nixon to replaced Vice President Spiro Agnew in 1973. The following year, in the aftermath of the Watergate scandal, Ford became president under the 25th Amendment to the Constitution.

Throughout his tenure in the House, Ford was well-liked and respected on both sides of the aisle. He "quickly became popular" because of his "positive outlook," according the House Historian's Office. "He was mostly soft-spoken, modest, and, as he described himself to be, 'a moderate in domestic affairs, an internationalist in foreign affairs and a conservative in fiscal policy.'"

Though he was asked to run for Senate and governor of Michigan in the 1950s, Ford declined because "his true ambition was to someday become Speaker of the House," the House Historian's Office said.

DOJ_NMG_0110694

In 1961 Ford became ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee's Defense Subcommittee and received the special award of "Congressman's Congressman" for his work on military budgets, the House Historian's Office said. The same year, Ford defeated Rep. Charles Hoeven (R-Iowa) to become chairman of the House Republican Conference.

In 1965 Ford narrowly defeated Rep. Charles Halleck (R-Ind.) to become minority leader.

Incoming House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.), who served with Ford in the early 1970s, remembered him as "a very decent human being who helped make the institution work and recognized that [working across the aisle] would make the country a better place.

"He didn't think it was a mortal sin to pass legislation from the other side of the aisle."

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Washington

It was a scene that Mary McCarthy could have written the devil out of: a funeral for a fine, bland fellow that filled everybody with unfine, unbland thoughts. The formal serenity of the service, disguised, but only barely, the virulent rivalries and envies and grudges and grievances that have roiled this group for many decades.

None of the eulogists noted the irony that the man who ushered out one long national nightmare had ushered in another, the one we're living in now. It was Gerald Ford, after all, who gave America the gift of Dick Cheney and Donald Rumsfeld — the gift that keeps on taking.

The two former Ford officials, who doomed Iraq to civil war and despoiled American values, were honorary pallbearers yesterday, as was that other slippery and solipsistic courtier, Henry Kissinger.

The Group was even more on edge because of a remarkable trellis of peppery opinions that had tumbled out of the man in the coffin, posthumously. The late president, hailed as the most understated and decent guy in the world, had given a series of interviews on the condition they be held until his death — a belated but bracing smackdown of many of his distinguished mourners.

It was impossible not to wonder what the luminaries were truly thinking, as they sat listening to fugues of Bach and Brahms and encomiums to the ordinary-guy leader.

Nancy Reagan's imperturbable expression behind her big square sunglasses did not disguise the gloating words visible in the bubble over her head: "And they call this a funeral?"

It could not compare, of course, to the incredible Princess of Wales treatment that her husband had for his state funeral. And Nancy, hypersensitive to any slights to her Ronnie, would not have been pleased with Mr. Ford's interview with Michael Beschloss published in Newsweek, in which he blamed Ronald Reagan for costing him the 1976 election by challenging his nomination and then failing to hit the trail for him.

It was good of Mr. Ford to bring 41 and 43 together in a solemn respite from their uneasy competition over Iraq.

"Told you so, you sons of guns — we were right to stop at Safwan and stay out of Baghdad," the father's bubble read, as he watched Rummy and Henry the K, both of whom had treated Poppy with such veiled contempt, as though he were a feather duster. "Those vicious Moktada-loving Shiites dancing around Saddam's dead body prove that Brent and I were right."

Lynne Cheney glared at Poppy as he gave his eulogy, knowing that he privately thinks that the vice president has destroyed not only Iraq and American foreign policy, but the Bush family name. Her storm cloud of a bubble is expurgated.

Hillary's bubble was full of mockery for another New Yorker in the National Cathedral: "You think you're so smart, Rudy, but you leave your entire presidential battle plan in a hotel room for your rivals to find? The victim role doesn't suit you." Condi's bubble was as opaquely dark as Hillary's was risibly light — drooping with the inchoate fear that her nearby erstwhile mentor, Brent Scowcroft, had been right about Iraq after all.

As Poppy spoke from the altar, praising Mr. Ford's generosity, he must have been mulling that his predecessor was ungenerous in spitting on him from the grave. Mr. Ford told Mr. Beschloss that Bush Sr. had sold out the party to the hard right and had taken a phony, pandering position on abortion.

Poppy had to have enjoyed watching Dr. K get up and lavish praise on his old boss, after Mr. Ford had sniggered to Bob Woodward that the "coy" Bavarian diva had "the thinnest skin of any public figure I ever knew."

W. graciously walked Betty Ford down the aisle, even as he must have curdled inside about her husband's telling Mr. Woodward that it had been "a big mistake" on the part of W., Dick Cheney and Rummy to justify the Iraq war with nonexistent W.M.D. "I just don't think we should go hellfire damnation around the globe freeing people, unless it is directly related to our own national security," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0110695

Ex-presidents weren't supposed to criticize sitting presidents. Adding insult to injury, Woodward himself was in the cathedral. How did he manage to get all these deathbed confessions, W. had to wonder. "Jeez," his bubble read, "does he have an interview with my old man in the can?"

Rummy's pop-up was as cocky as ever: "Golly, I've been gone three weeks and things are really looking up in Iraq."

James Baker's secret thoughts were as bright as his tie: "I tried to help you out, son, but you're too dang stubborn. Or 'resolute.' Stubolute. A clear case of TMC — too much Cheney."

Dick Cheney's bubble was trouble: "I'm surging, I'm surging, I'm surging."

The Respectful Eyes Of America (WP)

By Tom Shales

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Television can still rise to the occasion when the occasion warrants.

Yesterday's coverage of the funeral of former president Gerald Ford found network correspondents and technicians on their best behavior for the most part, the solemn beauty of the ceremony at Washington National Cathedral virtually forcing them to exercise restraint and good taste.

What might be called TV's networks of record -- ABC, CBS, NBC and cable's CNN -- covered the proceedings from early morning, following the casket from the Capitol, down the Senate steps, along Pennsylvania Avenue, past the White House and then to the cathedral, where "eulogizers," as CBS's Katie Couric called them, paid tribute to the well-liked 38th president.

As the big and more established networks conveyed a kind of official aura, NBC's quirky cable outfit MSNBC offered more flavorful and colorful, but still respectful, coverage. Chris Matthews, anchoring with Keith Olbermann, at one point told viewers -- as cameras scanned the famous faces of those gathered in the cathedral -- "These are Washington people. For better or for worse, this is the Establishment you're looking at right here. This is the A-list of the people who run this city."

Matthews dares to say what other people are thinking but refrain from saying -- for better or for worse.

Couric and many of her colleagues on the big networks committed the common error of talking over scenes that did not require any talking -- or, to the contrary, called for quiet. When the choir and band performed "America" and other patriotic songs, Katie and crew kept up fairly constant chatter. Over on NBC at the same time, presidential historian Michael Beschloss unfortunately was directed to yak away, ignoring the music in the cathedral.

ABC anchor Charles Gibson showed the most tact and discretion, limiting his remarks to things viewers actually might need to know. Gibson, of course, has more authority and experience behind him as anchor and correspondent than either Couric or NBC's Brian Williams. Not that Williams lacked for intelligent comments; he just perhaps made too many of them.

Incredibly, CBS cut away from the ceremony in the cathedral to show viewers excerpts from an interview that President Ford had given correspondent Phil Jones -- in 1984! Ford, discussing widespread protests erupting in the country when he took office, said he hoped "voices were lowered" under of his calming influence. Bob Schieffer then quoted the "voices lowered" remark -- while the chorus and orchestra played "America the Beautiful."

All this talk of lowered voices could lead a viewer to talk back to the correspondents and anchors: "Lower yours, for heaven's sake."

Worst of all was an NBC commentator who interrupted the choir singing "America the Beautiful" to repeat a story he'd read in the New York Times -- about the Fords' dog having pooped on a White House carpet. "There are so many stories like that," the reporter said -- and so many more opportune times to tell them.

The CBS coverage was marred by a director's or producer's insistence on dividing the screen up in boxes, with a large amount of space taken up by "The Death of a President," the title CBS gave its coverage. The network seemed to be waving its own flag in viewers' faces, while ABC tried to keep its logo and other extraneous material to a minimum.

The pictures, after all, were beautiful as the sun poured down on the city. The honor guard, lined up in two columns on the Senate steps, cast dramatic, striking shadows in the early-morning light. Later, the cathedral looked regal and imposing in a master shot of it sitting on a high point in the city.

Throughout the coverage, anchors and reporters marveled at the poise and stamina of Betty Ford, the president's widow, who had been through hours and hours of memorial activities even before the trip from the Capitol to the cathedral began. She entered the cathedral on the arm of President Bush and then sat among, and seemed supported by, her children -- son Steven on one side and daughter Susan on the other. It was a moving portrait of family solidarity.

One realized what a tremendous impression the Fords had made on the country in spite of the fact that Ford was in office a relatively short time after Nixon's resignation.

DOJ_NMG_0110696

Television was a presence at the event in more ways than one. Former president George H.W. Bush brought up the '70s lampooning of Ford on NBC's "Saturday Night Live," with Chevy Chase portraying him as physically bumbling even though Ford was, many commentators said, the most athletic president of his century.

Bush also did an impression of Dana Carvey doing an impression of him ("Not gonna do it, wouldn't be prudent"), a reminder of how influential "Saturday Night Live" has been in American pop culture. In the interest of propriety, though, it might have been better if the elder Bush had stuck to the topic of Ford and not mentioned his own experience with the show. He might also have mentioned that Ford took the ribbing so good-naturedly that he taped a "live from New York" opening in the Oval Office for use on the program.

The current president praised Ford for making an unpopular decision -- the pardon of Nixon -- and sticking to it. That was also a theme of Bush's most recent radio address. Some reporters saw it as Bush's thinly veiled attempt to compare his own unpopular pursuit of the Iraq war with Ford's action -- and a way of saying both men were courageously standing on principle.

The eulogy by former NBC anchor Tom Brokaw was not memorable. Brokaw said Ford asked him last year to be part of such a ceremony whenever it was held, although Brokaw said modestly that Ford made the request because "I think he wanted to be sure the White House press corps was represented" -- not because he thought Brokaw was a brilliant orator. Brokaw, who seemed to smirk throughout his remarks, ended with a banal "Farewell, Mr. President. Thank you, Citizen Ford."

Cameras kept panning the faces in the cathedral -- an auspicious assemblage that included former presidents Bill Clinton, Jimmy Carter and Bush and their first ladies. CBS relied too much on what might be called Coffin-Cam, long and steady shots of the flag-draped casket, which, after all, didn't do anything but sit there, as was to be expected. Viewers would rather have seen the faces of the famous and celebrated.

CBS coverage overall was disappointing, and ABC's was probably the best of the major networks.

On CNN, meanwhile, Wolf Blitzer took the strange step of interrupting the coverage to apologize for a goof made the previous day on his "Situation Room" show. According to a media-watchdog Web site, Blitzer said he "just wanted to make a correction" and continued: "We had a bad graphic. We were doing a piece on the hunt for Osama bin Laden in this new year, 2007. Unfortunately, instead of saying, 'Where is Osama?' it said, 'Where is Obama?' I'm going to be calling Sen. Barack Obama to make a personal apology."

Yes, you do that, Wolf.

If not all the speeches praising Ford were unusually eloquent, the music in the cathedral was. During the singing of "O God Our Help in Ages Past," a camera caught Betty Ford mouthing the word "beautiful" to her daughter. After the services, Matthews raved about Denyce Graves's singing of the Lord's Prayer. It was a breathtaking performance.

Chimes rang outside the cathedral, and Olbermann, Matthews's on-air partner, said gratuitously, "Ask not for whom the bell tolls." Matthews pronounced the ceremony "sublime" and said he thought President Bush's eulogy was better than his father's, an opinion not likely to be widely shared.

As Ford's body was taken to Andrews Air Force Base, the major broadcast networks signed off and rushed back to the cacophony of regularly scheduled commercial programming. Cable news networks stayed with the story.

It was a memorable morning, a national gathering by television, and a reminder that for all the talk about blogs and YouTube and MySpace, there are still moments and events that only the networks can adequately convey.

This, obviously, was one of them.

Widow, Children Face Grief Together (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — Her marriage was only three weeks old when she became a political wife. Fifty-eight years later, surrounded and strengthened by her family, former first lady Betty Ford performed one of her last official acts in that role.

Appearing fragile but stoic, Betty Ford, 88, blinked back tears and managed an occasional smile during a series of tributes Tuesday to her late husband, to her and to their enduring partnership.

President Bush said during an emotional memorial service at Washington National Cathedral that former president Gerald Ford was "still counting himself lucky to have Betty at his side."

Sitting between daughter Susan and son Steven at the cathedral, Betty Ford could be seen bowing her head or dabbing at her eyes with a handkerchief.

Before she headed to Grand Rapids, Mich., where the former president was to be buried, Betty seemed to break down briefly during a cannon salute at Andrews Air Force Base. Her military escort leaned over in concern and patted her arm.

The sisterhood of first ladies was out in force at the cathedral: Laura Bush, Barbara Bush, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Rosalind Carter, Nancy Reagan. Only Lady Bird Johnson was missing.

DOJ_NMG_0110697

Betty Ford is known for going public with her battles against breast cancer and addictions to alcohol and prescription drugs.

Tom Brokaw, a television journalist who covered the Ford White House for NBC, praised the Fords for drawing attention to problems that needed it.

"Was there a more supportive husband in America than when his beloved Betty began to speak out on issues that were not politically correct at the time?" he asked during the memorial service.

Many scenes Tuesday showed the closeness of the Ford family: Betty's smile as Susan whispered in her ear, and her sons' care as they escorted her in and out of cars and buildings. In a windy morning chill, the children and grandchildren clustered around her, forming a human wall of comfort and warmth as they waited for the late president's casket to be carried down the U.S. Capitol steps.

Sheila Weidenfeld, Betty Ford's former press secretary, told MSNBC her ex-boss "understands exactly what her duty is. … She's always been somewhat fragile. To be outside at her age in the weather is not the easiest thing, but you'd never know it looking at her. She is doing what she knows she wants to do and what she must do."

It wasn't all grim duty. Betty Ford grinned when Brokaw recalled the fashion "meltdowns" of the 1970s — "trousers so patterned that they would give you a migraine" and jackets that should be "eligible for a presidential pardon."

Bush evoked general laughter when he described Gerald Ford's "idea of a honeymoon" — driving his bride to Ann Arbor the day after their wedding for brunch before a Michigan-Northwestern game.

Bush also quoted Ford's tribute to Betty on the day he took the presidential oath of office: "I am indebted to no man and only to one woman, my dear wife."

A Final Public Service By A Steadfast First Lady (WP)

By Neely Tucker

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Betty Ford, observed in these days of national mourning:

Frail. Determined. Quiet. Tired.

She was 88 and clearly exhausted.

She was resting on the arm of the president of the United States when she emerged from the darkness of Washington National Cathedral into the weak January sunlight yesterday, following her husband's coffin. She did not speak during the service, except to turn to her daughter, Susan, and mouth the word "beautiful" after a moving rendition of "O God, Our Help in Ages Past." She was surrounded by family, including her three sons.

She will bury her husband today on a hillside back home in Michigan.

Then, three decades after leaving the White House, she will finally be relieved of the duties of being first lady, a job that comes with no description but endless expectations. The final duty is burying one's husband under the glare of public attention. This has become a de facto job requirement in the past century, when first ladies began to routinely outlive their husbands.

"This is a very frail woman, and by God, she's in charge," says Dick Capen, a longtime family friend, a newspaper publisher and diplomat who visited with Betty Ford at the family's private service in Palm Desert, Calif. "You could see it in her face. She's 88 years old, and she wasn't going to sit down. She's an incredible lady."

"She's been great," says Melvin Laird, the former congressman and defense secretary, and a close family friend for nearly half a century, speaking by phone from his Florida home. "Jerry always worried about her, but she was the one who really took over, really watched out for him."

Though Betty Ford has spoken no public word since her husband died (her statement announcing his death was a written release) she has nonetheless had a public role to play. First ladies leave the White House, but they never leave the job. They become the public face of the nation's grieving when their spouses die. Their role blends public duty and private emotion, but the public is expected to hold sway.

"When I reflect upon my Washington career I wonder how I ever faced it," Grace Coolidge observed late in life, after burying her husband. "There was a sense of detachment. This was I, and yet not I -- this was the wife of the president and she took precedence over me; my personal likes and dislikes must be subordinated to the consideration of those things which were required of her."

When Woodrow Wilson suffered a massive stroke in office, paralyzed but not yet dead, his wife, Edith, virtually took over. She refused to let people see him, becoming the intermediary through which the nation dealt with its president. It caused a crisis and a furor. She was unmoved: "I am not thinking of the country now, I am thinking of my husband."

This is understandable but not practical: The love of one's spouse must take second place to national need.

DOJ_NMG_0110698

It is the consensus among historians that Jacqueline Kennedy, in her bloodstained dress while Lyndon B. Johnson took the oath of office in Dallas, is the model image of this. She walked into the White House as the Queen of Camelot and walked out as a woman whose dignity helped hold together a shocked nation.

The Lincoln assassination a century earlier proves the point via an opposite example. Mary Todd Lincoln, already unstable of emotion and personality, dissolved after her husband was shot. She offered the nation no such grace note.

Since the Civil War, only three presidents have outlived their wives.

"The first lady is not a private person grieving, they're a public icon, and we look to them for strength and how to behave," says Myra Gutin, professor of communications at Rider University and author of "The President's Partner: The First Lady in the Twentieth Century."

She says it has left one constant:

"If they cry, it seems like they did it privately, not on the public stage," she says.

Betty Ford spent her last official weekend in Washington with her family at the Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, a few blocks from the White House. She walked, resting on arms of a family member, a military official, the vice president, the president. She kept her gaze level, her eyes steady. She attended services at the Capitol Rotunda, the cathedral, the landmarks of official Washington.

Her lips were pursed, save for offering a quiet smile to family or friends. She shed no public tears.

She was being strong; maybe for the nation, maybe for herself.

Then, yesterday afternoon, the plane lifted her and her family up into the bright blue sky, heading north, heading home.

One last funeral, and then no more.

Leaving the pages of history must sometimes be an answered prayer.

Remembering A Leader And The Party That Was (WP)

By Dan Balz And David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The honorary pallbearers who walked slowly up the aisle at Washington National Cathedral yesterday at the funeral of former president Gerald R. Ford were as familiar as when they served the 38th president, symbolizing continuity through four decades of Republican administrations.

The names included Cheney, Rumsfeld, Baker, Greenspan and Scowcroft, officials who have served multiple Republican presidents. But their presence masked a far different reality, which is that the Republican Party that spawned Ford and his brand of Midwestern conservatism barely exists today.

It was a tribute to Ford's character that the speakers at yesterday's funeral devoted their remarks largely to personal attributes -- honesty, integrity and modesty -- that they said helped stabilize the country after the traumas and divisions of the Watergate scandal and the end of the Nixon presidency.

But in sharp contrast to the commentary after the death of former president Ronald Reagan, there were no remembrances of Ford as an architect of modern conservatism or a force behind the GOP's ascendance. The Republican Party has turned away from Ford's conservatism, moving sharply to the right ideologically and to the South and West geographically.

The names ascribed to those changes include Reagan, Barry Goldwater, Newt Gingrich and George W. Bush. But not Ford. His passing served not only to highlight how the party has changed, but how he felt increasingly estranged from some elements of the party's new doctrine. Ford was long uncomfortable with the party's shift to the right on issues such as abortion and made that plain in many interviews. As is now known from an interview published posthumously, he also harbored great doubts about Bush's Iraq policies.

"It is a lot different party now," said Vin Weber, a former Republican House member from Minnesota. "I have enormous regard for Jerry Ford. He campaigned for me in my first election, and it made a great difference. But he was the last of the old order. When he picked [Nelson] Rockefeller [as vice president], it reverberated very strongly with younger Republicans as an effort to undo everything we'd worked for since Barry Goldwater."

As a World War II veteran, Ford came into politics as an internationalist. As a Midwesterner, he practiced a fiscal conservatism that was grounded in balancing budgets and controlling spending. The Bush administration has adopted a different model for dealing with the world, one that has relied on a go-it-alone strategy in the battle against terrorism, and for much of the past three decades, Republicans have embraced tax cuts over controlling spending as the foundation of their economic policy.

Gingrich believes that Vice President Cheney and former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, alumni of the Ford administration and now emblematic of the Bush administration's foreign policy, have changed because the world has changed. "Cheney and Rumsfeld have experienced a different world than Ford experienced and are genuinely frightened, and their policies are born out of this fear," he said. "They just don't know how to communicate to the country."

No one would seem to represent a break with Ford's Republican Party more than Gingrich, whose brash style and disruptive tactics upset the GOP's old guard in the 1980s but ultimately helped usher in a Republican congressional majority in 1994.

Ironically, he attributes to Ford the model he and Weber and other young Turks used to help transform the party in the 1980s and 1990s. In his younger days, Ford was an insurgent who helped depose then-House Republican leader Charles Halleck. Rumsfeld was part of that younger, hard-charging cadre.

"We literally modeled the Conservative Opportunity Society after them," Gingrich said. "They were doing all sorts of things that irritated the old guard. . . . But in many ways, they represent a pre-Reagan, pre-Goldwater party."

Clarke Reed of Mississippi, the veteran party leader who at the 1976 Republican National Convention helped deliver his state's delegation to Ford over Reagan and preserve Ford's nomination, remarked yesterday that the party was then "just on the cusp of going Southern." Reagan's conservatism, he said, brought a new emphasis on social issues and religious values that was distinctly different from Ford's more moderate conservatism.

The midterm elections have brought a round of soul-searching among Republicans, who wonder whether they have become too conservative, too Southern, too indebted to the religious right. Ford's Republican Party may never return, but what replaced it has begun to show its limits.

Yesterday's tributes to Ford also served to underline that he will be forever tied to Richard M. Nixon -- first, as Nixon's choice to succeed the disgraced Spiro T. Agnew as vice president and then as Nixon's successor and the author of Nixon's controversial pardon.

In every eulogy to Ford's honesty, openness and trustworthiness, there was a contrast drawn with his predecessor. In some respects, they are the two sides of the Republican heritage. It carries over to the present day. Bush was helped to two terms in the White House in part by the public belief that he is a plain-spoken man. But Republicans paid a high price in November's elections for the "culture of corruption" in Congress, which the Democrats exploited.

Something else has been lost in the Republican Party, according to Kenneth M. Duberstein, who served in both the Ford and Reagan administrations: what he called "the sweet bipartisanship of Jerry Ford." That pattern "died in the last 12 years," and he sees little prospect of its reviving.

Words Show Iraq Fraying 'Code Of Silence' (USAT)

USA Today, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON — The war in Iraq has fractured even the fraternity of presidents.

After they exit the Oval Office, presidents generally limit criticism of their successors, at least in public. When President Bush and predecessors Jimmy Carter, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton gathered Tuesday at the National Cathedral for President Gerald Ford's funeral, it was a show of solidarity and affection for one of the few who knew firsthand how difficult the job can be.

The three former presidents smiled and shook hands as they waited for the memorial to begin, their first time together since a similar farewell for President Reagan 2½ years ago.

The tradition of what historian Robert Dallek calls "a code of silence" among presidents has been strained by the escalating violence in Iraq, however. The war has divided the international community, the American public, members of Congress.

Ford joined that debate, albeit after his death.

He criticized Bush's justification for the war in an interview conducted in 2004 and released when he died last week, joining critiques by Clinton and Carter. Their views underscore Bush's isolation on the war as he prepares to address the nation as early as next week on a strategy to turn around the deteriorating security and political situation in Iraq.

Ford's death and accounts of his life have competed in newspapers and TV broadcasts with a grim milestone: the 3,000th U.S. death in Iraq.

Criticism by former presidents is rare, says Richard Shenkman, a historian at George Mason University and author of Presidential Ambition. Most ex-presidents, recalling their travails in office, are reluctant to add to the burdens of successors, he says.

"It's a fine line that they walk," he says, but one that sometimes has been crossed. Dallek says periods of national "difficulty and frustration" can prompt former presidents to speak out.

In July 2004, Ford told The Washington Post that he "very strongly" disagreed with Bush's justification for the war and would have pursued sanctions and negotiations rather than order an invasion. "I don't think I would have gone to war," Ford said in an interview with Bob Woodward.

The former president also faulted two former aides who became architects of Bush's Iraq strategy: Vice President Cheney, once Ford's White House chief of staff, and Donald Rumsfeld, who served as Defense secretary for Ford and the younger Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0110700

Clinton generally has tempered his public comments about Iraq, but in November he told students in Dubai that the United States made "a big mistake" by invading, in particular by underestimating the difficulty of uniting the country.

Carter has been the most outspoken. In a CNN interview in November, he predicted that the invasion of Iraq was "going to prove, I believe, to be one of the greatest blunders that American presidents have ever made."

White House spokesman Tony Snow declined to comment on the former presidents' remarks. "We're remembering Gerald Ford today," he said.

For one former president, there has been not a hint of disapproval.

The elder Bush has rejected criticism of his son. His remarks as one of four eulogists for Ford — the current president, former secretary of State Henry Kissinger and Tom Brokaw of NBC were the others — focused on Ford's character, not current events.

Even so, when he paid his respects on Monday to Ford in the Capitol Rotunda, the elder Bush was accompanied by two old friends, former secretary of State James Baker and former Wyoming senator Alan Simpson. Both are members of the Iraq Study Group, which last month issued a scathing report that recommended drawing down U.S. troops.

In some ways, the division over Iraq is reminiscent of the friction between Ford and Reagan when both sought the GOP presidential nomination in 1976.

Then-president Ford warned that Reagan's hard-line attitude toward the Soviet Union was dangerously provocative. Reagan, a challenger who would lose the nomination but win the presidency four years later, accused Ford of failing to take a tough enough stand against Moscow.

Kissinger's eulogy recalled those days with words that could apply to Iraq, although he didn't cite it directly. The former secretary of State — who in November told the BBC that military victory in Iraq was no longer possible — said Ford's "prudence and common sense kept ethnic conflicts in Cyprus and Lebanon from spiraling into regional war."

He praised Ford for persistence in pursuing diplomacy with the Soviet Union and in the Middle East.

The rift between Ford and Reagan over disputes on détente, the Panama Canal treaty and the Helsinki Accords "never completely healed," says Craig Shirley, author of a book on the 1976 campaign entitled Reagan's Revolution; The Untold Story of the Campaign That Started It All. Shirley, a Republican consultant, called the practice of presidents faulting one another relatively new and probably unwise.

"It's better for ex-presidents to remain silent and let history judge them."

The Ex-Presidents' Club Bids A Member Goodbye (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 2 — In a moment of presidential empathy, former President George Bush recalled a skill he had learned from Gerald R. Ford: how to handle being ridiculed on "Saturday Night Live."

"I remember that lesson well, since being able to laugh at yourself is essential in public life," Mr. Bush said in his eulogy for Mr. Ford on Tuesday. "I'd tell you more about that, but as Dana Carvey would say: 'Not gonna do it. Wouldn't be prudent.' "

As the 82-year-old former president imitated his own impersonator, there were only three people in the audience who knew exactly how it felt to be ridiculed, as a sitting president, on late-night television. Former President Bill Clinton responded with a hearty laugh from his seat in the Washington National Cathedral, while former President Jimmy Carter, in a neighboring pew, looked on with a smile. Seated nearby was President Bush, who has been relentlessly skewered by TV comics as well.

With Mr. Ford's death last week, the group of living former presidents has shrunk to three, down from five in the early 1990s. Since 1994, Richard M. Nixon, Ronald Reagan and, now, Mr. Ford have left the stage, while Mr. Clinton has joined the ranks of former chief executives.

The dynamic among the former presidents is perpetually evolving, as people age, rivalries fade and former political opponents discover they share more similarities than differences.

The current club has at its core two presidents in different parties — Mr. Clinton, 60, and the elder Mr. Bush — who have become companions in traveling and fund-raising for causes around the world. The two at times appear more friendly than Mr. Bush is with his son, or than Mr. Clinton is with Mr. Carter, 82, a fellow Democrat. And on Tuesday it was Mr. Carter, not either of the Bushes, who accompanied Mr. Ford's coffin back to Grand Rapids, Mich., for burial.

Though Mr. Ford and Mr. Carter squared off in the 1976 election, they became friends after both were out of office. On a flight home from Cairo in 1981, after the funeral of the Egyptian leader Anwar el-Sadat, they found common ground discussing their presidential libraries.

DOJ_NMG_0110701

Similar kinship has grown between Mr. Clinton and the first President Bush, in contrast to the rocky relationship between Mr. Clinton and Mr. Carter. Though the two Southern Democrats are from similarly humble backgrounds, they have been at odds repeatedly over the years.

In 1993, Mr. Carter said he was “very disappointed” in the Clintons for sending their daughter, Chelsea, to private school rather than public school, as the Carters had done with their daughter, Amy. After the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Mr. Carter said he had been “deeply embarrassed by what occurred.” In more recent years, the Clinton-Carter relationship has had a tinge of rivalry, as both men have sought to become global statesmen.

The funeral also provided a stage for those thinking about the politics of tomorrow, as well as those of yesterday. Along with the three former presidents sat several of those who may aspire to the job, including Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York and Representative Dennis J. Kucinich of Ohio.

And it was a reminder that while the nation elects only the president, the White House becomes home to a whole family whose members have to cope with the spotlight. At the cathedral on Tuesday, Rosalynn Carter was seen talking intently with Nancy Reagan. One row behind them, Chelsea Clinton spoke animatedly with a fellow Stanford University alumna, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Tom Brokaw, the former NBC News anchor, said in his eulogy that when Mr. Ford brought his family to 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, “he brought the humanity that comes with a family that seemed to be living right next door.”

For neighbors of the Fords in Alexandria, Va., from the 1950s until they moved into the White House in 1974, they were in fact the family next door, with four independent-minded children whose public indiscretions Mr. Ford sometimes had to confront.

His son Jack admitted in a newspaper interview in 1975 that he smoked marijuana and lived a rowdy bachelor’s life. His daughter, Susan Ford Bales, was a headstrong teenager when her father became president and was married for a time to a Secret Service agent who had been assigned to guard the family.

Mr. Ford and Ms. Bales, now middle-aged, walked hand in hand down the center aisle of the cathedral before the service, and each read a passage from the Bible.

Ms. Bales’s reading came from James 1:19-25, chosen by the family to help illuminate the former president’s humble approach to the bitter times in which he served.

“Therefore rid yourselves of all sordidness and rank growth of wickedness, and welcome with meekness the implanted word that has the power to save your souls,” Ms. Bales read. “But be doers of the word, and not merely hearers who deceive themselves.”

Ford 'The Best Of America' (USAT)

By Judy Keen And Bill Nichols

USA Today, January 3, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. — Gerald Ford's hometown welcomed him back to his beloved Midwest for the last time Tuesday, hours after a final and affectionate farewell in the nation's capital.

Ford will be buried Wednesday on a hillside at his presidential museum, ending a week-long national tribute to the 38th president. Thousands of silent people lined the streets of this city of 194,000 to watch the passage of the hearse carrying Ford's body.

Thousands more lined up to pass by Ford's casket during visitation inside the museum through the night.

"He was quite a guy, quite a man," said Grand Rapids barber Jim Jazwinski, 70.

Former president Jimmy Carter, who defeated Ford in the 1976 election, will speak at a private service today.

Washington bid its own goodbye Tuesday with a stately funeral for Ford, a man President Bush called "one of America's most beloved leaders."

Ford, who died Dec. 26 at the age of 93, was remembered by Bush and other dignitaries as a plain-spoken son of the Midwest who calmed a divided nation in the wake of Richard Nixon's resignation in 1974.

"We are here today to say goodbye to a great man," Bush said in his eulogy under the soaring arches of the Washington National Cathedral. "In President Ford, the world saw the best of America."

More than 3,000 guests filled the majestic cathedral, including former presidents Carter, George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton, as well as Cabinet members, members of Congress and justices of the Supreme Court.

Ford's widow, Betty, 88, sat stoically with the couple's four children, holding hands with daughter Susan Ford Bales. At one point, Ford whispered to her daughter, "Beautiful."

Speaker after speaker focused on a central theme: the innate decency and impeccable character embodied by Ford. He "was a Norman Rockwell painting come to life," former president Bush said. Ford had "a heart as big and open as the Midwest plains on which he was born," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0110702

Before the service, Ford's remains were placed outside the U.S. Senate chamber, and the casket was led down the steps of the Capitol, where Ford served as a House member before Nixon selected him to replace disgraced vice president Spiro Agnew in 1973.

Outside, hundreds of people spilled down the steps of the Russell Senate Office Building and lined Constitution Avenue to watch the funeral cortege.

Alan Gibby of California, in town for a son's wedding, remembered shaking Ford's hand when he was 18 years old. "It was one of the greatest days of my life," Gibby said. "I just had to come and pay my respects."

George W. Bush And The Media: Final Words And Last Laughs (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

What will be President Bush's chicken-head moment?

During yesterday's funeral services at the Washington National Cathedral for Gerald Ford, retired anchorman Tom Brokaw recalled how the press corps' affection for the late president could be seen in the acquisition, by New York Times reporter Jim Naughton, of a mock chicken head that had caught Ford's attention at a campaign rally. "Giddy from 20-hour days and an endless repetition of the same campaign speech, Naughton decided to wear that chicken head to a Ford news conference in Oregon, with the enthusiastic encouragement of the president and his chief of staff, Dick Cheney," Brokaw recalled.

"When the president called me last year and asked me if I would participate in these services," Brokaw continued, "I think he wanted to be sure that the White House press corps was represented: the writers, correspondents and producers, the cameramen, photographers, the technicians -- and the chicken."

For Bush, it must have been a jarring moment. The current president would probably have Hugo Chavez deliver his eulogy before he would bestow the honor on a member of the White House press corps.

Even if Bush were inclined to allow a journalist to orate, which contentious moment with the press would be recounted? Would it be when Bush, in Paris, called NBC's David Gregory "intercontinental" for asking the French president a question in French? Or when Bush attempted to leave a quarrelsome press conference in China but discovered the door was locked?

Equally tricky: Which reporter would be Bush's Brokaw? To help Bush choose, several current and former White House correspondents, though in no way encouraging the president to shuffle off this mortal coil, yesterday offered sample eulogies they would be willing to give many years from now.

Richard Wolffe of Newsweek invoked the days after Bush called Adam Clymer of the New York Times a "major league a-----" and Cheney replied, "Big time" -- all captured on the microphone at a campaign rally. "Halloween of 2000," Wolffe remembered. "Several of us obtained Bush masks and printed up a series of baseball shirts for a fictional team called the Major League A's. We lined up at the foot of his plane stairs like an honor guard and he posed for photos with us. Chuckled with his shoulders the whole way through."

A major league entry. But here's one from Clymer himself, who provided a touching footnote: "He made a cheerful video tribute for the Washington Press Club Foundation dinner in 2001, with Cheney echoing his every sentence with 'big time.' A couple of months later, he sent me a very gracious sympathy letter on the death of my mother."

One candidate unlikely to become a finalist for eulogy honors is Julie Mason of the Houston Chronicle, who recalled the president falling off his scooter in Kennebunkport. "Toward the end of his presidency, Bush fretted openly about how history would judge him. He needn't have worried. Patting his wife's bottom in church and dropping Barney on the tarmac were not the defining moments of his presidency. Falling off the Segway was."

Nor should Bob Kemper wait by the phone. The former Chicago Tribune reporter, now with the Atlanta Journal-Constitution, recalled Bush's visit to the British Embassy to see his sister-in-law perform in a play. "Obviously worried that a theater critic had infiltrated the travel pool, the White House banned the pool from the embassy and drove us instead to Cactus Cantina," Kemper eulogized. "The pool ate as it often does -- under armed supervision of the Secret Service, which, to ensure that no one snuck off and tried to see 'The Spider's Web,' required the entire pool to go to the Little Reporter's Room together under armed guard."

A likelier candidate, but still a dark horse, is Olivier Knox of Agence France-Presse. He offered a moving tribute about the time "a foreign journalist asked the president after a roundtable interview to autograph a copy of 'A Charge to Keep.' The president called out to the U.S. reporters sitting behind him, 'Why don't you folks ever ask me to do this?' One of them shot back: 'Maybe when it's in paperback, sir.' "

Judging from yesterday's entries, Bush's self-deprecation will play a role in any eventual funeral. James Rosen of Fox News remembered a White House Christmas party when the CIA leak scandal was at its height. Rosen introduced Bush to his father, a personal-injury trial lawyer of the variety Bush disparaged on every campaign stop. "I could probably use a good lawyer," Bush allowed.

Not bad. But probably the most promising chicken-head story was provided by Dick Keil, the former Bloomberg News reporter Bush called "Stretch." The 6-foot-5 Stretch recalled a 2001 news conference on the Bush ranch in Texas, when an unusually talkative Bush exhausted all questions and was finally asked what he had done that day. Recalled Keil: "He noted that he had begun his morning by spending some 'quality time with the first lady.' Following a dramatic pause for effect, he got that wry grin, and said, 'Usually, I go running.' "

Manufacturing Could Signal Trouble Ahead (WSJ)

By Justin Lahart

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

If manufacturers seem downbeat as the new year starts, it's partly because they were too upbeat at the beginning of the old one.

Gross domestic product grew at a 5.6% annual rate in the first quarter of 2006, slowed to 2% by the third quarter and is estimated to have slowed a bit more in the final three months of last year. The run from hot to cold means manufacturers produced more stuff than needed and are now suffering the consequences.

When the Institute for Supply Management releases its monthly report on manufacturing activity today, that unhappy message is likely to come out clearly. The ISM's manufacturing index -- based on surveys of purchasing managers -- dropped sharply through the fall and by November hit its lowest level in more than three years. At 49.5, the index had dipped into terrain that signals a manufacturing contraction and was lower than comparable indexes in other countries.

Economists polled by Dow Jones peg today's report for December's ISM at 50 -- essentially a "we're-still-on-vacation-here" forecast of no change.

Part of the problem is the housing slowdown and auto production cutbacks proved more severe in 2006 than manufacturers appear to have expected. That left them with more wallboard and windshields than needed. Even outside of housing and autos, companies seem to have expected stronger demand than they got as 2006 unfolded.

Some manufacturers also built up raw material inventories to beat price increases and when commodity prices dropped, the excess inventory turned into excess baggage.

Goldman Sachs economist Jan Hatzius notes inventories have been rising more than shipments, which could force companies to cut production even more to work down stockpiles.

Mr. Hatzius doesn't think this means a broader recession, but he says it probably does mean overall growth will remain sluggish in early 2007. That will keep interest rates low, but could lead to earnings disappointments, a perilous scenario for stock investors.

... And Dow Transports Could Confirm It

Dow Theory is an old market barometer many investors have forgotten. Ignoring it now might be a mistake.

The theory holds that the 30-stock Dow Jones Industrial Average, which includes stocks like International Business Machines and Alcoa, and the 20-stock Dow Jones Transportation Average, with stocks like FedEx and JetBlue, should move in tandem to confirm bull or bear markets. That means when industrials rise and transports don't, the market could falter.

Don't look now, but transport stocks have turned south as the industrials have hit records. The transportation average is off 6.6% since mid-November, thanks to slumping cargo traffic and disappointing earnings outlooks from companies like FedEx. The softness mirrors manufacturing weakness showing up in the monthly ISM reports.

Skeptics say Dow theory -- which traces back to this paper's co-founder, Charles Dow -- is passé because the economy has changed so much. Proponents say transport stocks still send important signals. In the late '90s the transports dipped long before the broader market meltdown.

Given the red flags waving in manufacturing, Mr. Dow's ideas might be worth a fresh look.

December Auto Sales Look Weak (WSJ)

By John D. Stoll

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

DETROIT -- As auto makers report December U.S. sales on Wednesday, a decline in fleet sales to rental agencies and significant weakness at Ford Motor Co. are expected to fuel an overall market pullback for the month. The slide may be a prelude to a difficult year ahead for car sales and domestic vehicle production.

Analysts forecast that December industry sales will slide as much as 6%, aided by what could be a double-digit percentage decline at Ford, despite heavy year-end sales incentives and an expected uptick in luxury car sales. Other domestic auto makers are seen posting nearly flat sales for the month, while recent sales gains are expected to continue for Asian auto makers such as Toyota Motor Corp. and Honda Motor Co.

Even with December's expected slide, full-year auto sales are seen reaching about 16.5 million vehicles in 2006. While the result is down more than 2% from the 16.9 million sold in 2005, the volume still represents historically strong demand, according to trade publication Ward's Automotive Reports, which tracks U.S. auto sales.

But demand for new light vehicles may hit headwinds this year amid a continued housing market slump, and as U.S. auto makers back away from unprofitable practices that helped pump up demand in prior years. Ford and General Motors Corp., for example, have both laid out plans to reduce fleet sales and lessen their reliance on incentives, such as discounts and rebates.

In a research note released to investors last week, Merrill Lynch auto analyst John Murphy forecasted that auto sales will sink to about 16 million vehicles in 2007, an outlook mirrored by many other auto analysts. Sales in the low 16 million range would represent the lowest annual sales tally of the decade.

"The slowdown in new vehicle sales observed in the past few months appears now likely to persist well into" 2007, Lehman Brothers Inc. auto analyst Brian Johnson said in a recent note to investors.

Comerica Bank Chief Economist Dana Johnson said that car sales in particular will be harder to produce in the first half of 2007. "Cars are a big ticket item and sometimes people take equity out of their houses to finance a down payment and there has been less of that available," the economist said.

Dana Johnson predicted that auto sales will speed up in the second half of the year as overall economic growth begins to rebound.

Merrill Lynch's Mr. Murphy said that the relative profitability of vehicle sales could also fade in 2007 as consumers continue to move away from sport-utility vehicles and pickups in favor of more fuel-efficient passenger cars and crossover models. Light trucks rake in a higher profit margin for auto makers.

Comerica's Mr. Johnson said Detroit's auto makers may be able to better handle lower sales volumes in 2007 thanks to the severe job cuts that were executed in 2006. Ford and GM will dismiss as many as 72,000 hourly workers in the U.S. by September via recently staged accelerated attrition programs. DaimlerChrysler AG's Chrysler Group is expected to announce additional job cuts in February.

Mr. Johnson said fewer workers for the Big Three means it should be less costly to shut down or slow assembly lines. GM, Ford and Chrysler cut production in 2006 and cutbacks are expected to continue through at least the first half of 2007.

Lehman's Mr. Johnson estimates that 2007 North American auto production will fall 100,000 vehicles, or 7%, below 2006's "already low" level of 15.3 million vehicles. He said Big Three production will fall 5% in 2007, following a 7% decline last year, as Detroit's market share continues to fade.

The Big Economic Worry (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The start of a new year is a good time to take stock, and there are few better indicators of our long-term economic prospects -- and also our prospects for political and social peace -- than productivity. As anyone who's taken basic college economics should know, productivity is simply jargon for efficiency. It's also what most people think of as economic progress. The good news is that productivity has been growing strongly; the bad news is that it may be moving to a much slower path.

To see why that matters, consult a fascinating government report, "100 Years of U.S. Consumer Spending." A century ago, Americans spent 43 percent of their incomes on food and 14 percent on clothing. By 2002, those shares were 13 percent and 4 percent. Meanwhile, family incomes (after inflation) had exploded. Filling the spending gap are all the things we take for granted -- cars, TVs, travel, telephones, the Internet. Home ownership has zipped to almost 70 percent of households.

This triumph of mass consumption is usually credited to technological breakthroughs, from the assembly line to computer chips. But the whole process is also described as productivity improvement. In 1900, 41 percent of Americans worked on farms.

If mechanization, new seeds and fertilizers hadn't meant that fewer people could produce more food, we'd still be paying two-fifths of our income to eat. Labor productivity is measured as output per hour worked. Whatever enables people to produce more in a given time (machinery, skills, organization) boosts productivity.

That in turn raises our incomes -- or gives us more leisure. It also promotes domestic tranquility by muffling the competition between government and personal spending. Slow productivity growth virtually ensures a collision between the heavy costs of retiring baby boomers -- mostly for Social Security and Medicare -- and younger workers' living standards. Higher taxes will bite deeply into sluggish incomes. The reason: What seem to be tiny productivity shifts have huge consequences.

Consider: In 2005, the U.S. economy produced $12.5 trillion of goods and services, or gross domestic product (GDP). Per capita income -- the average for individuals -- was $35,000. If productivity growth averages 2.5 percent a year, the economy reaches $34 trillion in 2035 (in constant 2005 dollars), estimates Moody's Economy.com. Per capita income rises to $73,000. Now, suppose productivity growth averages 1 percent annually. Then GDP in 2035 is only $23 trillion, and per capita income is $48,000. That $13,000 gain ($48,000 minus $35,000) may look large, but it occurs over three decades, and part of workers' gain would be taxed away to pay baby boomers' retirement costs. Typical take-home pay would rise less than 1 percent annually.

Unfortunately, productivity growth seems to be decreasing. In the past year it's been only 1.4 percent. By contrast, it averaged about 3 percent from 2000 to 2005. The fall-off partly reflects a mature business cycle. As the economy slows, so do productivity gains. But some long-term forecasts project that the poor performance will continue. In Moody's Economy.com's outlook, productivity growth averages 1.4 percent a year from 2005 to 2035. The main reason: stunted business investment in new machinery, technologies and buildings, says chief economist Mark Zandi.

"We don't save much as a nation, and we've gotten away with it so far because overseas investors have been willing to finance our investment," he says. But he doubts that will continue. As global investors shift to other markets, big federal budget deficits will compete increasingly with private companies for credit. Higher interest rates will crowd out some business investment. Productivity will suffer.

Maybe. But Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke has suggested that the post-1995 trend (2.5 percent or higher) might persist for years. In truth, economists have a dismal record in anticipating and explaining productivity shifts. A big slowdown in the early 1970s remains a mystery. Productivity gains averaged 1.5 percent for a bit more than two decades, down from about 2.5 percent in the 1950s and 1960s. The post-1995 rebound was first attributed to computers and the Internet. But its continuation after 2000 -- when high-tech investment peaked -- suggests that other forces contributed. It's unclear what they were.

The great frustration is that something so critical is also so elusive. Productivity ultimately encompasses a society's entire economic culture: its technologies, management, workers' skills and motivation, schools, entrepreneurial spirit, work ethic, ambition and risk-taking, the competitive pressure on companies, government policies, financial markets. Everything counts -- and connects with everything else.

Therein lies a caution to the Democratic Congress and the Bush administration. Although government can't easily dictate higher productivity, its policies may perversely favor lower productivity. What's politically expedient today -- a dubious tax break, a lazy budget deficit, an expensive regulation -- may be economically corrosive tomorrow. Don't ditch the future.

Best Of The Law Blog As Two Firms Look To Tie Up, Some Partners Head For Exits (WSJ)

By Peter Lattman

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Dewey or Don't We?

Two major law firms have been talking marriage, but partners are leaving before the firms reach the altar. Dewey Ballantine has lost at least nine partners since the news last fall of its plans to merge with San Francisco's Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe. A defection this week is a biggie: Michael Aiello, a top Dewey mergers-and-acquisitions partner and a member of the management committee, joined Weil, Gotshal & Manges. Already, the Dewey-Orrick merger vote had been postponed as the two sides attempt to iron out differences on management authority and other topics.

Read more about law, business and the business of law at WSJ.com's Law Blog2, updated every business day.

Orrick has wanted to join forces with Dewey in large part because of Dewey's strong M&A practice, but in December, Jack Bodner, another former Dewey M&A partner, left for Covington & Burling in New York. Messrs. Aiello and Bodner were considered two of the top deputies to Morton Pierce, the head of Dewey's M&A practice.

Also in December, Pierre Hubert, a former IP litigation partner in Dewey's Austin, Texas, office, left for McKool Smith, a Texas-based firm.

A Dewey spokesman wished all of the departing lawyers well.

Ford's Legal Legacy

DOJ_NMG_0110706

Based on the past week's tributes, the late President Ford won't be best known for his legacy to the law, but perhaps he should be.

At a 2005 symposium, Mr. Ford sent a letter saying, "I am prepared to allow history's judgment of my term in office to rest (if necessary, exclusively) on my nomination 30 years ago of Justice John Paul Stevens to the U.S. Supreme Court." While Justice Stevens has, in recent years, perhaps been the court's most consistently liberal justice, Mr. Ford vouched for his old friend's approach to the law, endorsing his views on a variety of issues, from the "secular character" of the Constitution's religion clauses to securing procedural safeguards for criminal defendants.

The selection of Justice Stevens was pressed by Edward Levi, whom Mr. Ford tapped to be U.S. attorney general in 1975. Today, the appointment of Mr. Levi, who also served as president of the University of Chicago, is widely viewed as helping to restore the reputation of the Justice Department after form President's Nixon's attorney general, John Mitchell, was convicted of perjury and other crimes.

In 2000, Mr. Ford eulogized, "With each passing year it becomes more and more self-evident -- Ed Levi is the attorney general against whom all others are measured."

Milberg Weiss Gets a Zinger

Last month U.S. Magistrate Judge Steven Pepe in Detroit ruled that plaintiffs firm Milberg Weiss & Bershad shouldn't be appointed lead counsel in a suit involving Ford Motor. In light of the May indictment of Milberg Weiss on kickback charges, which was followed by a slew of attorney departures, the judge questioned whether the firm would have the resources to devote to the case.

The opinion wasn't the first to rule that Milberg Weiss might not be the best choice to serve as lead counsel for plaintiffs. But it was perhaps the most pointed.

Judge Pepe chastised Milberg lawyer Lori Feldman for saying the attorneys litigating the case hadn't been accused of wrongdoing but failing to note that an indicted former partner was listed on the complaint.

"We are bewildered as to why the opinion is so cutting," said Ms. Feldman, who noted that the former partner was on leave when Milberg sought to be appointed lead counsel. "We don't want anything to happen to this firm....It's not a mausoleum. We're able to work." But, she added, "if we continue to get decisions like this, it'll be tough."

The Apprentice, Esq.

When the latest installment of "The Apprentice" debuts Sunday night on NBC, it will have a distinctly legal flavor. Of the 18 candidates competing for a job in the Trump Organization, six are practicing lawyers, including one from the firm of class-action lawyer William Lerach.

"Why so many lawyers?" we asked Mr. Trump.

"A lot of it has to do with lawyers' high levels of education and the fact that many of them are intelligent," he said. "Now, I'm not saying all lawyers are intelligent because I've seen many lawyers that aren't."

Leaked Giuliani Memo Details Goals, Hurdles (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani (R) has been exploring a run for president for just over a month, but the planning behind a national candidacy has been going on much longer, according to an internal strategy memo.

The 140-page document, which was leaked to the New York Daily News by a rival 2008 campaign, provides a broad look at Giuliani's prospects for the Republican nomination -- including the potential hurdles of his stormy personal life and his association with disgraced former New York City police commissioner Bernard B. Kerik. "All will come out -- in worst light," says the document as quoted by the Daily News.

The memo also details a fundraising plan for Giuliani that includes raising $100 million this year, including $25 million in the first three months alone, according to the Daily News. At present, Giuliani finds himself slightly behind Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) in the race for commitments from key donors who can contribute their own money and also harvest thousands more from their well-heeled friends.

Sunny Mindel, a spokeswoman for Giuliani, alleged that the memo was obtained through a series of "political dirty tricks." According to Mindel, a staffer's bag containing the document was lost during one of Giuliani's campaign trips this fall after being removed from a private plane. The bag was returned several days later after "repeated requests" by Giuliani's staff. "Because our staffer had custody of this document at all times except for this one occasion, it is clear that the document was removed from the luggage and photocopied," Mindel said.

Polling continues to show Giuliani running at or near the front of the 2008 Republican field -- a result of the national name recognition he carries from his handling of the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Despite those surveys, many within the party are skeptical that Giuliani's liberal social positions will withstand the scrutiny of conservative primary and caucus voters.Romney to File Campaign Papers

Speaking of Romney, he'll let one of the least well-kept secrets of the 2008 campaign out of the bag today when he formally registers a presidential exploratory committee with the Federal Election Commission.

The filing of the paperwork is largely formulaic, as Romney has long been expected to run for president and has been putting into place a national organization to prepare for such a bid. Romney's latest hire is Carolyn Weyforth, who most recently served as press secretary for outgoing Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Weyforth will be Romney's deputy communications director.

Romney will spend much of today preparing to hand over power to Gov.-elect Deval Patrick (D), who will be sworn in tomorrow, and is scheduled to make the "lone walk" -- the ceremonial departing descent down the steps of the Massachusetts State House -- this evening.

On Jan. 8, Romney will begin his exploratory committee in earnest with a fundraiser in Boston to benefit his presidential aspirations.

Among Republicans, Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.), Rep. Duncan Hunter (Calif.), former governors Tommy G. Thompson (Wis.) and James S. Gilmore III (Va.), as well as McCain and Giuliani, have established exploratory organizations.

Political Paper Stolen, Giuliani Camp Says (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

Advisers to former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani said yesterday that someone infiltrated the Giuliani camp last fall and stole a document about his presidential prospects and political liabilities. It was then leaked, they said, as a “dirty trick” to embarrass Mr. Giuliani and highlight such headaches as his controversial former aide, Bernard B. Kerik, and one of his ex-wives, Donna Hanover.

The Daily News was given the 140-page document recently by someone “sympathetic to one of Giuliani’s rivals for the White House,” The News said in an article published yesterday. According to the article, the document proposes a $100 million fund-raising effort for 2007, names an array of potential donors, and warns that Mr. Giuliani might face “insurmountable” problems, including questions about Mr. Kerik and Ms. Hanover.

Mr. Giuliani is expected to decide over the next few months whether to run for president, his advisers say, and he has already formed an exploratory committee to raise money.

A Giuliani spokeswoman, Sunny Mindel, said yesterday that the document belonged to a staff member and did not reflect official strategy, but “simply someone’s ideas which were committed to paper over three months ago.” Ms. Mindel said the document was apparently stolen from a piece of luggage during a Giuliani political trip last fall, then photocopied and replaced in the luggage. Ms. Mindel said she did not know if her office would seek a criminal investigation of the alleged theft.

The public disclosure of the document is potentially damaging for Mr. Giuliani, not least because since 9/11, he has built a business as a private consultant on security issues while creating an image as a political leader capable of combating terrorism. Indeed, an adviser to one of his possible rivals in 2008, Senator John McCain of Arizona, half-joked yesterday that it was interesting that Mr. Giuliani’s businesses included security consulting.

“I’m surprised that something like that would ever leave the custody of a campaign, and that such raw and frank information would be around the countryside,” said the McCain adviser, John Weaver. “That said, a lot of the information was predictable.”

The document outlines a fund-raising effort to bring in at least $25 million by the end of March, and to spend more than $21 million this year. The News said it included notations that named Mr. Giuliani’s chief fund-raiser, Anne Dickerson, and a senior political aide, Anthony Carbonetti; Ms. Mindel would not say to whom the document belonged.

Among the sections that appear outdated are the prospective donor lists. The document proposed New Jersey fund-raisers Lewis M. Eisenberg and Larry Bathgate, financier Henry R. Kravis, and FedEx executive Fred Smith. The first three men were named last month as leaders of Mr. McCain’s fund-raising operation, and Mr. Smith is expected to join the roster shortly.

Assessing the document, which includes printed text, handwriting and spreadsheets, The News drew the conclusion that Mr. Giuliani appeared torn between seeking the White House and continuing his business endeavors, which include consulting on leadership and security issues, a law practice and an investment concern.

One page in the document, according to The News, says Mr. Giuliani might “drop out” of the race as a result of “insurmountable” personal and political concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0110708

On that page was a list of bullet points that seem to highlight those concerns: Mr. Giuliani's consulting practice; his former police commissioner, Mr. Kerik, who has struggled with personal and professional controversies; Ms. Hanover, with whom he had a stormy breakup; his third and current wife, Judith Nathan Giuliani; and "social issues" — apparently a reference to his support for abortion rights, gay civil unions, and gun control, some or all of which are opposed by many Republican voters.

"All will come out — in worst light," the document stated. "$100 million against us on this stuff," it continued, apparently a reference to likely efforts by Giuliani opponents to draw public attention to his liabilities.

It also suggests that Mr. Giuliani would categorize and honor his donors with terms from baseball. While President Bush referred to his best financial supporters as "Rangers" and "Pioneers," Mr. Giuliani would call them "Team Captains," "MVPs," "All-Stars," and "Sluggers." He would focus his fund-raising operations in New York, Washington, and California, the document indicates.

Ms. Mindel called the document "very outdated," but at least some of the ideas reflect current strategy discussions in the Giuliani camp, according to Republican Party figures who are familiar with the discussions and who spoke to The New York Times recently on condition of anonymity. Specifically, these Republicans say, Giuliani advisers believe that he is broadly popular enough to be able to raise money quickly for a presidential bid, and that he would need more than $100 million by the end of 2007.

According to Giuliani advisers, the document was a notebook compiled by one staff member whose luggage was not immediately located after a private plane flight last fall. They said it was not an official dossier that all Giuliani political aides shared.

"Voters are sick and tired of dirty tricks," Ms. Mindel said. Referring to the document, she added: "It's about as relevant today as a grocery list written in early October — in pencil."

Romney Eyes 2008 Bid, Sets Sights On Conservative Base (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, who today will file papers forming a committee to explore a run for president in 2008, has spent recent months moving steadily to try to occupy the conservative ground in the Republican presidential field.

His entry into the ranks of Republicans officially exploring a run for the presidency underscores the strange nature of the field at this point [-] there is no candidate able to claim the position of the clear conservative standard-bearer, so all of the candidates think they can win a sizable chunk of those all-important primary voters.

"The case that he's going to make is that Mitt Romney has a record of governing that demonstrates an extraordinary level of accomplishment that will lead the country toward success," said a Romney aide familiar with the governor's decision to announce the exploratory committee.

With the first presidential caucuses and primaries scheduled for 12 months from now, Mr. Romney and the other potential candidates are staking out political positions and trying to show their prowess for fundraising and organization.

It's a rough-and-tumble game that was underscored this week by a report in the New York Daily News of internal documents from Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York mayor who formed an exploratory committee for the Republican nomination in November.

The 140-page dossier lists fundraisers Mr. Giuliani hoped to recruit to his presidential bid, but many of them have already been snatched up by his rivals for the nomination -- chiefly Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican whom many analysts say is the man to beat.

The newspaper said it received the document from a source "sympathetic" to one of Mr. Giuliani's rivals, though the paper didn't say which one. In it, Mr. Giuliani's team sets a goal of raising $100 million to $125 million in 2007, and $25 million to $30 million of that during the next three months.

Mr. Romney will take the first step to gauge how much he can raise when he holds his first finance event next week. He has asked his top supporters to bring their lists of contacts and they will hunker down in the Westin Boston Waterfront hotel Sunday night and Monday morning to begin making their fundraising pitch.

John C. Fortier, a research fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, said the mantle of the conservative candidate is open after other Republicans, particularly Sens. George Allen of Virginia and Bill Frist of Tennessee, saw their chances collapse with November's election results.

"In a normal field, I think there would also be a more traditional Republican candidate. Looking at the field now, there is not a strong candidate in that role," Mr. Fortier said.

He said that has left an opening for Mr. Romney, who early in his governorship seemed to stake out moderate positions but moved toward the conservative side later in his single term.

"There's a lot of mystery here because he's got a lot of ways he could go, but politically the place to go in the Republican field is to the right of McCain, to the more traditional part of the Republican Party," Mr. Fortier said.

In trying to win those voters, Mr. McCain has shed his 2000 campaign image of the maverick opposed to President Bush. Instead he has recruited many of the operatives and fundraisers that helped Mr. Bush win election in 2000 and 2004.

For his part, Mr. Giuliani has the star power to earn him an audience with conservatives, even though he is seen as a pro-choice, anti-gun-rights candidate.

Mr. Romney, whose Democratic successor will be sworn in tomorrow , took steps in the final days to shore up his credentials as tough on illegal immigration. He signed an agreement with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement giving state troopers trained for the job the ability to enforce federal immigration laws.

He also gave interviews to National Review Online and Human Events last month in which he tried to clarify his positions on abortion and his position on marriage and civil unions.

National political polls of Republicans and Republican-leaning voters put Mr. McCain and Mr. Giuliani well ahead of the rest of the candidates.

A Gallup poll taken Dec. 11 to 14 showed Mr. McCain and Mr. Giuliani at 28 percent each, and Mr. Romney in fourth at 4 percent, also trailing Condoleezza Rice. An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll put Mr. Romney fourth behind Mr. McCain, Mr. Giuliani and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Political analysts say Mr. Romney's experience as a governor is an asset because voters in recent years have seemed to prefer candidates with executive experience.

He is not the first governor to enter the Republican contest -- former Virginia Gov. James S. Gilmore III announced last month he has formed an exploratory committee -- but Mr. Romney is well ahead of Mr. Gilmore in organizing and fundraising.

Another governor, Arkansas' Mike Huckabee, is considering a run.

Mr. Huckabee told the Associated Press that if he runs, he would appeal to "true conservatives for whom conservatism doesn't mean they're angry at everybody."

"I would be the kind of Republican who doesn't scare the living daylights out of people who are in the center or slightly to the left," he said.

Effect Of Obama's Candor Remains To Be Seen (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Long before the national media spotlight began to shine on every twist and turn of his life's journey, Barack Obama had this to say about himself: "Junkie. Pothead. That's where I'd been headed: the final, fatal role of the young would-be black man. . . . I got high [to] push questions of who I was out of my mind."

The Democratic senator from Illinois and likely presidential candidate offered the confession in a memoir written 11 years ago, not long after he graduated from law school and well before he contemplated life on the national stage. At the time, 20,000 copies were printed and the book seemed destined for the remainders stacks.

Today, Obama, 45, is near the top of polls on potential Democratic presidential contenders, and "Dreams From My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance" has regularly been on the bestseller lists, with 800,000 copies in print. Taken along with his latest bestseller, "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream," Obama has become a genuine publishing phenomenon.

Obama's revelations were not an issue during his Senate campaign two years ago. But now his open narrative of early, bad choices, including drug use starting in high school and ending in college, as well as his tortured search for racial identity, are sure to receive new scrutiny.

As a potential candidate, Obama has presented himself as a fresh voice offering a politics of hope. Many say he offers something new in American politics: an African American with a less-than-traditional name who has so far demonstrated broad appeal. What remains to be seen is whether the candor he offered in his early memoir will be greeted with a new-style acceptance by voters.

It was not so long ago that such blunt admissions would have led to a candidate's undoing, and there is uneasiness in Democratic circles that "Dreams From My Father" will provide a blueprint for negative attacks.

Two decades ago, Judge Douglas H. Ginsburg of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit was forced to withdraw as a nominee for the Supreme Court after reports surfaced that he had used marijuana while he was a law professor. As a presidential candidate, Bill Clinton thought marijuana use could be enough of a liability in 1992 that he felt compelled to say he had not inhaled. And President Bush has managed to deflect endless gossip about his past by acknowledging that he had an "irresponsible" youth but offering no details.

DOJ_NMG_0110710

Through his book, Obama has become the first potential presidential contender to admit trying cocaine.

"I believe what the country is looking for is someone who is open, honest and candid about themselves rather than someone who seems endlessly driven by polls or focus groups," said Robert Gibbs, Obama's spokesman. Gibbs said yesterday that Obama was not available for an interview.

Presidential aspirants tend to write more sanitized books for use as campaign tools. "Faith of My Fathers" by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) depicts his family's history of military service. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) has reissued "It Takes a Village," which offers her views about child-rearing in contemporary society. In fact, Obama's latest book, "Audacity of Hope," lays out his policy positions.

But "Dreams From My Father" is not like that. Obama wrote the highly personal book when he was in his early 30s, after being approached by a publisher when he became the first black person elected editor of the Harvard Law Review.

"This is not the kind of book you would ever expect a politician to write," said GOP consultant Alex Vogel. "Anyone who has a career in politics has to be concerned with what's in their past, but there is no question that Americans have an appetite for redemption."

In fact, Bush himself has been a beneficiary of those sympathies. He has suffered little criticism from his conservative base after acknowledging that he drank too much in the past and is now a teetotaler.

Obama's partisan opponents and experts said it is too early to know whether the admissions will be a liability because the public seems to be enthusiastically embracing his openness at this point. What's more, they note that it is better for a politician to disclose his own transgressions, rather than be put on the defensive by revelations.

A senior Republican strategist who will be advising a GOP presidential candidate in 2008 said he did not see anything in the book that would be a "disqualifier," but he cautioned that Obama has not yet gone through an intense vetting process and that a problem could arise if there is more to his story than he has chosen to share. The strategist, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, also suggested that there will be high tolerance for marijuana use among voters because many baby boomers probably tried the drug in the '60s.

"Who's going to cast that first stone?" asked Anita Dunn, a veteran Democratic political consultant, who has advised Obama's political committee.

Rhodes Cook, a independent political analyst, said that Democratic primary voters, who are typically more liberal, would be more understanding of his drug use -- "and if he makes it to a general election, it will be old news."

Obama's supporters said his admissions in the book could work to his advantage.

"I think it will be received as refreshing," said Sen. Richard J. Durbin, Obama's fellow Democrat from Illinois. "If you compare similar books, many of us in the political business tend to have selective memories."

Obama writes extensively about his struggle to come to terms with being a black man whose African father returned to Kenya when he was 2, leaving him to be raised by his white Kansas-born mother and grandparents in Hawaii. He describes an identity crisis arising from his realization that his life was shaped by both a loving white family and a world that saw in him the negative stereotypes frequently ascribed to young black men. He recounts a search of self that took him from high school in Hawaii to Columbia University, and then to the streets of Chicago as a community organizer.

"We were always playing on the white man's court . . . by the white man's rules," he writes. "If the principal, or the coach, or a teacher . . . wanted to spit in your face, he could, because he had the power and you didn't. . . . The only thing you could choose was withdrawal into a smaller and smaller coil of rage.

"And the final irony: should you refuse this defeat and lash out at your captors . . . they would have a name for that too. Paranoid. Militant."

Obama has not expressed any regrets for his candor. In a preface to the new edition, he says that he would tell the same story today "even if certain passages have proven to be inconvenient politically."

In the book, Obama acknowledges that he used cocaine as a high school student but rejected heroin. "Pot had helped, and booze; maybe a little blow when you could afford it. Not smack, though," he says.

In an interview during his Senate race two years ago, Obama said he admitted using drugs because he thought it was important for "young people who are already in circumstances that are far more difficult than mine to know that you can make mistakes and still recover.

"I think that, at this stage, my life is an open book, literally and figuratively," he said. "Voters can make a judgment as to whether dumb things that I did when I was a teenager are relevant to the work that I've done since that time."

Barack Obama Can Be Whatever He Wants To Be (HILL)

The Hill, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110711

Those who deride Sen. Barack Obama's (D-Ill.) lack of experience and criticize the broad generalities and banalities that festoon his best-selling book miss the key point: His inexperience is an asset because he enters national politics as a blank canvas on which he can paint whatever he chooses. With only two years in the Senate, he is less like a politician running for president than like a general — think Eisenhower in 1952 or even the abortive candidacy of Colin Powell in 1995 — or a businessman, like Ross Perot in 1992.

It's not that he doesn't have a record. It's that the record doesn't really matter because it is so short. His Senate tenure is so abbreviated that he can be whatever he says he is, not just as a political contrivance to get elected, but genuinely to articulate a philosophy and make it his guiding principle both while seeking office and serving in it. He's that virginal.

So far, Obama seems very conscious that his liberal, party-line voting record is not a good foundation for his national ambitions. He seems aware that the country wants more of a post-partisan, embodying the consensus to which Americans have come over these recent dangerous and bitter years.

American politics alternates between periods in which we welcome partisan debate and those in which we demand consensus and conclusion. Confronted by new issues we turn to the left and to the right and ask each side to develop its ideas and flesh out its alternative for our consideration. During these times, moderates and synthesizers are doomed to defeat since they seem to ignore the problem, while polarizing figures take over. But once the debate has run its course, we make our collective national decisions and are no longer in the mood for unending debate. We want our will to be done by our elected officials with no more quarreling or sniping.

Obama has the opportunity to embody the emerging consensus, a broad national agreement reached from observation of trial and error over the past half decade. The bloody futility of our efforts to build a nation in Iraq have left us still committed to aggressive efforts to hunt down terrorists but determined to extricate ourselves from the mire. The effectiveness of our homeland security efforts and our concomitant horror at instances of mistaken imprisonment and unnecessarily intrusive government investigations have led us to demand a balance between aggressive investigation and protection of civil liberties. We want terrorists caught, interrogated, and locked up, but not tortured or sadistically humiliated.

Obama's book reflects an intuitive grasp of this emerging consensus even if his voting record does not signal his agreement with it.

But if the Illinois senator decides to articulate this synthesis, the question will be whether he can find sufficient traction on the center-left to give his candidacy viability. He will have to compete for that ground with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), but her reputation for strident advocacy and take-no-prisoners partisanship will likely give him an edge in going after Bill Clinton's former constituents among the New Democrats. And Obama enjoys an ethnic and demographic base that can augment his converts among moderate white Democrats.

John Edwards, for all of the eloquence of his announcement statement, is ultimately running on the issue of national poverty against a woman and an African-American. That's not going to work. His campaign might have gained traction against another field of candidates, but it is unlikely that he can get it on track against these two particular opponents.

So we wait for Barack Obama to define himself. If he runs to the left, he will be a worthy successor to Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton. If he runs to the center, he might be a successor to Bill Clinton and George W. Bush. He might just make it to the White House.

The Audacity Of Nope (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

The setting: Late January, outside a Chicago housing project where Sen. Barack Obama once worked as an organizer. The will-he, won't-he debate about the Illinois Democrat has reached a fever pitch.

In the grip of Obama-mania, the networks are poised to break into live programming to cover the announcement. Flanked by his wife and two young daughters, the 45-year-old Obama steps to the microphone.

"My fellow Americans. There's been a lot of talk about whether I'll be a presidential candidate in 2008 -- some of it encouraged by me. I've made my decision, and I won't be running."

Boos and yells of "No!" from the crowd. Obama raises his hands to quiet them.

"Please. I understand your disappointment. To tell you the truth, a part of me is disappointed, too.

"Now that I've gotten the headline out of the way, and let these folks file their leads" -- here Obama gestures to a throng of reporters --"let me tell you a little bit about my thinking.

DOJ_NMG_0110712

"First, I have to say how overwhelmed I have been by the reaction of people like you, who had faith enough in me to urge me to run, and faith enough in the American people to believe that I could win. You made it awfully tempting."

Obama flashes a wide smile, pauses. Shouts of "Give in!" and "You can still change your mind!" from the crowd.

"I could tell you the usual: that I decided not to run because I wanted to spend more time with my wonderful wife and children -- that I wanted to be there for my daughters in a way that my father never was for me.

"That would be true, but it wouldn't be the whole story.

"The truth is I don't feel ready" -- another smile and pause-- "right now."

Shouts of "2012! 2012!"

"Of course, no one, deep inside his or -- another smile-- her soul, truly feels ready to be president, and no one truly can be completely prepared for the job. I've spent my life -- as a community organizer, as a civil rights lawyer, as a state senator, in the United States Senate -- working for the same goals that would motivate me as president.

"But the question I kept coming back to was this: Would I be the best president I could be if I were elected in 2008? Or would I be a better president if I waited and learned and served and ran at some point down the road?"

Shouts of "2012! 2012!"

"Maybe that point will come; maybe it won't. In the meantime, I can promise you this: I will work my heart out for you, for the Democratic Party and for whoever is the Democratic nominee in 2008."

Shouts of "Obama! Obama!"

Â·

Let me acknowledge: This isn't the speech I expect Obama to give. Every indication is that he's planning to run. But this, or something like it, is the speech that I'd love to hear.

This is against professional interest: A Democratic race with Obama would be a lot more interesting. And Obama isn't any less experienced than, say, John Edwards was four years ago, after a career as a trial lawyer and just a few more years of experience in the Senate than the Illinois Democrat has now.

But I do think that Obama would be a better candidate, and ultimately a better president, in 2012 or 2016 than in 2008. He will have learned more -- about the world, about domestic policy, about how to maneuver successfully in Washington.

Yes, more years in the Senate offer more chances for individual votes to be deployed against him in 30-second TV ads, but they also offer the opportunity that Obama hasn't yet had: to set out and achieve legislative goals. Teaming up with Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) to bring transparency to government spending through a searchable database is nice, but it's no platform for a presidential campaign.

The main argument for Obama to run in 2008 involves the shelf-life theory of politics: that the Obama magic might fade, that an opportunity this good might never present itself again. Maybe, but I think that Obama has more promise than that, more staying power and more self-knowledge.

"My attitude about something like the presidency is that you don't want to just be the president," he told Men's Vogue. "You want to be a great president."

If so, Obama should ask himself: Wouldn't he be more likely to achieve that goal if he had the self-confidence -- the audacity, really -- to choose to sit it out in 2008?

Four Speeches To Set Priorities For Governor's Second Term (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

Schwarzenegger's focus in the next week will be on infrastructure, healthcare insurance and the environment.

SACRAMENTO — Over the next seven days, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, new crutches close at hand, will give a series of speeches that lay out his policy ambitions for the next four years: broader access to healthcare coverage, cleaner skies and improved roads.

The governor, still recovering from a broken right leg suffered in a holiday skiing accident, will deliver his inaugural address outlining a long-term vision for California when he is sworn in for a second term Friday. He is also expected on Monday to put forward his plan for revamping the state's healthcare system.

The next day, he will make his annual State of the State speech, and his budget proposal is scheduled the day after.

In these four speeches, Schwarzenegger will offer his most concrete proposals yet for insuring the millions of Californians who lack healthcare coverage, the centerpiece of his 2007 agenda. But he also hopes to establish a legacy as a builder on a par with former Gov. Pat Brown.

DOJ_NMG_0110713

Schwarzenegger wants to trigger another round of public construction, on top of the $43-billon bond program that voters approved in the November election. He will try to resurrect pieces of the construction package that he rolled out a year ago when he initially released his infrastructure plan: new prisons, courts and water storage. The Legislature said no to those projects.

"The governor proposed a series of infrastructure improvements last year, some of which were acted upon, some not," said his communications director, Adam Mendelsohn. "We still have water storage issues that need to be addressed. We still have a great deal of transportation issues that need to be addressed."

Normally an icon of fitness, Schwarzenegger begins his new term in the early phase of a convalescence expected to last two months. He had surgery on his broken right leg Dec. 26 and was released Saturday from St. John's Health Center in Santa Monica.

The governor said then in a statement that he was "feeling good" and planned to "tackle important issues like making healthcare more affordable, investing in and improving our infrastructure and protecting our environment."

Hoping to assuage concerns of Republican lawmakers worried about the state's mounting debt, Schwarzenegger wants private industry to pick up part of the construction tab through partnerships with government.

For example, business groups eager to speed the flow of goods might cover the costs of new roads if the state, in turn, gets the projects built more quickly.

And prisons would be a huge investment. The governor has already announced that he wants to ease rampant overcrowding by adding 78,000 new beds, at a cost of $10.9 billion.

After halting attempts to cast himself as a reformer, Schwarzenegger is determined to reinvent himself as a champion of spacious new freeways suited to a swelling population. For inspiration, he has been reading speeches that Brown gave as governor in the 1960s.

California added college campuses, built thousands of miles of freeway and expanded its water storage capacity on Brown's watch.

None of what Schwarzenegger is planning would be easy to pull off. The state's financial picture is grim.

Though unexpected revenues have shrunk the record shortfalls that California faced under former Gov. Gray Davis, the state still spends more than it takes in. It is estimated that when the new fiscal year begins July 1, the deficit will be $5.5 billion.

Aggressive borrowing in the Schwarzenegger era has also boosted California's debt. By 2009 the state will have borrowed so much that 8.4% of the budget will go toward paying off debt. Wall Street experts say the figure should not exceed 6%.

Elizabeth Hill, the Legislature's nonpartisan budget analyst, wrote in a November report: "California should be running projected operating surpluses instead of deficits."

And the governor confronts a dicey political climate.

His fellow Republicans want him to cut the deficit. They also say they will oppose any plan that saddles business with new healthcare costs or drains the state budget to cover millions of the uninsured.

"We have to be very cautious and go slow," said Michael Villines (R-Clovis), leader of the Assembly's Republicans.

Though Democrats control the Legislature, Schwarzenegger must win support from his fellow Republicans to reach the two-thirds majority needed to pass the state budget.

As the governor ingratiated himself with Democratic leaders last year, many Republicans stewed silently, aware that open insurrection might undermine his reelection prospects. Now that the race is over, the fissures are more visible. Assemblyman George Plescia of San Diego was ousted as GOP leader two days after the election, in part because Republicans wanted someone in the job who would stand up forcefully to the governor.

"Republican attitudes toward him are hardening," said Mike Schroeder, former chairman of the state Republican Party. "In many respects, the Assembly and Senate Republican caucuses are going to become the opposition party" to the governor.

Senate leader Don Perata (D-Oakland) predicted that Republican "restiveness" would be Schwarzenegger's biggest challenge.

"It will not be the Democrats; it will be how to corral the Republicans," he said.

As a guide to Schwarzenegger's intentions, the State of the State speech has proved prophetic. In his 2005 address, the governor took a combative tone, warning the Legislature that if he didn't get his way, he would take his proposals directly to voters in a special election. That is how events played out, but his appeal to voters failed.

Last year, a humbled Schwarzenegger gave a speech spelling out his intent to collaborate more with legislators.

What followed was widely seen as a productive legislative session in which Schwarzenegger signed bills raising the minimum wage, tamping down greenhouse gas emissions and offering discounted medicine.

This year, aides said, Schwarzenegger will cleave to a similar script. In his appearances during the next week, he'll promise to work in a bipartisan way, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0110714

Apart from all the brick-and-mortar projects, he'll urge development of new energy sources, including bio-fuels, staking out a centrist path in an effort to reconcile business development and environmental protection.

"If things go well for him in the next term," said Daniel Mitchell, professor of management and public policy at UCLA, "that would give him a strong place to run for senator."

Schwarzenegger's Gay Marriage Misstep (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

IT COULD have been different. If Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger had signed a bill in 2005 legalizing same-sex marriage instead of vetoing it, the California Supreme Court would have been spared the task of deciding, as it probably will this year, whether a voter-approved ban violates the state Constitution's guarantee of equal protection under the law.

But Schwarzenegger said he had to respect Proposition 22, approved in 2000, which states: "Only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California." Whether committed same-sex couples will be relieved of second-class status now depends on the state Supreme Court. And as Superior Court Judge Richard A. Kramer's ruling notes, the state Constitution trumps any ballot question and entitles same-sex couples to what he called "the last step in the equation: the right to marriage itself."

In other states, including Massachusetts, courts have focused on the "incidents" of marriage — such as joint ownership of property, shared custody and survivors' benefits. Kramer, however, placed the emphasis where it should be: on the word "marriage."

There's the rub for many Californians who are otherwise willing to accept domestic partnerships or civil unions. Political operatives have a term for this position: ABM, or "anything but marriage." The fixation on the M-word is more emotional than logical, and no doubt reflects the fact that the word "marriage" refers to both a civil partnership and a religious rite.

The M-word certainly makes the politics more difficult. Massachusetts is the only state where same-sex civil marriage is legal — and even there, the Legislature took the first step Tuesday toward allowing a popular vote on a constitutional amendment banning it. At the federal level, Congress enacted the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, defining marriage as between a man and a woman and saying that states need not recognize same-sex marriages contracted elsewhere. Forty-five states prohibit same-sex marriage in their laws or constitutions; seven passed anti-gay-marriage referendums in November.

Given the political appeal of ABM, it's remarkable — and praiseworthy — that California legislators voted to extend to same-sex couples both the symbolic and practical advantages of marriage. But Schwarzenegger's veto requires the state Supreme Court to consider the different question of whether ABM is constitutional.

This procedural history gives lie to the claims of opponents of same-sex marriage who insist that it is the invention of "activist judges." It should also guide the state Supreme Court to a decision to adopt Kramer's view that California's previous acknowledgment of same-sex unions "points to the conclusion that there is no rational state interest in denying them the rites of marriage as well."

Jay P. Lefkowitz? (WP)

By Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

During his first summer in the White House, a month before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that would shape his presidency, President Bush went on prime-time television to announce that he would allow federal money to pay for a limited amount of research on stem cells from human embryos.

The architect of that policy, navigating ethically and politically treacherous terrain, was a litigator named Jay P. Lefkowitz who was working as general counsel in the White House's Office of Management and Budget. Eight months later, Bush would promote Lefkowitz to deputy assistant to the president overseeing domestic policy. Many White House watchers expected that the cerebral neoconservative, whose judgment the president so clearly trusted, would rise further still.

Instead, Lefkowitz decamped from the White House -- and Washington -- in 2003. And although he is reluctant to discuss it, he has twice since then declined to return to top West Wing jobs.

Lefkowitz moved his family to New York, his wife's home town, where they enrolled their three children in a yeshiva, an intensive Jewish school, and became heavily involved in the Orthodox community.

He went back to his old law firm, Kirkland & Ellis, where he has a partnership and an eclectic mix of cases. He has been representing a large generic-drug manufacturer in lawsuits against the Food and Drug Administration (he beat the government twice); a criminal defendant in a massive tax-shelter fraud case the Justice Department is bringing against the accounting firm KPMG; and corporations such as Verizon and General Motors in commercial litigation.

"I am as engaged right now in the litigation that I'm involved in as I was when I was dealing with immigration issues or stem cell issues or helping to set up the 9/11 Victim Compensation Fund," Lefkowitz said.

He has had to weigh his two worlds. "He's at least twice been approached and asked to go back," said a former administration official who knows Lefkowitz and is close to the White House. The first time would have been as deputy chief of staff after Joshua B. Bolten moved from that job to budget director. The official, who spoke about personnel matters on the condition of anonymity, said the second would have been another senior West Wing position after Bolten became Bush's chief of staff last spring.

Lefkowitz still has a part-time role in government -- and the president's ear. He said he was in Jerusalem during Passover in the spring of 2004 when his cellphone rang. It was Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, asking whether he would be interested in becoming the president's special envoy on human rights in North Korea.

Devoting about one-fifth of his prodigious working hours to the task, he reports to Rice but has, he said, met with Bush "several times."

After The Rip Van Winkle Years (NYT)

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

The mood at Eliot Spitzer's Jan. 1 inauguration was exuberant, and that was hardly surprising. Few politicians are offered the opportunity that greets Mr. Spitzer as he becomes New York's 54th governor.

Mr. Spitzer, who has built his career on reform, is arriving in a state capital that desperately needs it. The comptroller was forced to resign after pleading guilty to a felony. The Senate majority leader is being investigated by the F.B.I. for his outside consulting work. Another state senator is charged with stealing state money, and it took a state judge to force legislators to reveal how they spend hundreds of millions of dollars a year in taxpayer money.

New York's government has slipped from a beacon for other states into a cautionary tale. So when Mr. Spitzer spoke of change in his inaugural address — an end to government "that works for those who hold office, not those who put them there" — he hit precisely the right note. With a passion and energy that Albany has not seen in years, this governor has promised to wake what he has labeled the "Rip van Winkle" government of the last decade.

Mr. Spitzer started on the right foot by issuing five executive orders to upgrade the ethics of the executive branch with rules that should go without saying, but in Albany never do — like not using state property or personnel for personal use, and not taking gifts from people who do business with the state.

By cleaning his own house first, Mr. Spitzer will have the moral high ground as he does battle to get New York's recalcitrant lawmakers to do the same. After years of mostly dozing off, they require a long list: redistricting reform, campaign finance reform, ethics reform, and budget reform, including more sunlight on how $114 billion a year is being spent.

Getting reform through the Legislature will be hard enough, but Mr. Spitzer faces equally tough challenges in dealing with budget deficits and education needs and keeping the state's high taxes in check. In his inaugural address, he pointedly said that he does not believe in "government as a heavy hand that can cure all our ills," a sign that some of his Democratic allies might not have as much clout as they are expecting.

Mr. Spitzer began setting his new tone on day one, with his "people's inauguration." The official swearing-in was outdoors, public invited. He threw open the governor's mansion for the first time since most people waiting in line could remember. Instead of a fancy ball for fat-cat contributors, he spent the night of his inauguration at a free concert by James Taylor and other crowd favorites.

For the first time in years, we see a figure poised to rattle Albany's do-little establishment, to air out a dark, closed government and to try to convert New York's Legislature to the higher purposes of public service. New Yorkers can only hope Mr. Spitzer makes it all happen.

Keep The Steel Rising (WSJ)

By Brian M. Carney

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

Eliot Spitzer has been telling us for -- well, it seems like forever -- that "on Day 1, everything changes." Here's one thing that shouldn't: the Ground Zero rebuilding plan.

The current master plan for those 16 acres in lower Manhattan isn't perfect. In fact, it's real far from perfect. It barely qualifies as OK. But it has this virtue -- it exists. And it is being built. Slowly, haltingly, yes. But after far too long, things are happening downtown. Beams are reaching skyward, or at least aspiring to reach ground level from the bottom of the pit 70 feet below. Buildings have been designed, street grids have been laid -- on paper, anyway.

Mr. Spitzer, the new governor of New York, says he intends to take a "fresh look" at Ground Zero and the Freedom Tower. I say, look all you want, guv. Come down here and stare at the site. I'll even offer to join him under the scaffolding that hangs over that alley formerly known as Liberty Street. Come look. Just don't do anything to slow reconstruction down here.

Along with thousands of other New Yorkers, I walk past Ground Zero every work day, and I look at it all the time. This has given me time to reflect, and I've decided that New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin was right -- it's a hole in the ground. No question about it. Only rebuilding can change that sorry fact.

I don't particularly like the Freedom Tower. Its design is uninspiring. The economic case for it is dubious at best. I have moral reservations about trying to force public-sector employees to work in a building that no private-sector firm will touch with a 10-foot pole. But as a view from my office window, it would sure beat a hole in the ground.

I'm confident I'm not alone in this. Tourists may flock to the fences that gird Ground Zero, but I don't detect a sizable constituency for holey-ness down here. People whose lives are affected by the mess downtown just want things to stop getting worse and start getting better. Which means building something.

The trouble is that, while everyone's in favor of building something, a lot of people differ on what should be built, and where, and so on. It's time we moved beyond that. The plan we've got is the only one we've got, and any alternative is likely to anger as many people who are now content as to content those now angry.

The real act of leadership here would be to declare that we're moving forward, that this scar in the fabric of Manhattan is going to be repaired. So, look all you want, Mr. Spitzer. But keep the concrete mixers mixing and the steel rising. New Yorkers have waited too long as it is.

Mr. Carney is a member of The Wall Street Journal's Editorial Board.

Pat Robertson Predicts 'Mass Killing' (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

In what has become an annual tradition of prognostications, religious broadcaster Pat Robertson said Tuesday God has told him that a terrorist attack on the United States would result in "mass killing" late in 2007.

"I'm not necessarily saying it's going to be nuclear," he said during his news-and-talk television show "The 700 Club" on the Christian Broadcasting Network. "The Lord didn't say nuclear. But I do believe it will be something like that."

Robertson said God told him during a recent prayer retreat that major cities and possibly millions of people will be affected by the attack, which should take place sometime after September.

Robertson said God also told him that the U.S. only feigns friendship with Israel and that U.S. policies are pushing Israel toward "national suicide."

Robertson suggested in January 2006 that God punished then-Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon with a stroke for ceding Israeli-controlled land to the Palestinians.

The broadcaster predicted in January 2004 that President Bush would easily win re-election. Bush won 51 percent of the vote that fall, beating Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts.

In 2005, Robertson predicted that Bush would have victory after victory in his second term. He said Social Security reform proposals would be approved and Bush would nominate conservative judges to federal courts.

Lawmakers confirmed Bush's 2005 nominations of John Roberts and Samuel Alito to the Supreme Court. But the president's Social Security initiative was stalled.

"I have a relatively good track record," he said. "Sometimes I miss."

In May, Robertson said God told him that storms and possibly a tsunami were to crash into America's coastline in 2006. Even though the U.S. was not hit with a tsunami, Robertson on Tuesday cited last spring's heavy rains and flooding in New England as partly fulfilling the prediction.

Iranian Leader Scorns U.N. Sanctions (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad scorned U.N Security Council sanctions imposed against Iran, telling a crowd Tuesday that Iran had humiliated the United States in the past and would do so again.

Speaking in the southwestern provincial capital of Ahvaz, Ahmadinejad said the Security Council's resolution last month was invalid and had left the world body's reputation in tatters.

The council voted unanimously to bar all countries from selling materials and technology to Iran that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs. It also froze the assets of 10 Iranian companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

DOJ_NMG_0110717

"Let the world know that from the Iranian nation's point of view, this resolution has no validity," Ahmadinejad said.

He said the United States was the main power behind the resolution, and warned Washington: "I want you to know that the Iranian nation has humiliated you many times, and it will humiliate you in future."

The U.S. has led the drive to stop Iran from enriching uranium — a process that produces the material for either nuclear reactors or bombs. Iran denies that it seeks to build atomic weapons, saying its nuclear program is limited to the generation of electricity.

Ahmadinejad said the sanctions were not important but were part of a campaign of psychological warfare against Iran that was designed to provoke dissent within the country.

Recalling the West's support for Iraq, then ruled by Saddam Hussein, during its eight-year war with Iran in the 1980s, he said: "If all the powers that supported Saddam in his war against Iran were to regroup and confront Iran again, Iranians would deliver a historic slap in their face."

Ahmadinejad said Iran had done everything it could to prove that its nuclear program is peaceful, but the West — in the name of opposing nuclear weapons — was trying to thwart Iran's development.

"We have tried all legal, wise and logical ways to convince these corrupt and selfish powers," he said.

While Ahmadinejad has repeatedly attacked the Security Council resolution, he has avoided any public comment on the results of Dec. 15 municipal elections, in which his political allies were heavily defeated.

The polls were seen as an electoral test of Ahmadinejad's presidency, and the success of his opponents suggested that voters want him to pay more attention to domestic issues rather than foreign policy.

Some people in the crowd in Ahvaz on Tuesday tried to remind the president of the need to address domestic problems. State television showed a placard carried by one spectator that read: "Inflation, unemployment, insecurity, drug addiction have desiccated the tree of the revolution."

Inflation is officially at 12 percent but thought to be much higher, and an estimated 3 million people are unemployed.

Russia Anti-aircraft Weapons Sales To Syria, Iran On Schedule (AFP)

AFP, January 3, 2007

Controversial Russian contracts to sell anti-aircraft weapons to Syria and Iran are being fulfilled on schedule Russian officials said.

At least half of the 29 Tor-M1 missile systems bought by Iran for 1.4 billion dollars (1.06 billion euros) had been delivered, state-run ITAR-TASS quoted an unnamed source at the defence ministry as saying Tuesday.

"We are actively carrying out deliveries of the system to Iran. At least 50 percent of the contract has been delivered," the official was quoted as saying.

The air defence systems are being stationed around Iran's civilian nuclear sites, according to ITAR-TASS.

The United States, which is leading international pressure against Iran's nuclear programme, strongly resisted the contract and imposed sanctions against Russian jetmaker Sukhoi and arms exporter Rosoboronexport.

Meanwhile, Interfax news agency quoted Valery Kashin, head of weapons maker Engineering Design Bureau, as saying that Russia met all its commitments in 2006 under the contract to supply Syria with the Strelets anti-aircraft system. He gave no details.

Israel spoke out against the 2005 deal, claiming that Syria would pass on the system, which fires Igla ground-to-air rockets, to Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon.

Details about the quantity and cost of the Strelets contract have not been made public.

Troops May Leave Somalia 'in Weeks' (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Ethiopian troops could be pulled out of Somalia "within a few weeks", Meles Zenawi, Ethiopia's prime minister, said on Tuesday, adding that the victors of Somalia's two-week war were now "mopping up remnants" of the country's former Islamist leaders.

Addis Ababa, which backs Somalia's weak transitional government, launched an offensive on December 24 against the Islamist movement which has controlled much of the country's south since June.

After Ethiopia sent in thousands of troops, supported by tanks and fighter jets, the Islamists retreated rapidly and on Monday fled Kismayo port, their last stronghold.

But despite promises of a swift withdrawal, doubts remain about when Mr Meles would be willing or able to pull back his troops.

DOJ_NMG_0110718

Ethiopia is believed to have had troops in Somalia for months before it announced its military presence in December and Ali Mohamed Gedi, the Somali prime minister, on Tuesday said the forces should stay for months until the country had been pacified.

Ethiopia faces a painful dilemma: if it withdraws too quickly it could leave a security vacuum in an often threatening neighbour that has endured 15 years of chaos and violence.

However, the longer the troops stay, the more likely the Ethiopians could be seen as an occupation force or become embroiled in a guerrilla war with the remaining Islamist forces.

Some observers said that while Addis Ababa had legitimate security concerns, it had broken international protocols by invading Somalia. But Washington, which also accused the Islamist movement of including al-Qaeda suspects, is believed to have given tacit support to Ethiopia to mount its offensive.

The military operation will also be a drain on Ethiopia's meagre resources. The country maintains one of Africa's largest armies, estimated by an Ethiopian analyst to be about 150,000 troops, down from a figure of up to 300,000 during its 1998-2000 border war with Eritrea.

But the impoverished country of 77m people is dependent on donor funding and Mr Meles' government has agreed to keep military spending at a flat cash rate of 3bn birr ($355m, €269m, £181m) a year in recent years.

Aid donors will be monitoring to see if there has been any rise in defence spending. "We will be looking very carefully to see if Somalia has had an impact," said one western diplomat in Addis Ababa. "If it has, we will take a very serious view of that."

Regardless of the aid advantages of a swift withdrawal from Somalia, it is likely to take weeks before a peacekeeping mission could deploy and fill any security vacuum.

Diplomats and the Somali government have called for an African-led operation, but it is unclear who would finance or contribute troops to the mission.

An official with the cash-strapped African Union, which is already overstretched providing peacekeeping troops in Sudan's Darfur region, told the Financial Times the organisation was still internally discussing proposals.

Ethiopian Premier Says His Troops Won't Stay In Somalia (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia, Jan. 2 — Prime Minister Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia said Tuesday that his country, one of the poorest in the world, could not afford to keep troops in Somalia much longer and that it was ill equipped to play the role of peacekeeper there.

Two hours after he spoke, two Ethiopian soldiers were gunned down in an ambush in southern Somalia in one of the first strikes of an anticipated anti-Ethiopian guerrilla campaign.

According to residents in Jilib, about 250 miles southwest of Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, a fighter for the Islamist forces, who were routed last week by Ethiopian-led troops, had shot two Ethiopian soldiers while they were crossing a bridge. Witnesses said the fighter then dashed into town and was quickly surrounded by Ethiopian troops, who killed him.

"It was a suicide mission," said Mohammed Subiye, a farmer in Jilib.

The Islamist forces, which in the span of one week went from ruling much of Somalia to fleeing into the bush, have vowed to fight a guerrilla insurgency against the Ethiopians, whom they consider infidel invaders.

But Mr. Meles said he did not plan to have his troops to remain in Somalia for much longer, possibly only a few more weeks. The troops were dispatched to neutralize the rising regional threat posed by the Islamists, he said, and now international peacekeepers are needed to bring order to a country that has been synonymous with anarchy for 15 years.

"We don't have the money to take this burden individually," Mr. Meles said during a speech to Ethiopia's Parliament.

Diplomats in the region are hurrying to cobble together an African peacekeeping solution, but despite murmurs of commitment from several countries, including Uganda, South Africa and Nigeria, a force has yet to materialize.

Somalia is far from stable, with many heavy weapons still in the hands of warlords, and the country's turmoil is likely to dissuade many nations from volunteering troops.

On Tuesday, Ali Mohammed Gedi, Somalia's transitional prime minister, reiterated his plea for the nation's many gunmen to turn in their weapons. But few seemed to be listening. The collection points across Mogadishu remained empty, and many young men defiantly vowed to keep their guns.

Meanwhile, the remnants of the once-fierce Islamist army continued to flee south from Kismayo, the port city 100 miles from the Kenyan border that had been a final stronghold until the Islamist military definitively collapsed there on Monday.

Kenyan authorities said 10 fighters were apprehended on Monday as they tried to slip through the border disguised as refugees. Eight had Eritrean passports while two had Canadian passports, said Alfred Mutua, a spokesman for the Kenyan government. All of them were carrying briefcases packed with cash.

"They definitely didn't look like refugees," Mr. Mutua said.

Mr. Mutua said that the suspects remained in Kenyan custody and that they would probably be returned to Somalia to face charges under the transitional government, though it has not yet set up a justice system.

The Islamists tried to improve their military prospects by calling for a global jihad against Ethiopia, a country with a long Christian history. But in the end, American officials said, only a few hundred foreign fighters answered the call, the bulk of them from Eritrea, Ethiopia's archenemy.

Still, the Islamists were widely believed to have been sheltering several wanted terrorists, and American officials said they were hoping to use the swift collapse of the Islamist forces as an opportunity to capture men they have been chasing for years.

Ships from the Fifth Fleet of the United States Navy, based in Bahrain, have increased patrols off Somalia's coast to prevent any suspects from escaping.

"Yes, we have a presence out there," said Lt. Denise Garcia, a spokeswoman for the Fifth Fleet.

So far, though, no suspects have been apprehended.

Somalia continues to be a work in progress. The country's transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, has yet to set foot in the capital, and only a select few officials of the transitional government have returned to it. Many of them seem to be pulling in wildly different directions.

On Tuesday, Hussein Mohammed Aideed, the interior minister and son of a notorious warlord, announced that he would like to erase the 1,000-mile long border between Somalia and Ethiopia.

"We should unite, just like the Europeans," Mr. Aideed said at a news conference. "One money. One passport. One security."

Many Somalis consider Ethiopia a historic enemy and were appalled by the suggestion.

"All I can say is that the interior minister is entitled to his opinion," said Abdirahman Dinari, the spokesman for the transitional government. "But he does not speak on behalf of the government."

Ethiopian Troops Leave Security In Mogadishu To City's Residents (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Jan. 2 -- The sandy road from airstrip K-50 is littered with the remnants of roadblocks, heaps of pushed-aside stones left over from when warlords balkanized this coastal capital, and rusted metal gates where Islamic militias took charge from the warlords.

On Tuesday, clusters of Ethiopian troops were here and there on the road into the city, leaning against gray crumbling walls or passing in trucks along wasted yellow cornfields still sopping from recent floods.

Within the city's borders, the Ethiopian troops who chased out the country's Islamic Courts movement on behalf of Somalia's weak transitional government were hardly visible.

Six days after the transitional government took hold, very little security was evident beyond that which Somalis have grown accustomed to providing for themselves: roving pickup trucks filled with armed teenagers, and AK-47-toting militiamen who guard the city block by block, and clan by clan.

It was the first day after Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi demanded that thousands of former Islamic fighters and citizens in general surrender their weapons or be forcibly disarmed. But with the ability of Gedi's government to provide security in doubt, almost no one complied.

Only a few spectators showed up at the points the government had set up to collect guns.

In an interview, the country's interior minister, Hussein Farah Aideed, said lawmakers would return this week to their town of exile, Baidoa, to approve Gedi's declaration of martial law and a plan to allow 90 days -- instead of Gedi's original timeline of three days -- to disarm militias.

In what amounted to an appeal for outside help, Aideed also conceded that the transitional government was weak. "We have a symbolic government. Ministries we don't have, a military we don't have," he said, sitting in shirt and tie inside a house fortified with his personal set of guards slinging assault rifles. "We're limited."

Aideed is the son of Mohamed Farah Aideed, a Somali warlord targeted by U.S. military forces in a failed raid in 1993 that led to the deaths of 18 American soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0110720

In a densely populated neighborhood of Mogadishu, people still walk past the rusted parts of the U.S. Black Hawk helicopters shot down in that incident. They buy mangoes next to the rusted-out shells of tanks. They go about life in a city of salty air and bombed-out buildings and the leftover grace of old Italian arches.

On Tuesday, Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi reiterated that he would withdraw his troops soon, while Gedi appealed to the 53-country African Union to accelerate efforts to deploy troops to Somalia.

Perhaps thousands of militiamen who fought for the vanquished Islamic Courts movement have melted back into the city's maze-like neighborhoods, each now controlled by clans and sub-clans and sub-sub-clans. There is lingering tension around the city that nothing is settled yet, and fears remain that the Islamic fighters could reemerge in a guerrilla-style war against the government that ousted them.

Aideed said the most hardened fighters had fled south with their leaders along the coast toward the Kenyan border, where they were being pursued by Ethiopian troops. The group is thought to include three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, and the U.S. Navy was patrolling Somalia's coast to help prevent escapes by sea.

The fighters have vanished into an area thick with mangrove forests, and Aideed said that finding them would be difficult even for the best-trained soldiers.

On Monday, Kenyan authorities arrested 10 foreigners suspected of being Islamic fighters as they attempted to slip across the border.

Kenyan President Mwai Kibaki said in a statement that his country would not provide refuge to people seeking to undermine regional stability.

Some analysts have said, however, that for political reasons, Kenyan authorities might give refuge to certain members of the Islamic movement in an effort to avoid trouble with their own substantial population of Somalis who might be sympathetic to the exiled fighters.

Somali Disarmament Begins Slowly (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia — A government-mandated disarmament program here got under way Tuesday without much of a bang.

At one designated weapons drop-off point in the Somali capital, bored-looking Ethiopian soldiers mulled about with little to do. A second collection site, nestled atop a bluff overlooking the Indian Ocean, closed early because "no one showed up," according to a Somali government soldier.

The disarmament program is the first major test of Somalia's transitional government since its troops and Ethiopian allies defeated Islamic fighters and seized control of this capital, a city so awash with guns that most government officials were previously afraid to even visit.

Prime Minister Ali Mohammed Gedi on Monday set a three-day deadline for gun collection, threatening to use force after that to pacify the city.

But if Tuesday's turnout was any indication, the government is facing a steep challenge in convincing Mogadishu residents to part with their weapons. The campaign is also reigniting long-standing clan rivalries and distrust, which are certain to play a big part in the nation's turnaround.

Ever since the government announced the disarmament program, the streets have been abuzz with debate over whether it will succeed. Though most support disarmament in theory, those with guns call it a Catch-22 situation: The government wants to round up weapons before dispatching more soldiers in the capital, while residents don't want to give up their guns until they're assured that troops can keep the peace.

The presence of Ethiopian soldiers, who helped chase off the Islamists, only complicate the issue. The two nations have a history of warfare and many Somalis fear that the Ethiopians are attempting to occupy their country.

"I will never give my gun to the Ethiopians," said one young man, who like many did not want to be identified for fear that the government might come and take his gun. "They are the enemy."

Others cited financial considerations. Assault rifles and machine guns in Mogadishu range from several hundred dollars to several thousand, representing the largest single asset many families own. For thousands of young men, carrying a gun and working as a militia member or security guard are the only job prospects available. But the government is not offering cash in exchange for the guns.

As a result, prices for weapons at Mogadishu's gun market plummeted in recent days as gun owners rush to sell their weapons rather than give them away to the government. AK-47 assault rifles dropped from $300 to $120.

DOJ_NMG_0110721

Last June, the Islamic courts became the first local authority to sharply reduce the number of arms in the Mogadishu in nearly 16 years. Rather than collecting the weapons themselves, the courts set up regional, clan-based authorities to collect guns from their fellow clansmen.

But when Islamists fled Mogadishu a week ago, they opened their weapons stockpiles to the public, once again flooding the city with guns.

The current disarmament campaign is sparking familiar clan distrust. Most residents in Mogadishu are members of the Hawiye clan, considered Somalia's largest. But many Hawiye subclans, including the subclans of several warlords and Islamist leaders, are deeply skeptical of the transitional government. They say it's unfair to disarm Mogadishu without also collecting the guns from the rest of Somalia. Hawiye fear they will become vulnerable to attacks by other clans.

"I'm keeping my gun," said a 33-year-old former Islamic court official. "They should disarm the entire country at the same time."

He and other Hawiye also complained that President Abdullahi Yusuf is a member of the Darod, another major clan based originally in the north. Darod and Hawiye began fighting over control of Mogadishu after the 1991 fall of military dictator Mohamed Siad Barre. In the end, many Darod were killed or driven out of their homes. Now Hawiye in Mogadishu fear Yusuf, who has spoken disparagingly about their clan in the past, will use the disarmament program to take retribution.

"He's trying to favor his own people," said the former Islamic court official.

Clan experts say the government must first demonstrate that it is neutral before clan rivals will trust it.

"The only language the government can use to unite the clans of Somalia is to restore peace and order through justice and equality," said Sharif Mohamed Ali, an elder with the small Ashraf clan, which in the past has avoided the clan wars.

Somalia Tense After Islamists Vanish (CSM)

By Rob Crilly

The Christian Science Monitor, January 3, 2007

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA

For six months Somalia's Islamists used freelance warlord Mohamed Qanyare Afrah's home as one of their bases as they took over much of the country. They used his many battlewagons and held meetings in his living room.

Last week, they fled an onslaught led by troops from neighboring Ethiopia with Somalian government forces.

Mr. Qanyare is grateful but only up to a point. "What I say is Ethiopia should not interfere in Somalian politics," he says. "They can stay as long as they are fighting Al Qaeda - that is a problem for the entire region. But if they try to become involved in our politics then we will oppose them."

Ethiopia's preemptive offensive signals the opening of a new front in the global struggle against Islamist militants. And the speed of the Islamists' retreat is reminiscent of how insurgencies began in both Iraq and Afghanistan, say analysts. Now, victory may hinge upon whether warlords like Qanyare support occupying Ethiopian forces or the Islamists.

For now Qanyare says his opposition to Ethiopians would be political.

But his armored personnel carrier sits in silent threat outside his door. At his gate, a young boy holds a machine gun.

And 50 of his "technicals" - pickup trucks mounted with heavy-caliber machine guns - sit around the corner from the whitewashed house, six miles from Somalia's capital, Mogadishu. Bitter rivalry with Ethiopia

Ethiopian forces are not popular in this battle-scarred land. Many in Mogadishu see them as an invading force rather than a liberating power. This is due to a longstanding, bitter rivalry between Ethiopia - a country with a large Christian population - and mostly Muslim Somalia. The countries fought two wars in the last 45 years, and Somalia still lays claim to territories in Ethiopia.

Diplomats want an international peacekeeping force to replace Ethiopian troops.

But for now, Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi is reliant on Ethiopia's tanks and artillery to keep his fractious nation in line.

They propelled his meager government forces across Somalia and into the capital, which the Islamists held for more than six months, raising fears that an African Taliban would seek to make the Horn of Africa a haven for Al Qaeda.

Some analysts warn that Mr. Gedi is not doing enough to prepare for the Ethiopians' withdrawal - promised in a matter of weeks.

They warn that without the Ethiopians, his feeble government will be left trying to fill a political vacuum that could let in the return of the warlords and clan militias who held Somalia in anarchy for 15 years - or even allow the Islamists to rise again.

Already Mogadishu has returned to the fear and lawlessness it knew before the Union of Islamic Courts (UIC) imposed its version of order.

Tuesday, Gedi told journalists his foreign allies would not leave before their work was done.

"The Ethiopians will leave when we have cleared our territory of terrorists and when we have pacified our capital," he said.

That will take "a week, or weeks, or months, not more."

DOJ_NMG_0110722

So far he is pursuing a two-pronged strategy to promote peace.

He has asked the African Union to send peacekeepers and has declared a three-day amnesty for gun owners to give up their firearms.

There were no takers at the Villa Baidoa Tuesday - an old presidential villa designated as one of two collection centers.

"We haven't even taken a pistol," said a Somalian government soldier.

In a city where AK-47s cost $150, most families and businesses rely on one for protection.

Arabey Ma'Alim Abdulle, who coordinates security in the donkey-clogged streets that make up Bakaara market, says he only needed a torch and a nightstick when the Islamists were in power.

Now he has no intention of giving up his gun.

Matt Bryden, consultant to the International Crisis Group, says Gedi's government is following the wrong strategy.

"It should be concentrating on winning over the Hawiye clan - the main support base for the [Islamists] - by bringing them into some sort of government of national reconciliation," he says.

"You have a state of confrontation between the Hawiye and the government and that's where a settlement has to be pursued," he said. "That means some sort of settlement that makes the Hawiye feel like they are part of the government."

That would mean Gedi - himself a Hawiye but largely despised by his kinsmen as a weak and ineffectual leader - losing his position, which is not on the table, added Mr. Bryden. Ethiopian troops keep a low profile

Tuesday, Somalia's Ethiopian guardians kept a low profile in Mogadishu.

Two tanks guarded the airport runway and a contingent of soldiers was at the port.

The main Ethiopian firepower is based in Afgooye, about 10 miles from Mogadishu, or has followed the Islamists south.

In the south, they managed to rout the Islamist forces, forcing them out of their main stronghold of Kismayo. From there the Islamists have disappeared into the forests of Ras Kaambooni, close to the Kenyan border.

Hussein Aideed, deputy prime minister, admits the government now faces a tough challenge. "To clear [the Islamists] will take a long time. It will not be days this time, but maybe three or four months," he says.

Meanwhile, in parts of Mogadishu, Somalis are reverting to the lives they lived before Islamic law was imposed. Western music has returned to the Global Dancehall, where Somalis welcomed the new year.

When the Islamists were in control, staff were forced to play traditional music and keep the volume down.

Still, freedom to party won't erase the worries Somalis have about a return to anarchy now that the Islamists are gone. "As a businessman, I want stability," shouts Mustafa Haji Abdullahi, the 22-year-old chief operating officer of Telcom Somalia, above a blaring hit by US rapper 50 Cent. "I'm already back to paying bribes."

Now everyone is waiting to see whether the government can consolidate its position or whether it would disintegrate under the pressure of Somalia's bloody history.

"All it would take is for one Ethiopian soldier to make a mistake, to shoot someone, to be accused of rape, and then it is all over," says Mr. Abdullahi. "We would be in for another 16 years of mayhem."

Ethiopia Will Keep Troops In Somalia (USAT)

USA Today, January 3, 2007

Ethiopia said Tuesday that its troops will stay in Somalia for a few more weeks to help the government, but the Islamists they ousted in a brief war vowed to "rise from the ashes." The Islamists, who fled their last stronghold on Monday after a two-week conflict, said they refused a government offer to surrender. "If the world thinks we are dead, they should know we are alive," Islamist spokesman Abdirahim Ali Mudey said.

In Mogadishu, where the interim government set up gun-collection points at the start of a drive to disarm the nation, Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi said Tuesday that Ethiopian troops will leave "when they clear terrorists and pacify Somalia. It will be weeks and months, not more."

Bombing ends Basque peace talks in Spain

The peace process to halt Spain's Basque separatist conflict ended with the weekend car bombing at Madrid's international airport, Interior Minister Alfredo Perez Rubalcaba said. "There is no process. It has been broken, it is over, it has been liquidated. ETA ended it with the bomb it set off in Madrid," he said of the militant group blamed for the explosion. Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero had said Saturday that he was suspending — but not canceling — plans to negotiate with ETA, which in March had declared a cease-fire it called permanent. Saturday's blast leveled a five-story parking lot, injuring 26 people and leaving two people missing and feared dead amid tons of rubble.

Former Jerusalem mayor Kollek dies

Teddy Kollek, the mayor who presided over Jerusalem's reunification in 1967, died Tuesday. He was 95.

DOJ_NMG_0110723

When Kollek took office in 1965, Jerusalem was divided between Israeli and Jordanian rule. In the 1967 Six Day War, Israel seized and annexed the Arab eastern part of the city. Over his nearly three decades in office, Kollek solidified Israel's hold over east Jerusalem, but also tried to reach out to its Arabs. "Teddy Kollek was the builder of the new Jerusalem after the Six Day War," said Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the man who eventually ousted Kollek in the 1993 mayoral race. The Jerusalem Foundation, a charity founded by Kollek, said he died of natural causes.

Peru lobbies U.S. for free-trade deal

Peruvian President Alan Garcia stressed his country's desire for a free-trade agreement in a meeting Tuesday with a delegation of U.S. senators, but he received a mixed response along party lines.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he had "fallen in love with the people of Peru." He did not refer to prospects for ratification in Congress, however, amid his party's concerns about the lack of protection for Peruvian workers in the pact signed by Peru and the Bush administration last April.

Sen. Bob Bennett, R-Utah, was supportive, urging that Peru become a "major trading partner."

Meeting To Tackle Somalia's Need For Peacekeepers (WP)

By Karen Deyoung

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Rapidly unfolding events in Somalia have opened a window of opportunity to establish a viable government there, according to the Bush administration and its European and African allies. But there is little optimism that the international political will and resources needed to exploit it will emerge before the window slams shut.

Diplomats from the United States and other nations in the Somalia Contact Group will meet today in Brussels to examine ways to quickly install an all-African peacekeeping force. The peacekeepers would replace Ethiopian troops whose lightning invasion ousted Islamic fundamentalist forces last week from Mogadishu. Also under discussion is an effort to persuade cooperative elements of the newly ensconced Transitional Federal Government to open unity talks with certain moderate leaders of the fundamentalist forces, which have been driven from southern Somalia.

The contact group -- which includes U.S., European and African representatives -- has discussed the need for African peacekeepers and a unity government for some time with little progress. Today's meeting of the six-month-old group will open with new urgency for action.

"The situation on the ground has changed dramatically, possibly for the better," said a European diplomat whose government is closely involved in the issue and who spoke on the condition of anonymity when discussing the sensitive negotiations. "The name of the game is how to make sure that the government establishes itself" to survive without Ethiopian military occupation, he said. "Somalis don't like the idea of Ethiopian troops manning the capital.

"On the other hand, if the Ethiopians withdraw all of a sudden," he said, "what's going to happen? There's a fine balance between maintaining and consolidating the government" and allowing feuding warlords on all sides of Somalia's political divide to reactivate their militias.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said yesterday that his troops will stay "for a few weeks," but he called on "the international community to deploy a peacekeeping force in Somalia without delay to avoid a vacuum and the resurgence of extremists and terrorists."

The Bush administration also sees the current upheaval as an opportunity to capture three senior al-Qaeda operatives who it says have been sheltered by a faction of the Somali Islamic fundamentalists. U.S. Navy ships have been dispatched from neighboring Djibouti to patrol the East African coastline for a possible escape as the fundamentalists and their militias have been pushed south to the Kenyan border. A senior U.S. counterterrorism official said that he had seen no intelligence to support earlier reports that legions of foreign fighters landed in Mogadishu last week to support the fundamentalists.

The official declined to comment on whether U.S. military personnel, sent to northern Kenya in recent months on humanitarian missions, are operating on the ground with Kenyan forces lining the 420-mile frontier. "That gets into some operational stuff," said the official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the subject involves intelligence. "Clearly, we've got an embassy there, and very robust and very good relations with the Kenyans."

Any solution to Somalia's decades of chaos rests on untangling and soothing complicated domestic and regional enmities, as well as mustering broader cooperation and resources at a time of profound international war-weariness.

A plan to send African peacekeepers, approved last month by the African Union and the U.N. Security Council, has foundered on a lack of volunteers and resources to support them. "I wish I could be optimistic, but Somalia is tough, and everybody in the neighborhood knows it's tough," the counterterrorism official said.

Although Uganda has tentatively offered troops, it has balked over the uncertainty and danger of the mission, as well as over the lack of logistical support and airlift that only the United States is seen as able to supply. "We don't want to take the lead" in providing such support, the counterterrorism official said, "but we're willing to contribute."

One option on the table in Brussels, the European diplomat said, is to use an existing agreement between the European Union and NATO that "provides for military operations carried out by the E.U. using NATO assets." That provision would allow the utilization of U.S. airlift and intelligence -- which technically would be twice-removed -- under NATO and E.U. auspices. "We don't know if this can be done through NATO," the diplomat acknowledged. "I haven't seen many ideas yet on paper. This has happened so quickly over the holidays."

U.S. and European officials estimated that the situation is unlikely to remain stable for more than a few weeks.

Establishing a unity government is likely to prove difficult. In addition to their political differences, the transitional government in Mogadishu and the Islamic forces now on the run are separately backed by militias belonging to Somalia's two most powerful clans -- the Darod and the Hawiye. No government is likely to survive for long without representation from both, as well as from a bewildering array of divided sub-clans on each side.

As the fundamentalists were routed over the past week, many Hawiye militia groups abandoned them, at least temporarily, to wait and see which way the wind would blow.

"We think of the [Islamic] Courts as a broad spectrum of political actors in varying degrees of fundamentalism," the U.S. official said. "Those leaders who have allied themselves by choice with al-Qaeda are of concern to us. But we're not looking at the Courts as some grand enemy or threat. There are lots of variations.

"We would not be averse to some members of the Islamic Courts if they can cut a deal with the transitional government and be part of that," the official added.

Opportunity In Somalia (WT)

By Vicki Huddleston

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

Somalia has been a failed state since 1995, when the United Nations and the United States withdrew their humanitarian mission, leaving the warring clans to sort things out for themselves. For more than a decade, both Democratic and Republican administrations have written off Somalia, raising it only as a warning against U.S. military intervention in Africa. Is it any surprise then that this ungovernable and lawless state became the breeding ground for a conflict that pitted radical Islam against Ethiopia, and ultimately the West?

The overriding objective of the Supreme Islamic Courts Council since it seized Mogadishu six months ago has been to expand into neighboring Ethiopia, Kenya and Djibouti. As the Islamists overran southern Somalia, they indoctrinated school children and pressed them into the militant "al Shebab," whose ruthless leaders were growing increasingly close to al Qaeda. Their end goal was to form a Muslim caliphate in Greater Somalia under whose banner their reach would extend throughout the Horn and into central and southern Africa.

Some claimed that this was a proxy war between Ethiopia and Eritrea. Others even claimed that it was a proxy war with the United States using Ethiopia as its pawn. To believe this is to ignore the fact that the Islamic Courts' objective was to replace Somalia's secular government in Baidoa so that they could claim to rule all of Somalia. Ethiopia, alone among Somalia's neighbors, responded to the Transitional Federal Government's appeal for help.

While there were competing motives for this conflict, it is certainly not — as the Islamists claim — an instance of Ethiopian aggression with the tacit blessing of the United States. Ethiopia, along with the African Union and the international community, pressed both sides for dialogue. But the Islamic Courts — covertly funded and armed by Eritrea and supporters of a radical Islamic state in the Horn of Africa — declared a jihad on Ethiopia and attacked the Transitional Federal Government. Eritrea hoped to use the conflict in Somalia to destabilize its archenemy Ethiopia, while Islamists hoped to upset the delicate balance between Ethiopia's 75 million evenly divided Orthodox Christian and Muslims.

Some in the West argued that clan rivalry would defeat the Islamic Courts, but each victory brought them more support, both outside and inside Somalia. Others pointed out that the Islamists had imposed order on chaotic Mogadishu, ignoring the fact that they had done so at gun-point. The Arab League had increasingly sided with the Islamists, and many warned that if Ethiopia intervened on behalf of the Transitional Government it would fuel a wider war.

They were all wrong. Ethiopia's and the Somali government's surprisingly easy victories have given Somalia — and the West — a second chance to get things right. We cannot afford to lose this opportunity.

Here is what we need to do: First, international relief agencies should enhance shipments of food into the towns and villages now under the Transitional Government's control. Second, the African Union, with logistic help from the United States and European Union, should immediately deploy peacekeepers to reinforce the government. Third, the region under the auspices of the Intergovernmental Authority on Development should prepare for a transition to a broad based government that excludes the Islamic militants but includes the moderates from all of Somalia's clans.

A window has been opened, and before the Islamists close it by disrupting efforts to stabilize Mogadishu, we should take the lead in bringing together the international community in a concerted and sustained effort to turn Somalia into a viable state. The United Nations has approved an African peacekeeping mission. Let's get those forces on the ground now. Their presence will dampen the Islamists bravado and allow Ethiopia to withdraw.

Strong U.S. leadership will prevent Somalia from becoming a haven for al Qaeda terrorism in Africa.

North Korea's Foreign Minister Dies (AP)

AP, January 3, 2007

Paek Nam Sun, North Korea's foreign minister and the country's top diplomat for nearly 10 years, has died at the age of 78, official media reported Wednesday.

North Korean leader Kim Jong Il expressed his condolences, the North's Korean Central News Agency reported. The one-sentence dispatch did not elaborate on when or how Paek died.

Paek has been the North's premier diplomat since 1998. News reports have said he was suffering from an unknown illness. It was unclear who would succeed him.

His most recent overseas trip was to Malaysia and Singapore in July.

Paek's death was not expected to change North Korea's foreign policy because the North's Foreign Ministry usually implements policies that have been crafted by the ruling Korean Workers' Party. Power is heavily concentrated in Kim's hands, and state officers stray from the official line at their peril.

His death came as tensions remain high on the Korean peninsula following the North's Oct. 9 nuclear test. North Korea held nuclear negotiations with the United States and other regional powers last month, but no progress was made.

Paek graduated from the prestigious Kim Il Sung University in Pyongyang, and later took part in Red Cross talks with South Korea in the 1970s. Diplomatic involvement with South Korea, the North's wealthy neighbor and former battlefield foe, has always been a key to career advancement for North Korean officials.

Paek was also ambassador to Poland.

Paek's career is the story of an elite loyalist who rose steadily through the government layers over the decades. He was born in 1929 in North Hamgyong, a province on the Chinese and Russian borders that is home to a coal mine notorious for forced labor as well as a key missile base.

Israeli Admits Big Errors In Lebanon War, But Won't Resign (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 2 — The Israeli chief of staff, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, conceded Tuesday that the military had made serious errors during last summer's war against Hezbollah in Lebanon but said he would not resign his post.

General Halutz said Israel had badly damaged Hezbollah in southern Lebanon and killed "hundreds of terrorists." But he said Israel was "not successful in reducing the short-range rocket fire on Israel's north until the cease-fire," which came after 34 days of fighting.

Critics of General Halutz and of the Israeli government of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert have said the military relied too heavily on air power and delayed too long sending in ground troops in the numbers needed to push back the Hezbollah fighters and supporters who were firing Katyusha rockets into Israel.

Critics have also said that the military should be led by a ground forces commander — General Halutz spent his career in the air force — and that reserves were not called up in time, were badly trained and equipped, and often faced contradictory orders.

"We attacked the Katyushas, but unsuccessfully," General Halutz said.

He spoke Tuesday at a Tel Aviv news conference summing up the army's own investigation of its behavior during the war.

He said he would stay on "to correct what can be corrected," and said to resign now would be "running away." He said Mr. Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz had not asked him to go. "I have not heard my superiors calling on me to resign," he said. "If they do, I will respond."

He suggested that discipline had broken down to some degree. "There were cases in which officers did not carry out their assignments, and cases in which officers objected on moral grounds to their orders," he said, an apparent reference to resistance against attacking south Lebanese towns and villages.

He said that these instances of refusal "ran counter to the army's basic values" and that a senior officer was suspended as a result.

During the war, as criticism mounted, General Halutz effectively demoted the commander of the northern front, Maj. Gen. Udi Adam, putting the deputy chief of staff, Maj. Gen. Moshe Kaplinski, alongside him. General Adam later quit the army.

Previously, General Halutz has said the army fired some cluster munitions, with the "bomblets" placed in artillery shells, into southern Lebanon in contradiction of his orders that they be aimed only at specific targets.

The United States is investigating whether the Israelis used cluster munitions made and paid for in America in ways that contravene American regulations for the weapons' use.

General Halutz implicitly criticized Mr. Olmert for setting as a goal of the war the release of two Israeli soldiers captured by Hezbollah in a cross-border raid on July 12, an act that set off the fighting.

The Winograd committee, which is led by a retired judge, Eliyahu Winograd, and was appointed by the government, is still investigating the conflict and its outcome.

General Halutz said that if the committee called for his resignation, "of course" he would comply. Defense Minister Amir Peretz has made the same pledge.

The war ended with a cease-fire on Aug. 14, after a United Nations Security Council resolution mandated an enlarged and strengthened international peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon and supervision of Lebanon's seacoast and border with Syria to prevent the rearming of Hezbollah.

The fighting left more than 1,000 people dead on both sides. Israel says more than 500 of the dead were Hezbollah fighters, but Hezbollah disputes that.

Israel counted 159 fatalities, including 39 civilians who were killed by the more than 4,000 rockets Hezbollah fired into Israel.

In Gaza on Tuesday, Palestinian security forces were searching for a Peruvian photographer for Agence France-Presse, Jaime Razuri, 50, a day after his abduction.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, said he was hopeful. "We're sure he will soon be released," Mr. Abbas told a delegation from the news agency and French and Peruvian diplomats. "In past incidents of this kind, hostages have been freed after one or two days."

In the latest in a string of foreigner abductions, several unmasked gunmen abducted Mr. Razuri in the center of Gaza City on Monday as he was returning from an assignment with an interpreter and a driver.

Separately, warring Hamas and Fatah factions returned 14 fighters kidnapped on Monday after mediation from representatives of Islamic Jihad, Palestinian officials said.

The violence resumed Monday when Hamas gunmen shot at a brother of a senior Fatah militant in the northern Gaza Strip, violating an earlier deal for a general truce.

Israel Could Abandon Own Missiles For US System (AFP)

AFP, January 3, 2007

Israel is considering halting the development of a new generation of its Arrow defense missiles due to the high costs involved in favour of US-made missiles.

Following negotiations in recent months, Israeli leaders will make a final decision on whether to phase out the Arrow, or Hetz, missiles and opt instead for the US-made THAAD missile defense system in the coming year, the Haaretz newspaper reported Tuesday.

The THAAD missile, made by Lockheed Martin, could be delivered to Israel in 2009, according to sources in Washington quoted by the newspaper.

But the US missile defense system still has to resolve a number of technological bugs, the daily added.

For the time being, Israel is still developing Arrow missiles and is due to carry out a new test.

The last test, in December 2005, intercepted a missile similar to Iran's Shihab-3, which is capable of reaching Israel, public radio reported.

The Arrow project began in 1988, with 80 percent US backing, as part of former US president Ronald Regan's "Star Wars" project that was officially abandoned in 1993.

Since 1991, Arrow development costs have been split equally between Israel and the United States.

U.N. To Probe Sudan Abuse Allegations (AP)

By Matt Moore

AP, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110727

The United Nations will investigate a report of allegations of sexual abuse and child rape by peacekeepers operating in southern Sudan, a key U.N. official said Tuesday.

Jane Holl Lute, the U.N. assistant secretary-general who oversees peacekeeping operations, said the allegations, reported by British newspaper The Daily Telegraph, if shown to be true would not be tolerated.

"There could be truth. These environments are ones in which it is difficult to ascertain the truth. I do not believe these are new allegations. Nevertheless, we will treat them as seriously as we treat all other allegations," she told The Associated Press at U.N. headquarters in New York.

The Daily Telegraph, citing an internal UNICEF report along with interviews with more than 20 alleged abuse victims, reported that several children, some as young as 12, had been sexually abused by U.N. peacekeepers and civilian workers.

The paper said that the alleged abuse began two years ago when the U.N. Mission in Southern Sudan, known as UNMIS, arrived to help maintain peace in the region after a more than two-decade civil war.

"The first indications of sexual exploitation emerged within months of the U.N. force's arrival and The Daily Telegraph has seen a draft of an internal report compiled by the U.N. children's agency UNICEF in July 2005 detailing the problem," the paper reported on its Web site. "Evidence suggests that UNMIS staff may already be involved in sexual exploitation."

Lute said she has spoken with the force commander and chief of staff in the U.N. mission in southern Sudan "and I know they are very well briefed on what U.N. policy is and have taken steps to implement that policy across the board in that mission."

"But we don't have the facts yet in this case, and we need to ascertain the facts and follow it through to appropriate resolution and take action if necessary," she said. "We won't be complacent and there will be no impunity to the full extent of the U.N.'s authority."

U.N. policy prohibits all U.N. staff from engaging in sexual exploitation, abuse or prostitution.

Lute, who served in the U.S. Army for 16 years, stressed that the U.N. has instituted a series of measures in terms of training, clarifying standards and reinforcing messages against sexual abuse.

But she said vigilance on this matter has to be "a constant factor of life when you're rotating through 200,000 troops in as diverse environments as we do."

UN Staff 'must Help Restore Trust' (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Ban Ki-moon, the eighth United Nations secretary-general, arrived for his first day at work on Tuesday with a tough appeal for staff to embrace change and restore trust in the organisation.

In a brief appearance before reporters he vowed to give the crisis in the Sudanese Darfur region top priority and said, to questions on the execution of Saddam Hussein, that capital punishment was an issue for each state to decide on.

That appeared a step back from the UN's traditional opposition to the death penalty.

But his core message was delivered to a closed meeting of UN staff. He praised their professionalism, but warned that the UN's "sense of pride is not to be taken for granted; it must be earned. We are all here for reasons greater than our own personal advancement or national interest."

Over recent years, he noted, the UN secretariat had faced harsh, sometimes unfair, criticism and "staff morale has plummeted". But some of the criticisms, he said, "warrant our urgent attention" and "we must take bold steps to dispel them".

Mr Ban promised to build a more mobile staff, which moved between headquarters and field posts – addressing the fact that many UN officials, on reaching New York and Geneva, remain in place for years, while field positions often go unfilled.

"We have to show the international community we are ready and eager to change," Mr Ban said. "I ask senior managers to co-operate fully in my efforts to change the working culture."

Stephen Kisimbira, a UN staff representative, told Mr Ban that he expected a revamp of the UN's internal justice system, and "a fundamental change in the mindset of senior management".

There was a sense of anticipation at the UN's New York headquarters as officials wondered what the future had in store.

As a first step, Mr Ban announced two appointments over the holiday period, both well received.

His chief of staff will be Vijay Nambiar, a veteran Indian diplomat who acted as adviser to Kofi Annan, the last secretary-general. His spokeswoman will be Michele Montas, a respected Haitian journalist.

Ban Faces 'Daunting' U.N. Agenda (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 3, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110728

NEW YORK -- U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, on his first official day of work yesterday, said he would soon get started on a "daunting" plateful of international affairs, including Sudan, the Middle East and North Korea.

"The crisis situation in Darfur is very high on my agenda," he told reporters, noting that he will meet today with Jan Eliasson, the U.N. special envoy to Darfur.

Mr. Ban, of South Korea, also said he expects to meet with Sudanese President Omar Bashir at the African Union summit in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, at the end of the month.

Mr. Ban -- pronounced "Bahn Ghee-moon," an aide clarified -- placed an emphasis on meeting and perhaps reassuring the staff yesterday.

"We are all here for reasons greater than our own personal advancement or our national interests," the eighth secretary-general told hundreds of staff members at a morning meeting. "Extraordinary expectations are placed upon us, and we must strive to live up to them."

He told them that new times call for "new leadership, at all levels in the organization."

Mr. Ban pledged to pursue predecessor Kofi Annan's stalled reform suggestions, some of which were more popular with the staff than others.

Later, Mr. Ban tucked into the $3.50 beef stir-fry at the U.N. cafeteria, waving to passers-by and fellow diners.

Before the secretary-general can tackle global issues, he will need to put his own staff in place, as well as make senior appointments throughout the organization. About two dozen department heads will have to be replaced or renewed by the end of February, when most contracts expire.

Mr. Ban named Vijay Nambiar, India's former U.N. ambassador, as his chief of staff over the weekend. Mr. Nambiar was hired as an adviser by Mr. Annan in March, and accompanied him on his 15-day diplomatic tour of the Middle East to cool the ground after Israel's war with Hezbollah militants in Lebanon.

Michele Montas, a former radio journalist who has chronicled political corruption and unrest in her native Haiti, was appointed Mr. Ban's spokeswoman. The former head of U.N. Radio's French language service, Mrs. Montas will field questions at the daily U.N. briefing, making her one of the most visible faces of the new administration.

Mrs. Montas said yesterday that Mr. Ban expects to name the new heads of U.N. management and humanitarian affairs by the end of the week.

Alicia Barcena, a former chief of staff to Mr. Annan and a Mexican native, is expected to take over the U.N. Department of Administration and Management, which has been vacant since Christopher Burnham left in late November.

Mr. Ban, a career officer in South Korea's Foreign Ministry, has said he will appoint a woman from the developing world as deputy secretary-general.

Sen. Reid Meets Peruvian Leader On Trade (AP)

By Rick Vecchio

AP, January 3, 2007

Incoming U.S. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said Tuesday he had fallen in love with Peru during a short visit, but made no pronouncements on a key issue facing the two nations, free trade.

In a meeting with the bipartisan senate delegation led by Reid, President Alan Garcia stressed Peru's desire for a free trade pact.

Republicans have largely supported the free trade deal signed last April as a step in advancing commerce within the Western Hemisphere, while Democrats have expressed reservations about its ratification over what they see as a lack of protection for Peruvian workers. The administration has completed similar agreements with several other Latin nations.

"I want to tell these senators that we indeed think of a free trade agreement as something to benefit all Peruvians, not only one group with economic means," Garcia said in a public meeting with the senators and his Cabinet. "We want small businesses to also benefit."

Garcia's comments did draw support from Republican Sen. Robert Bennett of Utah.

"We would like to do whatever we can to see that Peru, and all of Latin America, becomes a major trading partner with the United States," he said.

Reid didn't comment publicly on the plan, but he spoke glowingly of the Andean nation.

"After having spent three days in this wonderful country I leave Peru understanding the government of Peru better than I did when I came here," Reid told reporters.

"Having fallen in love with the people of Peru," Reid said he had experienced something he "thought would never occur traveling to another country.

DOJ_NMG_0110729

"Being in the midst of the great Andes mountains has been a spiritual experience for me," he said, without elaborating or taking questions. "President Garcia, Viva el Peru!"

Peru was the last stop in a three-nation Andean tour by the senate delegation, which also included incoming Majority Whip Richard Durbin, D-Ill.; Ken Salazar, D-Colo.; Kent Conrad, D-N.D.; and Judd Gregg, R-N.H.

They met last week with Bolivia's leftist President Evo Morales and with Ecuador's leftist President-elect Rafael Correa to discuss international trade and anti-drug efforts, among other topics.

Merkel In Drive For Europe-US Trade Talks (FT)

By Bertrand Benoit And Quentin Peel

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Angela Merkel, German chancellor, will this month launch a sweeping initiative for the harmonisation of US and European legislation to boost investment flows and trade between the world's largest economic blocs.

Initial talks will review financial market regulations, including delisting rules, which many US-listed European companies feel are too cumbersome, as well as intellectual property law. Ms Merkel is also seeking mutual recognition of technical standards for products such as cars.

In her first interview with an international newspaper since becoming chancellor, Ms Merkel told the Financial Times she would make achieving a "transatlantic economic partnership" central to Germany's presidency of the European Union, which began this week.

Her ambition is to create a single transatlantic market for investors, with common rules and standards on issues such as intellectual property and financial regulation. However, her initiative may face opposition from a more protectionist US and other EU member states.

Ms Merkel expressed optimism that talks would also begin in the next six months on a new strategic partnership with Russia but warned Moscow that relations must be based on reciprocity. If Russia restricted foreign investment in its strategic companies, she said, it should be no surprise if EU countries took similar measures against Russian investors.

She also spelt out her determination to revive the EU constitutional treaty after the No votes in French and Dutch referendums.

Ms Merkel, who also holds the chair of the Group of Eight industrialised nations for 2007, is underlining the importance she attaches to restoring transatlantic ties by flying to Washington on Thursday to meet George W. Bush, US president.

"Our economic systems are based on the same values," said Ms Merkel. "We have learnt how to combine the Anglo-Saxon and Continental European legal systems, which are very different from one another . . . think transatlantic co-operation will be more straightforward in many areas than might appear at first glance."

Ms Merkel's initiative marks the EU's first attempt to achieve a transatlantic single market since a similar move by the European Commission in 1998 petered out because of French opposition. Formal negotiations on drafting the partnership should start at the EU-US summit in May, she said.

Matthias Wissmann, chairman of the German parliament's Europe Committee, estimates that the integration of US and EU financial markets alone could be achieved by 2015 and would cut trading costs on both sides by 60 per cent and the cost of equity capital by 9 per cent.

Ms Merkel stressed that tariffs and customs duties were not part of her plan.

Yuan's Ascent Begins To Pinch Chinese Exporters (WSJ)

By James T. Areddy

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

SHANGHAI -- The Chinese currency's rising value has started to pinch an increasing number of businesses here, eroding already thin profit margins, forcing them to reduce expenses and sometimes costing them business.

The tightly controlled Chinese yuan has crept up 6% since July 2005, when the government loosened its link to the U.S. dollar. Its gains against the dollar are modest compared with the sharper run-ups of other currencies, such as the euro. But the pace of the upswing has been unusually fast for China, where until recently companies had almost no experience with currency fluctuations against the dollar.

The yuan's 3%-plus rise against the dollar last year represented an even sharper change than the Japanese yen's 1.4% decline against the U.S. currency. Expectations that the yuan will strengthen further in 2007 have sent companies scrambling to find ways to protect themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0110730

The stronger yuan is reducing the profit Zhenhua Port Machinery Co. earns on its big shipping-container cranes when they are sold in dollars. To cushion the blow, Zhenhua is raising prices, changing sales terms and looking for efficiencies in its manufacturing processes. The yuan "revaluation obviously hit us," says Wang Jue, board secretary of the Shanghai company.

Zhejiang Dongyang Haisen Trading Co., a maker of beverage containers in eastern China, says the yuan move has entirely erased its 2% or 3% profit margin on basic products. For now, the company is offering a newer, pricier line of products for export orders, says sales manager Zhang Shengquan. "What we hope is that the appreciation [of the yuan] could slow down a bit," Mr. Zhang says.

On the whole, the Chinese government seems to be comfortable with the pace of the yuan's rise. The central bank said last week that the exchange rate has moved "in an orderly way within a reasonable range."

The new foreign-exchange pressure on exporters is likely to lead them and their allies in the Chinese government to argue against a rapid increase in the yuan's value, while others, including those worried about the inflationary side effects of restraining the yuan or political pressures in the U.S., push for a faster rise.

The yuan's gains haven't been nearly enough to blunt international criticism of Beijing's exchange-rate policy. U.S. politicians and others argue that China keeps the yuan artificially weak in order to give its exporters an unfair advantage in world markets, a tactic they blame for America's soaring trade surplus with China.

For China, the need to sustain its rapid economic growth takes precedence over exchange-rate concerns. Beijing recognizes the need to let market forces influence the yuan, but its policy makers view the shift as a complex undertaking. Few things can more easily jostle an economy than abrupt changes in the value of its currency.

As the yuan continues to edge up, so will China's export prices, says Edward Leung, chief economist of the Hong Kong Trade Development Council, a government-funded industry group. Manufacturing costs in China already face rising labor and materials expenses, he says. Further gains by the yuan will leave exporters with little choice but to charge more.

U.S. companies that have extensive operations in China are also feeling the effects. In a regulatory filing, Measurement Specialties Inc., an instrument maker based in Hampton, Va., said in November that the yuan's rise has "resulted in lower margins since a large portion of our products is manufactured in our China facility."

Opponents Of New Kosovo Must Be Stopped (FT)

By Joseph Biden

Financial Times, January 3, 2007

Years of hand-wringing and chest-thumping over the future status of Kosovo may finally be drawing to a close. In the next few months, adroit diplomacy to secure Kosovo's independence could yield a victory for Muslim democracy, a better future for south-east Europe and validation for the judicious use of American power.

But along with the potential for triumph in Kosovo, there is a growing risk that Serbia and Russia will conspire to seize defeat from the jaws of victory. Extremists in Belgrade and Moscow are – for very different reasons – hoping to use Russia's United Nations Security Council veto to quash Kosovo's bid for independence. If they succeed, the Balkans will emerge as another source of bad news in a world already crowded with crises.

During the seven years since Nato ended Slobodan Milosevic's reign of terror in Kosovo, a UN-backed administration has largely succeeded in bringing stability to the province. However, Kosovo's people are justifiably tired of a status quo marked by uncertainty and economic privation. These two intertwined problems will continue so long as the debate over the province's future remains unresolved. Its ambiguous status is also leading to stagnation in Serbia.

Nationalist politicians in Belgrade have embraced the fight against Kosovo's independence to divert public attention from their own failures and Serbia's stalled bid for European Union membership. The actions of Vojislav Kostunica, Serbia's prime minister, have been particularly disappointing. In addition to refusing international requests to call for the arrest of war crimes fugitives Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic, Mr Kostunica has rejected every attempt at compromise on Kosovo. Serbia's moral authority on the issue hit a new low in October when the 1.5m ethnic Albanian residents of the province were denied the right to vote in a deeply flawed constitutional referendum that declared Kosovo an integral part of Serbia.

To their great credit, the people of Serbia have proved more realistic about Kosovo than their elected leaders. Opinion polls show that many Serbs foresee that the province will gain independence. Ethnic Albanians in Kosovo, meanwhile, overwhelmingly expect to sever ties with Serbia. With citizens on both sides of the issue ready to finish the debate and move on to more constructive challenges, leaders who block a solution will do so at their peril.

Historically, trouble in the Balkans is almost always the result of false expectations. On the whole, the citizens of south-east Europe are mentally prepared for an independent Kosovo.

DOJ_NMG_0110731

If Belgrade postpones a settlement it will reopen the issue for many Serbs previously resigned to Kosovo's independence and further inflame frustrations among the region's ethnic Albanians. The result could be a return of the mob violence that shook Kosovo in March 2004.

A Russian effort to delay a deal on Kosovo would be in keeping with the Kremlin's habit of fostering weak, subservient governments in formerly communist states. Moscow has apparently reached the conclusion that impoverished, unstable regimes are easier targets for manipulation than prosperous, independent countries. It has made extensive, public use of oil and gas diplomacy to undermine the budding democracies of eastern Europe. Less attention has focused on the Kremlin's quiet efforts to exacerbate territorial conflicts in Georgia, Moldova and Azerbaijan. Serbia could become the latest victim of this strategy.

Kosovo is not ready for full sovereignty. Even after independence, Nato and the international community will need to provide security guarantees for Kosovo's minorities and strengthen its economy and institutions. But it is time to grant the province independence. The longer the status debate continues, the further Kosovo and Serbia will fall behind other rapidly progressing former Yugoslav republics such as Croatia and Slovenia.

Success in Kosovo, if realised, will have implications far beyond the Balkans. A responsible Russian approach to the issue could demonstrate the Kremlin's commitment to global order at a time when its credibility is in tatters. The people of Kosovo – already the most pro-American in the Islamic world – will provide a much-needed example of a successful US-Muslim partnership. Stability in south-east Europe would be a welcome bit of good news and offer hope in a season of tremendous foreign policy challenges.

A New Beginning For Turkmenistan (WP)

By Nurmuhammet Hanamov

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

Last week Turkmenistan buried its brutal dictator, Saparmurad Niyazov. His ruthless reign spanned two decades, during which time his policies became increasingly irrational and unpredictable. The long list of Niyazov's crimes against our people includes: banning all political parties except his own and jailing his opponents; preventing thousands of "disloyal" citizens from traveling abroad; persecuting religious and ethnic minorities; outlawing opera; and shutting down regional hospitals, firing thousands of doctors and nurses. Under Niyazov, Turkmenistan became a corridor for heroin trafficking from Afghanistan to the West and gained for itself one of the highest heroin addiction rates in the world.

Above all, Niyazov was a selfish and kleptocratic despot, stashing billions in proceeds from the sale of the country's enormous natural gas resources in personal accounts in Western banks. He used this money to fuel his outlandish personality cult, building opulent palaces and golden statues of himself even as his people were deprived of basic necessities and suffer one of the world's lowest life expectancy rates. The West's indifference was striking compared with the relentless criticism by the United States and the European Union against the more benign regime of Alexander Lukashenko, president of gas-poor Belarus.

With Niyazov gone, the West has a historic second chance to help our country make a peaceful transition to democracy. Turkmenistan's interim rulers have unfortunately pledged to continue Niyazov's policies (even ordering new statues of him), and their efforts to grab power amount to a coup d'?tat. The former health minister -- under the de facto control of Niyazov's Presidential Guard -- has arrested the speaker of Parliament, who constitutionally is next in the line of succession. He has sealed the country's borders and, using other unconstitutional measures, has set the stage for his own unchallenged victory in presidential elections scheduled for Feb. 11.

The United States must send a clear message to Niyazov's holdouts in the "interim government" in Ashgabat: that they will not have its support unless they agree to hold free and fair elections -- ones that allow all citizens of Turkmenistan, including exiled opposition leaders and political prisoners, to take part.

We know that the United States has tried to help the people of Turkmenistan in recent years, and thanks to American educational exchange programs, there is a thriving community of bright Turkmen students and intellectuals who are living in Western countries and are ready to return and help rebuild their country. This community is largely held together by the efforts of Khudaiberdy Orazov, a former chairman of the National Bank and an accomplished and energetic leader who was forced into exile several years ago. He was unanimously nominated to be a candidate in the February presidential elections by a broad coalition of opposition groups inside and outside of Turkmenistan. According to a recent poll, Orazov's candidacy would have the support of a majority of Turkmen voters. Until Orazov and other opposition candidates are allowed to contest the February elections, the United States and the European Union must refrain from recognizing the junta in Ashgabat and freeze all personal accounts of Niyazov and his cronies abroad. We hope that members of Congress and other government officials will visit Turkmenistan soon to personally deliver that message.

We must rebuild our country, and with the help of our friends and neighbors we can do it in an open and transparent way. Priorities for a democratically elected government during the initial post-Niyazov reconstruction must be to release all political prisoners, conduct open tenders and allow Western companies to bid for a stake in developing Turkmenistan's oil and gas fields; to consider new ways of getting our gas and oil to Western markets; to restore private property that Niyazov confiscated from Turkmen citizens; and to create a reconstruction fund using Niyazov's personal bank accounts and proceeds from the sale of oil and gas to revive the health-care and education systems.

The United States is spending billions of dollars trying to turn Afghanistan and Iraq -- both deep in the throes of civil war -- into democratic nations while all but abandoning their peaceful post-Soviet neighbors to the north. Turkmenistan is ready for a new beginning, and the West must finally step up to the plate. To do otherwise would waste a historic opportunity and allow yet another case of popular discontent with an illegitimate government to become an anti-Western lost cause.

The writer is the founding chairman of the Republican Party of Turkmenistan in exile. Before announcing his opposition to President Saparmurad Niyazov's regime and going into exile in 2002, Hanamov served as Turkmenistan's ambassador to Turkey and Israel and chairman of Turkmenistan's State Planning Committee.

Now It's Belarus's Turn (NYT)

The New York Times, January 3, 2007

A year after Russia put the gas squeeze on Ukraine, it was Belarus's turn. Unlike Ukraine, Belarus blinked two minutes before the Jan. 1 deadline and Russia had its booty: a 50 percent share of Belarus's pipeline network and a more than doubling of the price Belarus will now pay for Russian gas.

There was no global outcry this time. President Aleksandr Lukashenko, the utterly Soviet boss of Belarus, has no friends in the West. But this latest squeeze is another warning that the Kremlin will let nothing — personal loyalty, contracts, the law — halt its drive to reimpose state control on Russia's energy sector. It is also another reminder that the West, a big consumer of Russian energy, remains vulnerable to President Vladimir Putin's whims.

The Belarus deal came less than two weeks after Royal Dutch Shell gave in to the Kremlin's pressure and sold a controlling share in the Sakhalin-2 oil and gas project to Gazprom, Russia's state gas monopoly. Moscow is now leaning on the British-Russian joint venture, TNK-BP, to give Gazprom a large and possibly controlling stake.

A year ago, when the democratic revolutions in Georgia and Ukraine were seen as serious threats to the Kremlin's influence, Mr. Putin was eager to prop up Mr. Lukashenko. But once Mr. Lukashenko successfully stole the March presidential election, the new gas bill arrived in Minsk. That included half ownership for the Kremlin of Beltransgaz, the state pipeline operator that not only fuels Belarus but also supplies a fifth of Europe's gas.

Russia's European customers could increase their leverage — and possibly improve the Kremlin's behavior — if they negotiated jointly with Gazprom, rather than scurrying to cut separate deals. Western companies and governments also need to warn Moscow that its leverage has limits. Russia will need the expertise and capital of foreign companies if it wants to keep developing its natural resources. No one wants to do business with a bully.

More Gas Blackmail (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 3, 2007

The new year did not begin, as many had feared, with Russia's Gazprom again turning off taps that lead eventually to natural gas customers in Western Europe. At the last moment, Belarus acquiesced to the Kremlin's demands to double gas prices and cede control over the Belarusan gas-transit network, thereby avoiding the shut-off that hit Ukraine on January 1, 2006.

The bullying of Minsk this year also didn't elicit a hue and cry in the West as did last year's gas war with Kiev. Part of this is cynical self-interest: Europe gets only a fifth of its gas through Belarus compared with four-fifths through Ukraine. But this latest rendition of Moscow's spigot shakedown carries a blueprint for its strategy toward the rest of the Continent, and Europe's leaders ignore it at their peril.

This dispute was also less overtly political. Whereas the Kremlin was blatantly punishing the West-leaning democrats of Ukraine's "Orange Revolution," Belarus appeared to be a strictly economic case because its president, Alexander Lukashenko, is a Russian puppet. That's not entirely true, however.

Russia made Mr. Lukashenko's re-election possible last year, and Gazprom came to collect for that favor in the form of a new contract. His stubbornness amounted to political insubordination. The West might not have wanted to stick up for "Europe's last dictator," but leaving him out to dry only entrenches the Russians in Belarus. They will be far more difficult to expel from Minsk than Mr. Lukashenko ever could be.

As for the future, the key to the Belarus compromise was the 50% stake that Gazprom won in Beltransgaz, Belarus's gas-pipeline monopoly. Gazprom has been transparent about its aim to own the pipes that connect its gas fields to its customers.

This is one of the main reasons Moscow refuses to ratify the International Energy Charter, which requires free access to pipeline networks, and why it is lobbying hard against European Union plans to liberalize its gas market. As part of that reform, the EU would likely prohibit gas suppliers from owning pipelines, and vice versa.

Gazprom is thus scurrying to build and buy enough pipelines inside the EU to strengthen its leverage. It already owns 50% minus one share in Wingas, a joint venture with BASF's Wintershall AG unit that, according to Gazprom, owns 2,000 kilometers of pipe in Germany as well as Europe's largest underground gas storage site. Moscow must figure that, if it can consolidate enough, the Europeans won't have the backbone to force Gazprom out. Given Brussels' timid reaction to Paris's shotgun marriage of Gaz de France and Suez, the Kremlin might be right.

This type of monopoly power is worrying enough in companies and countries where the state has a large influence in the energy sector: Think of France's GdF and EdF. It's even worse when the state is the company, as in Russia today, and explicitly bars certain foreign investments while changing investment terms on a whim. European customers who want to know how they might be treated by a vertically integrated Gazprom might ask Royal Dutch Shell CEO Jeroen van der Veer; late last month he was all but forced to cede control of his Sakhalin-2 oil project to the Russian gas giant.

Gazprom's monopoly status also undercuts claims by the company and Kremlin -- pardon the redundancy -- that the situation in Belarus was merely a matter of introducing "market pricing" to the former Soviet republic. The same line was trotted out in the disputes with Ukraine, Azerbaijan, Moldova and Georgia. Just so we're clear, there is no proper market price for this gas. Gazprom has no competitors that could offer to fill the pipelines to Belarus with Russian gas at a lower price. But never mind. Let the advocates of Kremlin capitalism answer this: Since when does "market" economics entail the forced sale of one firm's assets to another, particularly when those assets weren't for sale in the first place?

It's hard to remember now, but before its Ukrainian blackmail last year Gazprom had a decent reputation for reliability. So much for that. All the more reason for Brussels to expedite its plans for gas-market liberalization. We'll get an idea of how European policy makers size up the threat from Russia on Thursday, when the EU's Gas Coordination Group meets, and next week when the European Commission unveils its energy sector review. No news on the liberalization front will be bad news.

The Squeeze On Belarus (WP)

The Washington Post, January 3, 2007

EUROPE narrowly averted another energy supply crisis this week when Russia and Belarus struck a last-minute deal, preventing a threatened Russian cutoff of natural gas supplies. Since Russian gas flows through Belarus to Poland and Western Europe, a disruption could have affected consumers far beyond Belarus, as happened a year ago when Russia turned off the tap to Ukraine. The source of the dispute was the same in both cases: Russia's demand that its neighbors pay vastly increased prices for gas and turn over controlling stakes in pipelines that carry gas to the rest of Europe. Belarus, like Ukraine, claimed that Moscow's commercial hardball was politically motivated, while the Kremlin argued that it was merely ending subsidies that were a legacy of the Soviet Union.

In fact both sides are telling the truth -- but it's the political ramifications that should concern Western governments. As executives of the Kremlin-controlled Gazprom company asserted, the price to be paid by Belarus -- $100 per thousand cubic meters of gas in 2007 -- is still one of the better deals Russia offers, even if it is far more than the previous rate of $46. But Belarus obtained the discount only by agreeing to sell a controlling interest in the transit line, thereby advancing Russia's disturbing campaign to monopolize energy supplies to Europe.

Belarusan President Alexander Lukashenko is widely known as Europe's last dictator. What's less well known is that he has been resisting pressure from Russia to annex his country. Mr. Lukashenko signed a deal with Russian President Vladimir Putin several years ago under which the two countries would merge; by its terms Belarus was to adopt the Russian ruble and turn over the gas pipeline. But Mr. Lukashenko, who once dreamed that the union would propel him toward becoming leader of both countries, changed his mind when he realized he was on his way to becoming a provincial governor. He has resisted yielding the pipeline or abandoning his country's sovereignty.

Mr. Putin is consequently using "market pricing" to extract what he wants from Belarus. "We are being threatened with economic sanctions and isolation again," Mr. Lukashenko said in a New Year's address. "The reason is simple: It is our desire to be independent." He went on to denounce "anti-Belarusan sentiments" in Russia that "are dealing a blow to our century-old friendship."

Mr. Lukashenko's disillusionment with Russia might make him wish for better relations with the West. But as the European Union recently reiterated, that would require steps to democratize his country, something the strongman has shown no inclination to do. Still, Mr. Lukashenko's assertion of Belarusan sovereignty and independence could open the way to reform. If Belarus is really to survive in the center of Europe independent from Russia, it will inevitably have to accept far greater change than simply paying the market price for gas.

Sinn Fein And The Cops (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 3, 2007

IN MOST societies, it isn't news when a major political party accepts the legitimacy of the police force. But the leader of the political wing of the Irish Republican Army made not just news but history last week by doing just that. Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams said he would ask a party conference to approve a motion supporting the "police services" in both Northern Ireland and the predominantly Catholic Irish Republic.

A recognition by Sinn Fein of the new Police Service of Northern Ireland — a replacement for the Royal Ulster Constabulary long distrusted by Catholics — would be a momentous step. It would add the final piece to the jigsaw puzzle of a new arrangement in which the North's pro-British Protestant majority shares power with the Catholic minority.

If power sharing is revived, credit will belong not only to Northern Ireland's erstwhile enemies but to the United States. Abandoning this country's traditional hands-off policy, President Clinton committed his administration to the search for a solution to "the Troubles," which killed more than 3,000 people. The result was the 1998 Good Friday Agreement negotiated by Clinton's envoy, former Sen. George J. Mitchell, which called for an "inclusive" government in Belfast.

Still, even as savvy a salesman as Clinton would have failed had not successive British and Irish governments worked together, often over the heads of their supposed surrogates in Northern Ireland. Both governments combined toughness toward terrorism with an openness to negotiations and creative thinking. (Alas, there is no equivalent of the Dublin-London axis to induce Israelis and Palestinians to settle their differences.)

In 1994, in a gesture to Northern Ireland's Catholics, Britain announced that it had no "selfish" interest in ruling the North against the wishes of a majority of the population. Four years later, as recommended by the Good Friday Agreement, the Irish Republic addressed a long-standing Protestant grievance by amending its constitution to renounce any claim to govern the North.

The effect of these and other concessions was to fudge the question of whether Northern Ireland was eternally part of Ireland or eternally subject to the British crown. The answer: It's neither. The North will remain linked to Britain until a majority decides otherwise, but meanwhile both London and Dublin will take care that the Protestant majority shares power — including police power — with a long-marginalized Catholic minority. And the guns will remain silent.

It's an untidy compromise, but eminently preferable to three decades of civil strife and political deadlock. Too bad it comes to late for those who didn't survive the Troubles.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Uncertainties About Guantanamo Detainees' Rights Remain. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Sullivan, 2.03M) reports that "despite two trips to the Supreme Court, questions about the rights and status of about 400 men held" at Guantanamo Bay "are not much closer to being answered than they were when the first detainees arrived. And so the coming months will see renewed challenges to the facility in both the courts and the new Democratic Congress." President Bush signed the Military Commissions Act in October, "and the administration hopes the legislation provides a constitutional framework for holding war crimes trials for the worst detainees–including 14 'high value' detainees whom Bush transferred to Guantánamo Bay from previously secret CIA prisons." Critics "say the framework is rife with problems," and "things could change with a new Democratic Congress, especially through an effort in the Senate by incoming Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to restore habeas corpus rights to detainees."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Counterterror Advances Said To Have Led To Attack-Free Year In West. The Washington Times/AP (1/2, Haven) reports that though would-be terrorists "had no shortage of murderous ideas in 2006," including "a plot to blow up tunnels and flood New York City's financial district," and "another to bring down packed commuter airliners flying out of London," it was the first year since the September 11, 2001, attacks that "closed without a major attack in the West. In a wide-ranging analysis, security and intelligence leaders around the world told the Associated Press" that the success was the result of "greater human and technological resources, tougher counterterrorism laws, a deeper understanding of the homegrown nature of the threat and the hard lessons learned from past failures." However, "they also cautioned against complacency, saying another attack is inevitable."

Homeland Security Wants Tighter Controls On European Travelers. Newsweek (1/2, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column, "For more than 15 years, British and most other Western European visitors have been allowed to stay in the United States for up to three months without needing to apply for visas. But Homeland Security officials are now accelerating efforts to tighten entry controls on people from these and other friendly countries, including Australia and Japan, NEWSWEEK has learned." The move "follows revelations that European-born Muslims — particularly disgruntled young Brits — have been visiting Pakistan to attend terrorist training camps."

DHS Moving To Increase Visa Restrictions On Friendly Countries. In its "Periscope" column Newsweek (1/8, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports DHS officials "are now accelerating efforts to tighten entry controls on people from" visa-waiver countries, as well as "other friendly countries, including Australia and Japan, NEWSWEEK has learned. The move follows revelations that European-born Muslims—particularly disgruntled young Brits—have been visiting Pakistan to attend terrorist training camps. One proposal under consideration: requiring visitors who don't now need advanced visas to submit electronic visa applications to US authorities via the Internet at the time they purchase their tickets." DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen "said that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has discussed proposed rule changes with congressional leaders but that no formal plan has been sent to Capitol Hill yet."

Major Changes In US Passport Rules Drawing Near. USA Today (1/2, 1A, Yu, 2.27M) reports on its front page, "Five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the US government is on the verge of implementing security-inspired changes to passports that will affect millions of international travelers." A requirement for air travelers to and from Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean to carry a passport starting Jan. 23 and the introduction of new electronic passports for US citizens this spring "represent the most significant changes in border control in years, as federal officials try to bring the process of checking identification into the digital age."

TSA Says It Is Near Decision On Contract For ID Cards. The Washington Post (1/2, D2, Witte, 690K) reports "the Transportation Security Administration indicated last week" that it will award a contract "to provide a new identification card for transportation workers" early this year. Spokesman Darrin Kayser said the agency is "in the final stages of review of the contract, and we will be issuing an award in the coming weeks." The Post adds that the program "has met with repeated delays."

Security At Commercial Ports Said To Leave Room For Improvement. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Marek, 2.03M) reports the US' "361 commercial ports…have gotten so little funding in the past five years that experts routinely call them the 'soft underbelly' of America. In recent months, a flare-up of public indignation over foreign ownership of U.S. port terminals has sparked some major improvements, but further progress is by no means assured, and a host of vulnerabilities remain. With 95 percent of America's imports arriving by sea, there's a lot at stake." There's been "a surge of activity on the port security front since February, when public anxiety was stoked by a proposed $6.8 billion business deal that would have given a firm run by the government of the United Arab Emirates leases to operate terminals in six U.S. ports." In September, Congress "passed the SAFE Ports Act, which mandates that DHS provide the 22 largest U.S. seaports with enough radiation detectors to scan all containers by 2008. The bill also eases the customs staffing crunch by using contractors to review trusted shippers."

WAR NEWS:

White House Signals Increased Troop Level Will Be Part Of New Iraq Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A6, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports White House officials "say a troop 'surge' almost certainly will be the centerpiece of Mr. Bush's new strategy for Iraq to be unveiled mid-month. But while administration officials have gone to great lengths to emphasize that the extra troops will be in Iraq only temporarily, there is no clear definition of how long that might be." The debate over how long the new forces should remain in Iraq, the Journal writes, "stems from tension between the political and military aspects of the emerging proposal. Mr. Bush has staked his presidency on Iraq, and several White House aides say they believe he would be inclined to leave the extra troops there until improvement is evident. Senior commanders, by contrast, have expressed concern that leaving extra troops too long risks lasting damage to the US armed forces."

NBC Nightly News (12/31, story 3, 2:05, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The President's plan for Iraq to be unveiled in a speech to the nation will likely call for a major troop increase," and "for the first time in his presidency, Congress will be controlled by Democrats -- an added challenge for a White House trying to advance agenda." Also, aides say that during his State of Union address the President "will acknowledge missteps and promote a hopeful vision for this country and Iraq."

The Financial Times (1/2, Luce) reports President Bush "is facing mounting opposition to plans to reinforce America's military presence in Iraq" from both Democrats and Republicans. In the recent days, "a number of prominent Republican senators, including Arlen Specter and Richard Lugar, the outgoing chairmen of the Senate judiciary and foreign relations committees, have voiced strong scepticism about an increase in troops." Meanwhile, the Bush administration "faces the likelihood of tough senate hearings throughout January that Joseph Biden, the new Democratic chairman of the foreign relations committee, plans to hold from next week."

The AP (1/1, Dunbar) reported that "two prominent Senate Republicans bucked the White House" Sunday, "expressing skepticism" about more US troops in Iraq. Sen. Richard Lugar "urged the President to consult with lawmakers before announcing a new strategy on Iraq that could call for additional troops in Iraq." If Bush were to act "without involving the new Democratic-controlled Congress," he can anticipate "a lot of hearings, a lot of study, a lot of criticism," Lugar said. Separately, Sen. Arlen Specter "also questioned the wisdom of sending in more troops, saying he has not seen an administration plan that would justify it."

In a piece appearing in the Washington Post, syndicated columnist Robert Novak wrote (1/1, A13) that President Bush and Sen. John McCain "will have trouble finding support from more than 12 of the 49 Republican senators when pressing for a surge of 30,000 troops," stressing that "what to do about Iraq poses not only a national policy crisis but profound political problems for the Republican Party." Novak says Republican leaders "around the country, anticipating that the 2006 election disaster would prompt an orderly disengagement from Iraq, are shocked that the president now appears ready to add troops." What is happening inside the Republican party, Novak continues, "is reflected by defection from support for his war policy after November's election by two Republican senators who face an uphill race for reelection in 2008: Gordon Smith of Oregon and Norm Coleman of Minnesota."

Administration Officials Say Iraq Policy Unraveled In 2006. In a 3,000-word, front page article, the New York Times (1/2, A1, Sanger, Gordon, Burns, 1.16M) reports Bush "began 2006 assuring the country that he had a 'strategy for victory in Iraq,'" but "ended the year closeted with his war cabinet on his ranch trying to devise a new strategy, because the existing one had collapsed." The Administration's "original plan…called for turning over responsibility for security to the Iraqis, shrinking the number of American bases and beginning the gradual withdrawal of American troops. But the plan collided with Iraq's ferocious unraveling, which took most of Mr. Bush's war council by surprise." In interviews in Washington and Baghdad, "senior officials said the White House, the Pentagon and the State Department had also failed to take seriously warnings, including some from its own ambassador in Baghdad, that sectarian violence could rip the country apart," and "left the president and his advisers constantly lagging a step or two behind events on the ground." In a recent interview with the Times, NSA Stephen Hadley acknowledged that "Iraqi forces were not able to hold neighborhoods, and the effort to build did not show up."

As Bush Debates New Course, US Death Toll Reaches 3,000. The AP (1/1, Jelinek) reported Monday that the number of American deaths in the Iraq war reached "the sobering milestone of 3,000 on Sunday even as the Bush administration sought to overhaul its strategy for an unpopular conflict that shows little sign of abating." The Washington Post (1/1, A1, Trejos, 690K) called it "a symbolic milestone at a time when the Bush administration is rethinking its strategy for the increasingly violent conflict." Meanwhile, public discontent over the war at home "has grown, evidenced by the fact that voters gave Democrats control of the new Congress." ABC World News (12/31, lead story, 2:40, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush is downplaying the significance of the milestone, but not the sacrifice of the fallen troops."

McClatchy (1/1, Youssef) reported Bush spokesman Scott Stanzel said Sunday that the United States "will be fighting violent jihadists for peace and security of the civilized world for years to come." He said Bush would see to it that the sacrifice of US troops "was not made in vain."

Iraq Says Over 16,000 Iraqis Killed In '06. The AP (1/2, Frayer) reports the Iraqi government Monday said 16,273 Iraqi "civilians, soldiers and police died violent deaths in 2006." Meanwhile, the AP said its own accounting, "gleaned from daily news reports from Baghdad, arrived at a total of 13,738 deaths."

Official Says US Failed "In Terms Of Working With Locals." In an interview with Fox Special Report (1/1, story 7, 6:00, Angle), Henry Crumpton, the outgoing ambassador at large for counter-terrorism at the State Department discussed "the next chapter in the war on terror and how far we've come." On the subject of Afghanistan, Crumpton said that "the foundation for success was rooted in intelligence, and the networks that were established back several years ago, in fact. And also, the leadership that we had in the field, some very senior officers deployed into Afghanistan." Asked to compare US efforts in Afghanistan to those in Iraq, Crumpton said, "There are some big differences between Iraq and Afghanistan," most notably, "the variety of different ethnic configurations inside Iraq makes it different. And so in many respects, it required, at least initially, a conventional military approach, whereas Afghanistan did not." Although the US conducted a "very successful [military] campaign," Crumpton said "capturing Baghdad, that's where I think we obviously fell short, in terms of working with locals."

Bush Readying New Plan For Iraq. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports after "making it clear that he has his own no-go zones (namely, opening a dialogue with Iran and Syria and considering a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops)," President Bush is "expected to release his new plan for Iraq within days. It will very likely include an economic package that will fund microloans for small businesses and jobs in neighborhoods that have been targeted by military strikes–elements of classic counterinsurgency strategy that weave economic and political incentives together with armed measures." But "much of the chatter" surrounds "a so-called surge of U.S. troops, enough to make the total force in Baghdad larger than at any time since the war began." Democrats are "arguing that anything like a surge ignores the message sent by voters in November's midterm elections."

Newsweek (1/2, 3.12M) reports the White House "insists it knows that simply adding more troops isn't the answer. The plan being considered is far more nuanced than what has been reported in the media, a senior aide to Bush, who would only discuss the talks in Crawford anonymously, told NEWSWEEK. He said it includes money for new jobs programs and reconstruction aid for Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, as well as efforts to further shore up his political base." Newsweek adds the "debate over tactics has intensified inside the Pentagon. Bush is now trying to sort through wildly conflicting advice." The Joint Chiefs of Staff "supports the conclusions of the Iraq Study Group that, rather than sending in a new influx of U.S. troops, American advisory teams embedded with Iraqi forces should be quadrupled so Iraqis can take control more quickly. Some hawks, led by two outside advisers, former Army vice chief of staff Gen. Jack Keane and military historian Frederick Kagan, are instead urging Bush to "win the battle of Baghdad" himself. They say he can't wait for the Iraqi government, Army or police to secure the country."

January Seen As Crucial Time For White House. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, 2.03M) reports some senior Republicans "are looking at the next four weeks as 'make it or break it' time for the White House." In early January, "the Democrats will take over Congress and signal how aggressively they will confront the administration on Iraq and a wide range of domestic issues." By mid-January, President Bush "will have delivered his high-stakes speech setting forth 'the way forward' in Iraq. Bush will then give his State of the Union address on January 23." A senior GOP adviser said, "Anything the president wants to do in the last two years of his term will be contingent on the reaction to his new course in Iraq. If he bombs when he gives the Iraq speech, the fat lady sings." US News adds White House officials, "however, argue that Democrats won't be able to escape responsibility for improving the situation in Iraq."

Sunni Protests Of Saddam Execution Seen As Sign Of Growing Defiance. NBC Nightly News (12/31, story 2, 3:30, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported a "cell phone video that captured" Saddam Hussein's "final conversation before he was hanged" hit the Internet Sunday. NBC (Engel) called the video's release "a major public relations blow for the US Administration and the Iraqi government which have been trying to show the world that Saddam Hussein received impartial justice." ABC World News (12/31, story 2, 2:20, Muir, 8.78M) reported the video "reveals an ugly picture."

NBC Nightly News (1/1, story 2, 3:20, Engel, 9.87M) said that with the release of the video, "so many in this part of the world are now saying that Saddam Hussein had a public execution. And it is backfiring on the US and Iraqi administrations" as "anger among Sunnis is growing." Similarly, the CBS Evening News (1/1, story 2, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that "as Sunni anger grows over Saddam Hussein's execution, we are now learning the US wanted it put off at least two weeks. Randall Pinkston on has the latest from Baghdad." CBS (Pinkston) added, "In the hours before" the execution, "the US Ambassador to Iraq reportedly tried but failed to delay the execution." Iraqi officials said "the Ambassador insisted Iraq's Prime Minister provide proper documents, including a signature from Iraq's President."

The New York Times/AP (1/2) says the demonstrations in Baghdad Monday suggest "that many Sunni Arabs may now more actively support the small number of Sunni militants fighting the country's Shiite-dominated government." Sunnis were "not only outraged by Saddam's hurried execution," but "many were also incensed by the unruly scene in the execution chamber, captured on video, in which Saddam was taunted." Similarly, the Washington Times/AP (1/2, Frayer) says the protest was "particularly significant because it signaled a widening expression of defiance among Sunnis."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (1/2, Negus) reports the Iraqi government Monday launched an inquiry "into how guards filmed and taunted Saddam Hussein on the gallows, turning his execution into a televised spectacle that has inflamed sectarian anger." The events surrounding the execution "captured the extent to which the Shia radicals associated with" Moqtada al-Sadr "have imposed their agenda on the Iraqi state and its institutions, and the magnitude of the task facing" Maliki "as he tries to impose his authority on a deeply fractured and radicalised country."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/2, Murphy, 59K) reports that "peace is unlikely to follow" to Saddam's execution, and "while the US once believed Hussein's fall would help stabilize Iraq…that is no longer the case. What was once described as an insurgency largely made up of Baathist holdouts and some Sunni Islamist fighters, is now seen as a battle for power among Iraq's major sects." President Bush "reflected that view when he cautioned against too much optimism on Saturday." In contrast, USA

Today (1/2, 4A, Jervis, 2.27M) says the "hasty execution" will "not hurt ongoing efforts to bridge ethnic rivalries and win backing for Iraq's fledgling government."

Saddam Legacy Lives On in Sectarian Conflict. The Christian Science Monitor (1/2, Blanford, 59K) reports Saddam Hussein "may be gone, but his legacy lives on in the ethnic and religious conflict undermining a nation that he held together through fear." While the "architects of the Iraq war hoped his ouster would help spread Western-style democracy in the region," it "remains to be seen whether the lesson of his life will be the end of brutal dictatorships in the region or whether current unrest in Iraq will bolster Middle Eastern autocrats and increase resistance to democratic reforms."

American Nurse Recalls Time Spend Caring For Saddam. The Washington Times/AP (1/2) reports a US military nurse who cared for Saddam Hussein in jail "said the deposed dictator saved bread crusts to feed birds and seldom complained to his captors, except when he had legitimate gripes." Master Sgt. Robert Ellis, who cared for the former Iraqi dictator from January 2004 to August 2005 at Camp Cropper, recalled his experiences with Saddam in an interview with the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Saddam's Execution Seen As Another US Misstep. In his Newsweek column (1/2), Fareed Zakaria says, "The saga of Saddam's end — his capture, trial and execution — is a sad metaphor for America's occupation of Iraq. What might have gone right went so wrong." The Bush Administration "dismissed the idea of trying Saddam under international law, or in a court with any broader legitimacy" and it "put Saddam's fate in the hands of the new Iraqi government, dominated by Shiite and Kurdish politicians who had been victims of his reign. As a result, Saddam's trial, which should have been the judgment of civilized society against a tyrant, is now seen by Iraq's Sunnis and much of the Arab world as a farce, reflecting only the victors' vengeance."

Newsweek (1/2, Dickey, 3.12M) reports President George W. Bush "was sleeping at 9 p.m. at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, when Saddam Hussein's body plunged through the trapdoor of a gallows in Kadhimiya Prison on the outskirts of Baghdad." But like the "war that overthrew him in 2003, the hanging of Saddam Hussein did not turn out as planned. Instead of a study in modern justice, the tyrant's end looked more like the result of a sectarian show trial. From Crawford, the only comment was a muted, written statement: no proclamation of 'mission accomplished,' just of 'an important milestone' after 'a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops.' The best that could be said was that the trial was fairer than those Saddam gave his many enemies."

Saddam Played Central Role In Both Bushes' Presidency. In his Newsweek column (1/2), Howard Fineman says, "When the history is written, the saga of the Bushes and the Butcher of Baghdad will be a central thread of the family's story — and of America's at the millennium. It is not personal in the literal sense; neither President Bush ever met Saddam." But it is "'the Realists and the Neocons.' For both Bushes, dealing with Saddam became a way to measure presidential manhood -- and to express profoundly different views about the world."

Author Says Iraq Worse Off Than Three Years Ago. Author Mark Bowden writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/2, 2.04M), "I believe that in the long run people on this planet will embrace democracy and diversity, but we are not there yet. I still nurse hope that Iraqis will abandon blood feuds for compromise and a democratic future, but it appears to be a longer shot today than three years ago, and it was a bad bet then. Mr. Bush has staked his legacy on it. So, the tyrant is dead. We may have facilitated his bad end, but, sadly, violence, oppression and fear remain the time-tested ways of forging a nation state out of disparate parts."

WSJournal Says Execution Serves As Example To Dictators. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/2, A22, 2.04M) writes, "The debate over Iraq has become so poisonous that even the weekend death sentence for Saddam Hussein seems to have become morally controversial. So it's worth recalling that what happened early Saturday morning in Baghdad is that rare event -- justice for a tyrant after a fair and open trial." The world, it notes, "will have to endure future tyrants, but Saddam's hanging will have done some larger good if it gives even one of them pause to think he might suffer the same justice. Too often, faced with murderous dictators, the world's moralists demand that America 'do something' (Darfur, Bosnia) only to shrink from the reality of what that requires. In Iraq, President Bush did something. The 3,000 Americans who have given their lives in that noble mission have done so in a just cause that rid the world of a man who might have killed hundreds of thousands more."

Maliki's Shiite Alliances Seen As Undermining Ability To Unify Iraq. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/2, A1, Shishkin, 2.04M) reports that for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki the execution of Saddam Hussein was "a crowning moment in a career defined by uncompromising hatred of everything Mr. Hussein had stood for. Now Mr. Maliki is supposed to rise above the sectarian chasm that has pitted Iraq's Sunni minority against his own Shiite branch of Islam. But as Iraq moves closer to full-scale civil war, a look at Mr. Maliki's history of Shiite activism suggests he is ill-prepared to be a true unifying figure." In a Dec. 24 interview, Maliki said, "The problem is that our Sunni brothers ruled Iraq for centuries because there was no democracy, no elections. Therefore, they feel that a right has been taken away from them." However, Maliki says he believes "reconciliation is still possible." But "another huge challenge facing Mr. Maliki is the rising power of Moqtada al-Sadr."

Iraqi Shiites Seek More Independence From American Backers. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/2, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports Iraq's Shiites are "at a crossroads in their rise from oppression to power and in their relationship with the United States. In a nation riven by violence and competing visions, they feel as if they have been handed the keys to their house but never allowed to settle down. Bitter personality rifts have undermined their ability to govern. And they have yet to bridge the growing divide separating them from the Sunnis and further deepened by Hussein's execution on Saturday." As President Bush seeks a new strategy for Iraq, "many Shiites express deep mistrust of the United States and its intentions. In US efforts to engage Iraq's disaffected Sunnis, they perceive betrayal. And in US pressure to dismantle Shiite militias, they see an attempt to weaken their bulwark against Sunni insurgents." As a result, Shiite leaders "have begun to push harder for more independence from their American backers. Most recently, the government ignored US objections to hanging Hussein too hastily. He was executed four days after an appeals court upheld his death sentence."

Iraq Orders Closure Of TV Station. The AP (1/2, Torchia) reports, "The Iraqi government Monday ordered the closure of the Baghdad office of a Dubai-based television station whose newscaster wore black mourning clothes while reporting on the hanging of Hussein. A spokesman for the Interior Ministry said the Al-Sharqiya station, owned by a former chief of radio and television for Saddam, had incited violence and hatred in its coverage and had ignored warnings to stop. ... the order also followed criticism of the tone of Al-Sharqiya's coverage of Saturday's execution, which struck some as sympathetic to the ousted dictator."

US Raid Against Insurgents Kills 6 In Baghdad. The Washington Post (1/2, A10, Trejos, 690K) reports, "US forces killed six people during a raid on a suspected safe house of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq in the capital Monday morning, the military said." Saleh al-Mutlak, "a prominent Sunni member of parliament condemned the operation, saying that two of his buildings were destroyed and two of his bodyguards were killed in the attack. He said his bodyguards were not insurgents and questioned the point of the raid. ... In an e-mail response to written questions, the military disputed Mutlak's account, saying no civilians were killed or injured and that 'the terrorists killed were armed males firing at Coalition Forces.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Mutlak also "charged that American forces and the Iraqi government were giving Shiite Muslim militias carte blanche while cracking down on Sunnis. He was still seething after watching videotape of Hussein's execution Saturday, at which guards taunted the deposed president with Shiite militia chants. Mutlak said he planned to meet with fellow Sunnis and members of various parliamentary blocs this week to discuss withdrawing from the government, which is led by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite."

IEDs Have Caused Over Third Of US Troop Deaths In Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (1/2, Knickerbocker, 59K) reports, "Of the 3,000 American GIs lost in Iraq as of midday Sunday, more have been killed by roadside bombs -- improvised explosive devices (IEDs) -- than any other cause. More than by rifle fire, mortar attack, or car bomb. It's a danger that has bedeviled Pentagon war planners for months, one to which they've responded with a high-level task force headed by a retired four-star general, $6.7 billion in research and development, new high-tech equipment and vehicles, and - perhaps most important - intelligence efforts to get inside the decisionmaking of an insurgency that is sophisticated, if largely low-tech. If anything, the danger is increasing despite efforts to counter it." Improvised bomb attacks on US troops "now top 1,000 a month, four times the rate in 2004."

Roadside Bomb Changed Lives Of Survivors. USA Today (1/2, 6A, Zoroya reports in a human interest story on a March 6 IED explosion in Iraq: "The blast killed Pfc. Ricky Salas Jr. ... The blast that killed Salas left four other soldiers with wounds, physical or emotional, that may never heal." Among them is Spc. Jose Morales, who "suffered the worst injuries of those who survived. After nine months of convalescence, rehabilitation and physical therapy at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., he still struggles to walk with his prosthesis. ... Although some amputees remain in the Army, Morales is increasingly fearful he will be forced into medical retirement at age 25."

Salas' Family Traumatized By Loss. USA Today (1/2, 1A, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports, "At least 35% of [US casualties] died as Ricky Salas did: in IED explosions. In December, the deadliest month of 2006, at least 48 of 69 Army combat deaths were caused by roadside bombs. In all, 111 U.S. troops were killed last month. ... the Pentagon news release about Salas, 22, only hinted at the human cost of the March 6 explosion. No mention was made of the three other soldiers in the Humvee who were wounded in the blast. Also left unsaid were the stories of those the death toll fails to acknowledge: Salas' 22-year-old widow, the two small children she is left to raise alone, a mother emotionally adrift and a father who drowns his despair in alcohol."

US Urged To Allow More Iraqi Refugees To Enter America. In a front page article, the New York

Times (1/2, A1, Tavernise, Worth, 1.16M) reports from Iraq, "With thousands of Iraqis desperately fleeing this country every day, advocates for refugees, and even some American officials, say there is an urgent need to allow more Iraqi refugees into the United States." State Department officials "say they are open to admitting larger numbers, but are limited by a cumbersome and poorly financed United Nations referral system." Meanwhile, Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA), who is taking over the immigration, border security and refugee subcommittee, has planned hearings this month "on America's responsibility to help vulnerable Iraqis." Critics argue that the Bush administration has been "reluctant to create a significant refugee program because to do so would be tantamount to conceding failure in Iraq," adding that a "major change in policy could happen only as part of a broader White House shift on Iraq." The Times reports that State Department officials "say they are now open to increasing the number of refugee slots the administration formally requested for Iraqis in September." Assistant Secretary Ellen R. Sauerbrey "said the United States was hoping to identify the most vulnerable Iraqi refugees but was also dependent on the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to do that."

War Having Little Effect On "Much Of US." The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Tyson, White, 690K) reports in a front-page article on the impact of the death of Pfc. Ross McGinnis, who committed "a stunning act of self-sacrifice" by falling on a grenade. ... the casualties have rippled across the American psyche -- those close to the events have been profoundly moved, while those at some distance, the majority of Americans, have been largely unaffected. Concentric circles of loss spread outward, starting with grieving parents, spouses and children -- many so young they will not remember the father or mother who was killed in war. Families of the severely wounded face a future they never planned for and financial hardships they never imagined. In small towns, which supply much of the nation's fighting force, one death can send an entire community into mourning." An unnamed Special Forces veteran of Iraq says, "The fatal flaw was when right after September 11 the president asked everyone to go on with their lives. That set the stage for no one sacrificing." Also in the Washington Post (1/2, 690K), the parents of the late Spc. Ross McGinnis write about their grief: "Only time will take the edge off the knives that have wedged into our hearts."

Pop Music Said To Reflect War Fatigue. The New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) reports, "Beyond typical wartime attitudes of belligerence, protest and yearning for peace, in 2006 pop moved toward something different: a mood somewhere between resignation and a siege mentality. ... Unlike World War II, the current situation has brought little national unity; unlike the Vietnam era, ours has no appreciable domestic support for America's opponents. ... the current war has not inspired talk of generationwide rebellion (perhaps because there's no draft to pit young against old) or any colorful, psychedelically defiant counterculture. The war songs of the 21st century have been sober and earnest, pragmatic rather than fanciful."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Options Probe Puts Two Former Officials In Spotlight. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, B11, Wingfield) reports, "Now that Apple Computer Inc. has disclosed further details of its internal probe into backdated stock options at the company, the spotlight is falling on two former executives implicated in the investigation, Fred Anderson and Nancy Heinen." The Journal continues, "While the Cupertino, Calif., company still hasn't publicly named the two former executives its investigation has blamed for improper options-granting practices, people familiar with the matter confirm the pair are Mr. Anderson, Apple's former chief financial officer, and Ms. Heinen, former general counsel and board secretary." The Journal adds, "Apple -- which cleared current management, including Chief Executive Steve Jobs, of wrongdoing on Friday -- has turned the results of its investigation over to the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Apple said in a filing Friday with the SEC that thousands of options grants between 1997 and 2002 were improperly dated. … Federal prosecutors are in the early stages of their examination of Apple's backdating practices, in a process that could take months." The Journal notes, "Within the clubby circles of Silicon Valley, Apple's allegations have caused a stir among people who know the former Apple executives. A person familiar with the matter says Apple may argue that, as financial chief, Mr. Anderson should have been responsible for proper accounting of backdated options. In Ms. Heinen's case, Apple believes it has evidence that Ms. Heinen, as board secretary, was aware of improper documentation that said a board meeting occurred in October 2001 to approve a big option grant to Mr. Jobs, when no such meeting occurred. … Until more specifics are known, associates of both executives say they are standing by them. Mr. Anderson also sits on the board of Internet auctioneer eBay Inc. and is chairman of its audit committee. Meg Whitman, eBay's CEO, said Mr. Anderson will remain in both positions despite the allegations in the Apple investigation."

NYTimes Urges More Action In Options Probes. The New York Times (1/2) editorializes, "The old year was certainly a boom one for American business, with record profits for companies and record bonuses on Wall Street. But in the background a major accounting scandal has quietly spread, now encompassing more than 120 companies. Fudging the grant date for stock options doesn't quite have the spotlight-grabbing immediacy of Enron's collapse, but it is still gaming the system at the expense of shareholders." The Times continues, "A study sponsored by Harvard Law School suggests that a large number of board members, instead of watching out for self-enriching tricks, were sharing in the lucre. As Eric Dash reported in The Times recently, the study found that board members at roughly 460 companies, around 1,400 outside directors, likely received stock options that were manipulated, unnaturally boosting their value. In other words, many directors saw their stock holdings goosed along with executives'. So much for independent oversight." The Times adds, "What is particularly disturbing is that the news of this malfeasance, far from leading to full-throated calls for investigation and punishment, has coincided with a broad-based effort from business advocates to roll back the stiffer regime of enforcement devised in the wake of Enron and WorldCom. … Some logical tweaks were needed. The Justice Department's prosecution tactics in corporate cases had become a little too aggressive, and small companies deserved a break on requirements under the Sarbanes-Oxley law — a reform inspired by the malfeasance of large, complicated companies. But the relaxation of a few miscalibrated, onerous provisions is where this effort should end."

State Regulators Question Banks' Perks To Hedge Fund Traders. The New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) reports on the "hedge fund hotel" run by "giant Swiss bank" UBS, in which Boston hedge fund traders are allowed to live, "as a temporary home, complete with receptionists, espresso machines and consultants to help manage their information systems. In return, the banks hope the hedge fund hotel guests may become big clients." Massachusetts secretary of state William F. Galvin has subpoenaed UBS and other banks in an investigation into whether the practice is at odds with the interests of investors. "While the state investigation is in a preliminary stage and may not lead to any specific charges, at its heart is a thorny issue that has dogged regulators for decades. Money managers, including mutual funds and hedge funds, often pay Wall Street with 'soft dollars,'" which "are controversial because clients pay for the higher commissions, while the services often benefit the manager the most. Higher commissions result in greater expenses for the fund and potentially lower returns for investors."

Shareholder Control Of Corporations Derided. In a op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/2, A23, 2.04M) titled, "The 'Corporate Democracy' Oxymoron," Henry G. Manne, Dean Emeritus of the George Mason University School of Law, writes, "They're back! Every 20 or 30 years shareholder democracy ideas come back in vogue, and their time seems to have arrived again -- with a vengeance. The SEC is huddling on whether to facilitate direct shareholder nomination of directors through a new interpretation of its shareholder proposal rule. … But, as has been demonstrated time and again, the modern corporation is a market creation, not a political one. Hardly any aspect of 'capitalism's greatest invention' cannot be explained by reference to the market forces that caused it to evolve as it has. Indeed, there is probably no aspect of modern state corporation laws, including limited liability, 'personhood' and perpetual existence, that could not have evolved (albeit a bit more expensively) in a purely contractual, common law milieu. So it is with the selection of managers."

NYTimes Defends Sarbanes-Oxley. The New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) editorializes on the "major accounting scandal" surrounding some 120 US companies, noting that "fudging the grant date for stock options doesn't quite have the spotlight-grabbing immediacy of Enron's collapse, but it is still gaming the system at the expense of shareholders." The Times notes that this scandal has emerged even as business leaders have worked to "roll back" new restrictions under the Sarbanes-Oxley law, and while acknowledging that some "logical tweaks were needed" in the new regime, concludes, "But the relaxation of a few miscalibrated, onerous provisions is where this effort should end."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Reporters Will Be Key Witnesses In CIA Leak Case. The AP (1/2, Apuzzo) reports, "Some journalists who made careers out of questioning government officials and bearing witness to history may soon find themselves answering questions from prosecutors as key witnesses in the CIA leak case." The AP continues, "Ten or more reporters from some of the most prominent news organizations could be called to testify in the perjury and obstruction case of former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. It's rare enough for reporters to become witnesses. But the Libby case is even more unusual because journalists will be dueling witnesses – some called by the defense team, some by prosecutors. … 'It will be unprecedented and, as far as I'm concerned, horrifying,' Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said of the case, for which jury selection begins in two weeks." The AP adds, "Prosecutors want to show that Libby lied to investigators about his conversations with journalists regarding outed CIA officer Valerie Plame, and they are expected to rely on former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper and NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert to make their case. … Libby, the former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, has said he had no reason to lie and simply didn't remember those conversations. His attorneys have said they will call as many as seven unidentified journalists to testify about their conversations with Libby to bolster his case. … The Libby case has rankled news agencies for nearly three years, since Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald began subpoenaing journalists to testify before a grand jury. Fitzgerald said it was the only way he could thoroughly investigate whether any laws were broken."

DOJ Pushes For Access To Internet Records In Child Porn Probes. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/2, Reinan) reports, "The federal government wants your Internet provider to keep track of every website you visit. … For more than a year, the U.S. Justice Department has been in discussions with Internet companies and privacy rights advocates, trying to come up with a plan that would make it easier for investigators to check records of Web traffic." The Tribune continues, "The idea is to help law enforcement track down child pornographers. But some see it as another step toward total surveillance of citizens, joining warrantless wiretapping, secret scrutiny of library records and unfettered access to e-mail as another power that could be abused. … 'I don't think it's realistic to think that we would create this enormous honeypot of information and then say to the FBI, "You can only use it for this narrow purpose,"' said Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy & Technology, a Washington, D.C.-based group that promotes free speech and privacy in communication. … 'We have an environment in which we're collecting more and more information on the personal lives of Americans, and our laws are completely inadequate to protect us.'" The Tribune adds, "So far, no concrete proposal has emerged, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has made it clear that he'd like to see quick action. … In September testimony before a Senate committee, Gonzales painted a graphic and disturbing picture of child pornography on the Web, which he called an urgent threat to children. The production and consumption of child pornography has exploded as the Internet makes it easier to exchange images, Gonzales said. … But federal agents and prosecutors are hampered in their investigations because Internet companies don't routinely keep records of their traffic, he told the committee. … Gonzales also pushed for Internet records tracking in an April speech at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children."

Democrats Tie Violent Crime Spike To Decreased Federal Law Enforcement Funding. Newsweek (1/8, Isikoff, Murr) reports, "A recent surge in violent crime is creating anxiety at the Justice Department and posing potential political problems for the Bush administration. The 3.7 percent rise for the first six months of 2006, cited in a new FBI report, was greater than expected and included a 9.7 percent spike in robberies. (Minneapolis and Oakland, Calif., saw jumps of more than 30 percent.) Police groups say the surge comes at the same time the White House has drastically cut aid for state and local law enforcement programs. 'We don't have the support from Washington,' says Los Angeles Police Chief Bill Bratton. Government figures show the FBI has shifted agents off standard criminal cases to work counterterrorism; the bureau has 994 fewer criminal case agents than it did on September 11, 2001—an 18 percent drop. (A Justice Department rep says it's 'highly unlikely' the crime increase is tied to federal funding, but they've dispatched teams to investigate.) The numbers have caught the attention of top Democrats on Capitol Hill. 'If you look at the figures, they're pretty striking,' says one Democratic aide, who is not authorized to speak publicly about policy. In a recent letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Judiciary Committee member Sen. Dianne Feinstein called the crime increases 'alarming.'"

NYC Crime Rates Continues To Drop, But Homicides Increase. The New York Times (1/1, Buckley) reports, "In New York City, rapes, robberies and assaults, among other crimes, continued to decline last year, prompting the Police Department's top official to herald 2006 as a very good year. Homicides, however, climbed 10 percent in the city, reversing a much-hailed decrease. 'We'd like to see no homicides. The reality is we're going to have them,' said Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly. 'I think this is a very good year.' He called the increase in killings in 2006 all but negligible compared with 1990, a year with one of the highest homicide rates in recent history. That year, crack-fueled violence soared, and 2,262 people were killed. Last year there were 579 killings citywide as of Dec. 24, an increase of 52 homicides over the same period in 2005. Yet overall crime last year was down 5 percent. The number of reported rapes declined by 7.4 percent to 1,486, subway crime plunged 13 percent and auto theft fell 11.4 percent. The police said the year's jump in homicides was rooted largely in an unusually high number of 'reclassified' deaths, deaths linked to injuries incurred in months or years past. There were 38 reclassified homicides in New York last year, compared with 21 in 2005. … Myriad factors account for New York's continuing decline in crime overall, the police and criminologists say. They cited more effective policing, shifting drug patterns and the lowest unemployment rate in 30 years. Yet what is puzzling, one expert said, is that overall crime is dropping even as New York becomes an increasingly polarized city, with haves and have-nots often living side by side in luxury condominiums and public housing."

Houston Mayor Blames Katrina Evacuees For Murder Rate Jump. The AP (1/2) reports, "The number of murders last year in Houston hit a 12-year high and increased by 13.5 percent over 2005, figures the mayor attributes in part to the arrival of evacuees from Hurricane Katrina. Houston had 379 homicides in 2006. That was the most since 1994, when 419 murders were reported, police said. In 2005, the city had 334 homicides. Mayor Bill White pointed to Hurricane Katrina evacuees from New Orleans as one reason for the increase. 'We did have a surge in population from a city where the homicide rate is eight times the national average,' White said. Houston's population increased by 148,000 people in 2006, many of them Katrina evacuees, according to the city's planning department. The swelling population helped keep Houston's homicide rate relatively steady, rising from 16.33 victims per 100,000 residents in 2005 to 17.24 victims in 2006. Nationally, the murder rate increased by 1.4 percent last year, according to FBI figures. Some experts disagreed with White's characterization, pointing to national trends indicating rising rates of violent crime. … Other types of violent crime dropped in Houston in 2006, police said. Robberies, rapes, aggravated assaults, burglaries, thefts and stolen cars dropped between 2 percent and 9 percent when compared with 2005 statistics."

Columbus Sees Slight Decrease In Homicides. The Columbus (OH) Dispatch (1/2, Decker) reports, "Homicides in Ohio's other big cities jumped last year, but slayings in Columbus ebbed slightly." The Dispatch continues, "Columbus police say 2006 ended with 102 killings, two fewer than in 2005. There were 88 in 2004. … Lt. James S. Schrader, a homicide squad supervisor, said the unit had feared that 2006 would surpass the previous year's surge, but the slayings slowed as the year ended. … 'In the last two months, they've leveled off considerably,' he said." The Dispatch adds, "Meanwhile, killings in Cleveland and Cincinnati soared. .. Homicides in Cincinnati topped its 2005 total of 79 by early December. By yesterday, the number had risen to 85, the most victims since police started keeping reliable records in 1950. Cleveland homicides have risen from 78 in 2004 to 109 in 2005 to, as of Saturday, 119 in 2006, the deadliest year in a decade, according to FBI and local statistics. … Nationally, slayings climbed in other cities after a decade of relative peace following the crack-cocaine-driven slaughter of the late 1980s and early 1990s."

Homicides Increase In Seattle. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (1/2, Castro, Gutierrez) reports, "The increasing number of homicides has ended a steady decline in violent crime that so many large American cities, including Seattle, enjoyed during the past decade. Nationally, the number of murders increased 1.4 percent over the same period in 2005, FBI statistics show. … Seattle, still one of the nation's safest cities, has not been immune to recent crime trends. Although 2006's final statistics weren't yet available, they were expected to show that Seattle's violent crime rate rose, perhaps 1 percent over 2005. In 2005, violent crimes jumped 8 percent over the previous year." The P-I adds, "Assaults involving firearms in Seattle, something Seattle police began tracking in 2004, have climbed 37 percent since then through the end of November. … Driving up this year's homicide rate was Kyle Huff's mass shooting at a Capitol Hill home in March that shocked the community. Four months later, another gunman forced his way into the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle downtown office and shot six people, killing one. … Tose slain in Seattle this past year included a man stabbed to death by his sister's estranged husband, and a cabdriver caught in the cross fire when a woman in a brawl began shooting. … The oldest was 60. The youngest was 14. Three were beaten to death. Four were stabbed."

DC-Area Homicides Fall Sharply. The Washington Post (1/1, A01, Klein) reports, "Homicides dropped sharply in the Washington region in 2006, with the District reaching a 21-year low and Prince George's County showing a significant decrease after an alarming year of bloodshed." The Post continues, "The District recorded 167 killings -- a 15 percent drop from the 196 slayings in 2005. Prince George's had 134 killings last year, compared with a record 169 in 2005. … Overall, 417 homicides occurred in the Washington area last year, down by about 10 percent from 2005, when there were 462 killings. About half of the cases have been solved." The Post adds, "The decline comes as violence rises nationwide. Reports of homicides, assaults and other violent offenses rose by nearly 4 percent in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period in 2005, according to a recent FBI report. … Crime analysts said the Washington area's drop most likely is tied to a variety of factors, including economic gentrification, population shifts, more effective policing strategies and the jailing of violent predators. They also warned that crime is still quite high in some parts of the region. … The national rate of killings for mid-size cities the size of Washington is about 14 per 100,000 people, according to FBI statistics. The rates of the region's urban areas are higher: 29 per 100,000 in the District and 15 per 100,000 in Prince George's."

Columnist Decries Black-On-Black Homicides. In his column for USA Today (1/2, 9A), DeWayne Wickham writes, "Kevin West's murder was the 260th homicide this year in Baltimore — a city in which virtually all of the murder victims and those arrested for murder are black. On the same day that he was gunned down, tens of thousands of demonstrators marched down Fifth Avenue in New York to protest the Nov. 25 killing of another black man. Sean Bell was felled by a hail of police gunfire moments after he and two friends left his bachelor party early on the morning of the day he was to have been married." Wickham continues, "Just why the cops fired on the unarmed men is unclear. Bell's death drew the scorn of civil rights leaders and black activists, many of whom took part in the march. West's killing has generated no such attention. … And that makes me made as hell." Wickham adds, "As troubling as it is that Bell's life might have been cut short by the unlawful actions of some rogue cops, it bothers me more that most of this nation's black murder victims are killed by other blacks. And despite this chilling fact, nowhere have tens of thousands of people taken to the streets recently to protest this carnage. Not in New York, or Baltimore, or Atlanta, or Detroit, or Chicago. Nowhere. … Of the country's 14,860 homicide victims in 2005, 7,125 were black, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. And of the 3,289 cases that year in which a single black was killed by a single assailant, the FBI says, 91% of the killers were black. … Let me put this another way: The number of blacks killed in 2005 in this one homicide category alone approaches the total of all the blacks lynched in this country from 1882 to 1968, according to records maintained by Tuskegee University." Wickham concludes, "The ripple effects of black-on-black killings have turned many inner city neighborhoods into urban wastelands, chased businesses from those communities, fueled a growth in other crimes and sapped the resources of local governments. .. .As mad as black folks have a right to be over the killing of Sean Bell, we ought to be angry over the failure of black leaders to be equally outraged over the murder of Kevin West — and the thousands of blacks who are killed each year by other blacks."

Aryan Brotherhood Prosecution Relies On Inmate Informants. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Mozingo) reports, "Thick neck twitching, eyes drifting out of sync, Clifford Eugene Smith is not the most credible of witnesses: He says he is a 'drug fiend,' estimates having murdered 'about' 20 inmates over the years and lies on the stand so often that he recently committed perjury about committing perjury. Yet for the second time this year, federal prosecutors called Smith, 53, to testify against members of his former prison gang, the Aryan Brotherhood. In this go-round, prosecutors charge that Robert 'Blinky' Griffin, 58, and John 'Youngster' Stinson, 52, ordered a series of murders in an effort to create a more powerful, disciplined criminal organization and to expand drug and extortion rackets. The case went to a jury in Los Angeles on Dec. 19. The obstacle for the government, as evidenced by Smith's volatile and often colorful testimony, is that the only people who can testify about the gang's inner workings are hulking, tattooed miscreants who might scare the jurors more than the defendants. By contrast, Stinson looked downright scholarly in court, typing on a laptop, thin and pale with a whitening goatee and tortoiseshell glasses. Griffin, in sweater vests and crisp white tennis shoes, chatted amiably with his two attorneys."

Granting Of Police Power To Security Firms Draws Criticism. The Washington Post (1/2, A4, Goldstein) reports from Raleigh, NC, "Kevin Watt crouched down to search the rusted Cadillac he had stopped for cruising the parking lot of a Raleigh apartment complex with a broken light. He pulled out two open Bud Light cans, an empty Corona bottle, rolling papers, a knife, a hammer, a stereo speaker, and a car radio with wires sprouting out. … 'Who's this belong to, man?' Watt asked the six young Latino men he had frisked and lined up behind the car. Five were too young to drink. None had a driver's license. One had under his hooded sweat shirt the tattoo of a Hispanic gang across his back. … A gang initiation, Watt thought." The Post continues, "With the sleeve patch on his black shirt, the 9mm gun on his hip and the blue light on his patrol car, he looked like an ordinary police officer as he stopped the car on a Friday night last month. Watt works, though, for a business called Capitol Special Police. It is one of dozens of private security companies given police powers by the state of North Carolina -- and part of a pattern across the United States in which public safety is shifting into private hands." The Post adds, "Private firms with outright police powers have been proliferating in some places -- and trying to expand their terrain. The 'company police agencies,' as businesses such as Capitol Special Police are called here, are lobbying the state legislature to broaden their jurisdiction, currently limited to the private property of those who hire them, to adjacent streets. Elsewhere -- including wealthy gated communities in South Florida and the Tri-Rail commuter trains between Miami and West Palm Beach -- private security patrols without police authority carry weapons, sometimes dress like SWAT teams and make citizen's arrests." The Post notes, "Private security guards have outnumbered police officers since the 1980s, predating the heightened concern about security brought on by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. What is new is that police forces, including the Durham Police Department here in North Carolina's Research Triangle, are increasingly turning to private companies for help. Moreover, private-sector security is expanding into spheres -- complex criminal investigations and patrols of downtown districts and residential neighborhoods -- that used to be the province of law enforcement agencies alone."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

HUD, Baltimore To Pay $300,000 In Civil Rights Case Legal Fees. The Baltimore Sun (1/2, Siegel) reports, "The city and the federal government have agreed to pay nearly $300,000 to lawyers representing black Baltimore public housing residents - the latest installment of legal fees in a long-running civil rights case." The Sun continues, "The payments - $236,744 from the city and $53,427 from the federal government - are being made to the American Civil Liberties Union of Maryland and the private firm of Brown, Goldstein & Levy for monitoring a partial consent decree in the case during a two-year period from July 1, 2002, through June 30, 2004, according to court documents." The Sun adds, "City officials say this bill brings the total they have paid out in the case to the ACLU, Brown, Goldstein & Levy and another private firm no longer involved in the case to $1.5 million. … In addition, officials say they have paid $5.1 million since 1998 to the local firm of Whiteford, Taylor & Preston to defend the city against allegations of discrimination." The Sun notes, "LA spokesman for the Justice Department could not say how much the federal government has paid to plaintiffs' lawyers in the case, but court records indicate it is about $500,000. The Justice Department has used lawyers from its civil division to represent the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. … Under the terms of the decree that allowed the old family public housing high-rises to be redeveloped as mixed-income communities, the city and the federal government agreed to provide some 2,200 units for public housing residents in mostly white middle-class areas of the city and the suburbs by the end of 2002."

Racial Tension Sparks Melee At California Prison. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Mozingo) reports, "The weekend riot at Chino state prison erupted after two inmates — a Latino and an African American — began fighting in a recreation yard, and others, watching from surrounding dormitories, followed suit, clashing along racial lines that have racked the state prison system for decades, prison officials said Sunday. About 200 inmates took part in the 90-minute riot Saturday morning, out of the more than 1,000 inmates housed in the dorms where the fighting occurred, said prison spokesman Lt. Mark Hargrove. … Investigators have no information that the Mexican Mafia prison gang was behind the attack, or that it was meant to precipitate a race war in the prison system, Hargrove said. Wardens across the state were told to monitor activities closely, but only Chino was locked down. Of the 27 inmates taken to hospitals Saturday, 20 were released back to Chino. The prisoner thought to be the most seriously injured suffered a stab wound, a broken jaw and a laceration to the head, and was recovering in the prison hospital. Corrections officials said they had cleaned up much of the mess by Sunday. A majority of the windows in the five dorms were shattered, Hargrove said. 'They were throwing shards of glass,' he said. … Hargrove said prisoners are not normally separated by race in that facility — except after a riot like Saturday's. The facility is 27% black, 31% white, 39% Latino. Of the 27 injured, 24 were African American, including all seven of those still hospitalized."

Shalikashvili Calls For End To "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." In an op-ed in the New York Times (1/2, 1.16M), former Joint Chiefs Chairman John M. Shalikashvili writes that congress is considering legislation to repeal the US military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy regulating the service of gay personnel as part of the drive to increase the size of the armed forces. "The debate must be conducted with sensitivity, but it must also consider the evidence that has emerged over the last 14 years. When I was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I supported the current policy because I believed that implementing a change in the rules at that time would have been too burdensome for our troops and commanders." However, "last year I held a number of meetings with gay soldiers and marines, including some with combat experience in Iraq, and an openly gay senior sailor who was serving effectively as a member of a nuclear submarine crew. These conversations showed me just how much the military has changed, and that gays and lesbians can be accepted by their peers." Shalikashvili notes his belief that the policy's repeal is inevitable, concluding that when it is lifted, "gay men and lesbians will no longer have to conceal who they are, and the military will no longer need to sacrifice those whose service it cannot afford to lose."

WPost Calls For Further Investigation Into FL13 Voting. The Washington Post (1/2, A16, 690K) editorializes on the troubled election to choose the replacement of former FL13 Rep. Katherine Harris (R), in which "a mere 369 votes decided the race in favor of" Vern Buchanan (R), and in which rival Christine Jennings (D) has filed suit contesting the result based on a number of irregularities attributed to electronic voting machines. The Post argues that it is understandable "that there is a tendency to want to move on. But it would be wrong to let such impatience decide the case." Jennings and her supporters "sought access to the voting machines' 'source code' so that an outside expert could conduct an independent review under strict conditions set by a court monitor. Unfortunately, a Florida judge denied the request last week, partly because the information is proprietary. More than a winning commercial formula is at stake here. Hopefully the appeals court will see that the public good would be well served by getting to the bottom of this case. If not, the dispute is headed for what probably will be a very ugly -- and ultimately unsatisfying -- outcome in the House of Representatives."

ANTITRUST:

FCC Commissioner Calls AT&T-BellSouth Deal "Breakthrough" For Consumers. USA Today (1/2, 7B, Cauley) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission's handling of the $85 billion AT&T-BellSouth merger sets a 'new baseline' for protecting the interests of consumers, FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein said in an interview over the weekend." USA continues, "The FCC's approval of the merger on Friday allowed the deal to close immediately. To secure the FCC's blessing, AT&T agreed to a list of consumer-friendly concessions. Among them: For the next 30 months, AT&T agreed to sell 'naked' DSL — meaning consumers don't have to buy any other service from AT&T to get the DSL service — for just $19.95 a month. That's less than half the $44.95 that AT&T now charges." USA adds, "AT&T also agreed to a 'net neutrality' provision that will require the company to treat all broadband services, its own as well as rivals', equally for the next two years. That means AT&T can't favor its own traffic, in terms of transmission speed and quality. … In addition, AT&T agreed to sell some unused wireless spectrum. That could enable a new rival to enter the market, creating more options for consumers." USA notes, "Adelstein called the settlement a 'breakthrough' for consumers in that it establishes a new standard of behavior for the USA's communications giants. Big companies such as AT&T and Comcast 'have told the FCC that they can't live with a net neutrality provision in place,' Adelstein said. 'They can.' … The fact that AT&T agreed to such an aggressive net neutrality clause proves that, he said."

WSJournal Laments Inclusion Of "Net Neutrality" In AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A22, 2.04M) editorializes that AT&T CEO Edward Whitacre "was right" to call "Net neutrality" policies "nuts," and derides him for allowing "the two Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission" to require the adoption of such policies into the recent AT&T merger with BellSouth, continuing, "The more important question in this episode is political: Have we been watching a return of the Old Democratic habit of using rhetoric about 'equity' and 'justice' as a front for carrying water for certain business interests over others?" The Journal argues that "Internet users will benefit most from the rapid rollout of broadband, which requires letting companies get a return on their investment. Net neutrality is all about imposing price controls that shake down one corporate player for the benefit of another."

WSJournal Praises FCC For Easing Bells' Entry Into Cable TV Markets. In a companion piece, the Wall Street Journal (1/2, A22, 2.04M) editorializes "And speaking of the FCC (see above), we think it deserves full marks for its ruling last month that will make it easier for phone companies to enter the cable television business. The usual suspects are crying foul, but this is a decision that really will help millions of consumers who are currently paying cable rates dictated by anticompetitive video franchise agreements. For decades the incumbent cable TV providers enjoyed a virtual monopoly in most markets. Of late, the Bells have been attempting to crash this party with their own video offerings, but they're facing all kinds of barriers to entry." The Journal notes that municipalities are pressuring the phone companies to offer community perks in exchange for franchise approval, and "with some 30,000 local communities out there for the Bells to win over, all this nickel-and-diming adds up."

Tribe's Purchase Of Hard Rock Café Challenged. The Financial Times (1/2) reports, "The Seminole tribe's acquisition of the Hard Rock Cafe was plunged into controversy when Cordish, a US real estate developer, filed a lawsuit claiming it was shut out of the auction for the restaurant chain." The Times continues, "Cordish submitted documents to a Florida court late on Friday alleging that Hard Rock and Hamish Dodds, its chief executive, colluded with the Native American tribe to reduce competition in exchange for assurances that Mr Dodds would continue to run the company after the deal." The Times adds, "Baltimore-based Cordish said it had repeatedly expressed an interest in bidding but was denied access to Hard Rock's books for due diligence. The developer has already filed a suit against Merrill Lynch, the investment bank that ran the auction on behalf of Rank, the British gaming group that owns Hard Rock. … The move by Cordish comes as Rank shareholders prepare to meet next week to vote on the sale of Hard Rock for $965m." The Times notes, "The outcome is far from clear, after some analysts expressed disappointment with the price obtained in the deal. … Although it is common for shareholders to file suits against companies claiming that they might not have maximised value, it is far less common for a rival bidder to claim it was unfairly excluded from an auction."

ENVIRONMENT:

Arlington Begins Push To Curb Greenhouse Gas Emissions. The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Gowen, 690K) reports Arlington County, Va., "will buy more wind-generated electricity, give tax breaks for hybrid cars, require new public buildings to be green-certified and hand out energy-efficient light bulbs to residents as part of a major push toward reducing greenhouse gas emissions, county officials said yesterday. The county has reduced carbon dioxide and other emissions -- making its buildings more energy-efficient and adding hybrid vehicles to its fleets -- by a total of 2.6 percent since 2000, but must now sharply increase its efforts in order to reach its goal of a 10 percent reduction in the next five years, Arlington County Board Chairman Paul Ferguson (D) said yesterday." Ferguson "said he was inspired to launch the environmental initiative after seeing Al Gore's recent documentary, 'An Inconvenient Truth.'"

LATimes Backs Preservation Of Salton Lake. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, 850K) editorializes, "The Salton Sea is an accident of man and an insult to nature, an artificial lake so rank that its rotten-eggs odor often overwhelms its sparkle, an unnatural blunder with too much salt and too many dead fish. It must be saved. If only it were that easy. The lake, created in 1905 when a badly built canal diverted Colorado River water to a depression in the desert straddling Riverside and Imperial counties, is drying up and in danger of extinction. Yet if the Salton Sea were to dry up entirely, the ensuing dust storms would pollute the Coachella Valley air with toxins now underwater. The sea also is a habitat for an endangered species of fish and a vital stopping ground for 400 species of birds." The Times calls for the state to utilize the most inexpensive plan to preserve the lake.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colorado Meth-Related Arrests Said To Have Crushed Drug Ring. Calling it a top story for 2006, the Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel (12/31) reported local law enforcement agencies and the DEA "made a decisive blow against the methamphetamine epidemic when they arrested 31 local methamphetamine dealers and runners between January and March. The arrests effectively crushed western Colorado's largest meth distribution network to date, which by some estimates provided more than 70 percent of Mesa County's methamphetamine. … The ring's methamphetamine operation was credited with fueling, in part, the surging number of drug and property crimes that have plagued Grand Junction and its surrounding communities in recent years."

Washington State Marijuana Seizures Lead To More Than 340 Arrests. The AP (12/30) reported, "As 2006 draws to a close, drug-enforcement officials in Washington say they have destroyed more than 130,000 marijuana plants this year as part of a joint state and federal eradication effort. The federal Drug Enforcement Administration says that's nearly the same as last year, when a record 135,000 plants were destroyed. This year's seizures have led to more than 340 arrests and 190 weapons seizures." The Seattle Post-Intelligencer used the AP story.

Wyoming Meth Investigation Leads To 15 Guilty Pleas. The Wyoming Tribune (12/31) reported on a drug-ring investigation that it lists among last year's top stories. The Tribune wrote that law enforcement officials "arrested nine people in March in connection with the drug ring and were looking for three more people. The suspects…had apparently been running the drug ring since the previous June. They traveled to the Denver area to pick up methamphetamine and sold it from homes and hotel rooms in Cheyenne. … Fifteen suspects had pleaded guilty in May, July, August and September. Five more were awaiting jury trials."

In Kentucky, Seizure Indicates Possible Rise In Heroin Use. The AP (12/30) reported heroin "is re-emerging in the Louisville area, the result of Mexican drug-traffickers marketing to a new generation," according to federal authorities. Since July, a drug task force of federal and local police has confiscated more than two pounds of heroin with a street value of about $200,000, including two pounds recently in nearby Charlestown, Ind. Such amounts were unheard of in recent years, Tony King, resident agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration office in Louisville, told The Courier-Journal." An annual National Drug Threat Assessment report "released in October said Mexican heroin circulating in western states was spreading east of the Mississippi."

The Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal (12/30) reported officials "say heroin cases are increasing in Southern Indiana and Northern and Central Kentucky. In Indianapolis, 12 defendants await trial in U.S. District Court on charges of participating in a major heroin distribution ring."

Medical Marijuana Debate Continues In California. In "26 memories of 2006," the Palm Springs Desert Sun (12/31) wrote that the "debate over legalized medicinal marijuana came to the valley's three dispensaries. Federal agents, armed with a warrant, searched a safe deposit box belonging to a Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary in June, prompting accusations of harassment from the dispensary's owner. … A spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Los Angeles office declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation."

Dispensary Sales Seen As High-Stakes Drug Dealing. The Los Angeles Times (1/1, Tempest) reported the federal drug agency, which "does not recognize California laws legalizing the sale of marijuana to patients with doctor's prescriptions, contends the amount of money involved proves that the medical marijuana trade is nothing more than high-stakes drug dealing, complete with the same high-rolling lifestyles. 'These people will tell you they are just interested in the terminally ill,' said Gordon Taylor, DEA special agent in charge of the California eastern federal district, 'but what they are really interested in is lining their pockets with illegal drug money. When you pull the mask off, you see that they are nothing more than common dope dealers.'"

Citing the Los Angeles Times story, the Washington Times/UPI (1/1) reported larger California marijuana dispensaries "claim they are being unfairly targeted by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency. Among them is Shon Squier, 34, of Hayward, Calif., whose major storefront operation was shut down last month by the DEA, which also froze bank accounts containing $1.5 million and confiscated several expensive cars, motorcycles and $200,000 in cash."

LATimes Retraces Racketeering, Ecstasy Investigation. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Mozingo) reported on a racketeering case and wrote that confidential informants "told the Drug Enforcement Administration that Ecstasy traffickers used [Hal] Waknine's postal business to launder millions of dollars. In a single transaction, he allegedly received $11 million to launder," an affidavit by a DEA agent said. An informant "said Waknine also boasted of using his mother's company, Silhouette Paris in Studio City, 'to import MDMA [Ecstasy] in the shoulder pads of women's apparel.'" Waknine was "sentenced…to 10 years in federal prison, a year more than prosecutors were asking."

In Afghanistan, Private Militias Said To Take Orders From Drug Traffickers, Warlords. In Shahr-i-Safa, the Los Angeles Times (12/31, Watson) reported, "It is the hashish harvest season, and marijuana plants as big as Christmas trees are stacked by the thousands against mud-brick homes, curing in the sun. Villagers scrape the gooey resin, which is pressed into blocks and exported along the same routes that move the opium used to produce heroin, a big source of the insurgents' income. Hundreds of gunmen prowl the Ring Road in Helmand. They are members of private militias who take orders from local warlords and drug barons and operate illegal checkpoints, mostly to squeeze money from truck drivers."

FBI Investigating Pipe Bomb Found At Louisiana Church. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/2) reports, "FBI crime scene investigators returned today to Erwinville Baptist Church to collect evidence from the pipe bomb that was safely detonated by officials outside the church Sunday night. FBI investigators collected debris and combed the area for evidence, West Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff Mike Cazes said. The debris will be sent to the FBI's crime lab in Quantico, Va. The pipe bomb was found by deputies outside the church, along La. 413, south of U.S. 190, at 5:19 p.m. Sunday, authorities have said. The pipe bomb was safely detonated by the Louisiana State Police's Hazardous Material Unit around 9 p.m. Sunday The FBI is handling the investigation, Cazes said."

Birnbaum Says NRA's Warnings Little More Than Fundraising Ploy. Columnist Jeffrey H. Birnbaum writes in the Washington Post (1/2, A15, 690K), "In lobbying, a threat is good for business, whether it's genuine or not," which "might help to explain the dire warnings being issued by the National Rifle Association as the Democrats prepare to take control of Congress this week." Birnbaum notes that the NRA "is displeased with the voting histories of Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other top Democrats in the House and is putting them on notice that it won't tolerate passage of anti-gun measures. The only problem: No one expects gun legislation this year. … No matter. The NRA is on high alert, and its latest weapon is a pamphlet designed to send its members into fits of paranoid rage and to inspire them to open their wallets." A draft of the pamphlet "lashes out at such icons of the left as investor George Soros, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Pelosi," depicting them "as part of 'a marching axis of adversaries far darker and more dangerous than gun owners have ever known.'" Peter Hamm, spokesman for the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence "also said he does not believe Congress will take up and pass major gun legislation anytime in the near future. Still, the pamphlet asserts that 'towering waves of this coming storm are already crashing on our doorsteps.' … So beware -- and make your checks payable to the NRA!"

TAX:

State Legislatures Aim To Lessen Property Tax Burden. The Washington Times (1/2, Hurt, 88K) reports, under the headline, "States With High Taxes Try To Tackle Burden," "Americans are paying more property taxes today than ever before, and several states, including New Jersey and New York, will attempt to lessen the growing burden on homeowners in upcoming legislative sessions." The Times notes that that "rocketing" property tax rates, "fueled by the rapid increase in residential home prices, are being closely watched by anti-tax advocacy groups such as Americans for Tax Reform."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats To Start Session With "Modest Issues," Shunning GOP Input. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Levey, 850K) reports, "When Democrats take power on Capitol Hill this week, House leaders will kick off their legislative campaign with a lightning-fast 100-hour agenda. But there won't be a revolution." In "marked contrast to the Republicans who swept into the majority in 1994," incoming House Speaker Nancy "Pelosi and her legislative allies are not planning to amend the Constitution or eradicate federal agencies. Instead, their initial legislative foray will focus on modest, politically popular issues, including initiatives to expand stem cell research, lower prescription drug prices and tighten congressional ethics rules." The Times adds, "Pelosi's program is expected to receive a warm reception on Capitol Hill, even from some Republicans. Less clear is whether Democrats can follow up with solutions to the deeper problems that are troubling a restive public." Pelosi and the Democrats "plan no dramatic steps to influence the course of the war. Nor has the new majority detailed strategies to tackle other challenges that have confounded lawmakers for years, including rising healthcare costs and the financially imperiled Social Security system." The Times adds, "For now, the relatively safe 100-hour agenda may simply allow the Democrats to show they can accomplish something after a dozen years in the political wilderness."

The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Layton, Eilperin, 690K) says Democrats "are planning to largely sideline Republicans from the first burst of lawmaking." Instead of allowing Republicans "to fully participate in deliberations, as promised after the Democratic victory in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Democrats now say they will use House rules to prevent the opposition from offering alternative measures, assuring speedy passage of the bills and allowing their party to trumpet early victories. … Democratic leaders say they are torn between giving Republicans a say in legislation and shutting them out to prevent them from derailing Democratic bills." House Republicans "have begun to complain that Democrats are backing away from their promise to work cooperatively. They are working on their own strategy for the first 100 hours, and part of it is built on the idea that they might be able to break the Democrats' slender majority by wooing away some conservative Democrats."

The Washington Times/AP (1/2) reports, "On the first day back, Democrats plan to change House rules on what members can accept from lobbyists. On the second day, they'll vote on other rules changes requiring that new spending or tax cuts be paid for and that pet projects tucked into larger bills be publicly disclosed. The new Democratic Senate, under Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, will take a parallel if somewhat more leisurely track."

The AP (1/2, Abrams) reports that Linda Fowler, professor of government at Dartmouth College, "said that while some of the Democratic proposals could face a tough sell in the Senate, 'what the Democrats have done is quite reasonably recognize that they need some centrist positions that have fairly broad appeal.'" In the Senate, Majority Leader Harry Reid and Republican leader Mitch McConnell "have agreed to open the session with a joint caucus, a gesture aimed at establishing 'a new tone' and an attempt to 'produce real results next year,' said Reid."

The New York Times (1/2, Hulse, 1.16M) notes there are "divergent outlooks" within the Democratic caucus "over how best to fulfill the Democratic promise to clean up the House." These differences are "just one illustration of a friction that could develop in the new Congress as the party takes control after 12 years in exile. While most attention will be focused on the divide between Republicans and Democrats, members of the new majority have their own differing perspectives, corresponding largely to length of service, that could ultimately prove more crucial to their success or failure."

In the Washington Post (1/2, A17, 690K), E.J. Dionne writes, "The Democrats who take power in Congress on Thursday have been given an opportunity that has not come their party's way for a half-century: They can remake their own image -- and Congress's -- and they can begin to restore public confidence in government. … If Democrats don't seize this rare opportunity, their party will pay for a long time. Not only will they disillusion their own supporters, but, more important, the angry centrists of the Ross Perot stripe who voted the Republicans out last year will either go back to the GOP or seek other options." Dionne adds, "What the Democrats are talking about sounds good. What will matter is that the provisions they pass not contain loopholes that render them much less far-reaching than they seem."

Democrats Also Plan To Move On Medicare, Stem Cells. The New York Times (1/2, Pear, 1.16M) reports the new Congress "will return to some of the biggest battles of the last decade as House Democrats try to rush through legislation requiring the government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries and overturning President Bush's restrictions on embryonic stem cell research. … The Medicare proposal highlights the profound differences between Democrats and Republicans over the future of the nation's health care system, the proper role of government and the role of private markets in securing the best value for the huge sums spent on health care." The Times adds, "State officials say they wish Congress would focus on a more immediate problem: money for the Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides coverage for four million low-income children, is running out in more than a dozen states. … In debating the future of the children's health program, which has broad bipartisan support, Congress will take up proposals to cover some of the 46 million people who have no health insurance."

Yesterday, the New York Times/AP (1/1) reported that "millions of seniors… say they are happy with the" Medicare Part D benefit, "which cost the federal government about $30 billion in 2006." However, "the program affects seniors and the disabled differently, depending upon their income and health. There are many people who believe the program could be improved." The Times adds "The Bush administration estimates that the coverage saves the average beneficiary about $1,200. But many in Washington, particularly Democratic lawmakers, say the savings could be greater if the government were allowed to negotiate with drug manufacturers concerning the cost of medicine rather than leaving that chore to the plans."

WPost Derides GOP "Vandalism" On Spending Bills. The Washington Post (1/2, A16, 690K) editorializes, "They didn't quite trash the place on their way out, but congressional Republicans -- specifically, the Senate leadership under outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) -- engaged in the legislative equivalent of vandalism when it came to getting spending bills passed: They didn't. Of the measures needed to fund the government during fiscal 2007, now three months gone, the 109th Congress managed to approve only bills to pay for defense and homeland security spending. The rest of the government -- $463 billion in discretionary spending -- was left to run on autopilot." The Post adds, "Confronted with this abdication of responsibility, the incoming Democratic management…essentially" wrote off "the 2007 budget process and move on with a clean slate to 2008 -- a process that will begin in February, when Mr. Bush is to present his budget along with a whopper of an emergency spending bill to pay for operations in Iraq." The Democrats "have given themselves the clean slate they deserved. Their real test will come as they work to craft a 2008 budget that is both frugal and fair, not to mention finished on time."

Congress Not Expected To Address Federal Employee Issues In Coming Months. In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (1/2, Barr, 690K) reports, "Making decisions on government spending will be a big and early order of business for the new Congress, which returns this week. Most federal agencies are operating on an interim spending bill that expires Feb. 15. Key lawmakers have said they plan to put the government on a post-holiday diet that will stretch through September, and that could cause some headaches for federal employees." The Post adds "some agencies will have little choice but to curtail training, travel, hiring and the purchase of new equipment. It's possible that cash-strapped agencies might have to send workers home without pay for a few days, but the White House budget office hopes to be able to shift funding around to avoid furloughs and layoffs. … Although congressional aides were reluctant to make any predictions for the new year, it seems likely that the federal budget, the Iraq conflict, lobbying reform and completion of the 9/11 Commission recommendations will push many federal-employee issues to the sidelines in the opening months of the new Congress."

"Pelosi-Palooza" Tour To Precede New House Leader's Ascension To Power. The New York Times (1/2, Korblut, 1.16M) reports, "During her first 100 hours as House speaker, Nancy Pelosi has vowed, she will sweep an aggressive legislative agenda through the newly Democratic-controlled House. But first comes Pelosi-palooza. In a three-day stretch of whirlwind events beginning on Wednesday, Mrs. Pelosi will celebrate her heritage (at the Italian Embassy), her faith (in a Roman Catholic Mass), her education (at Trinity College), her childhood (in Baltimore) and her current home (in a tribute by the singer Tony Bennett, of 'I Left My Heart in San Francisco' fame)." She'll "embrace her status as the first female House speaker with a tea for women," "highlight her pull among Democrats with a $1,000-per-person fund-raising concert," and "will welcome visitors to the halls of Congress in an open-house tour." The Times notes, "The extended, carefully staged festivities are expected to dominate the occasion of Mrs. Pelosi's ascendance as the Democrats take control of Congress." Pelosi's backers "said she had every right -- an obligation, even -- to underscore her new role, given the historic nature of her rise to power. Thus the week is planned to project much more than an ordinary handoff of power in Congress. It is intended to leave a firm imprint of the new House leader's style and substance on the national consciousness, reminding voters that Mrs. Pelosi is both the first woman to take the job as well as a Catholic mother of five with Italian, blue-collar roots."

Bush, Former Presidents Pay Respects To Ford. The CBS Evening News (1/1, lead story, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The ceremony was simple, yet moving and uniquely American. Presidents along with ordinary Americans filing through the US Capitol, briefly paying respects to former President Gerald Ford. His body will lie in state in the Rotunda for one more night and tomorrow his flag-draped casket will be moved to the National Cathedral for the formal funeral service." CBS (Attkisson) added, "President Bush and the First Lady made their way to the Capitol, returning from their Texas ranch. They were followed former President Bush and his wife Barbara and one time Secretary of State James Baker, former President Clinton and Senator Hillary Clinton, Donald Rumsfeld, Defense Secretary to both Mr. Ford and Mr. Bush. Ford's body as brought here Saturday from California where he died at his desert home after a long illness."

The AP (1/2, Riechmann) reports "silence fell under the Capitol dome when the president walked toward the casket, illuminated by spotlights and guarded at each corner by members of the military honor guard. He and Mrs. Bush lowered their heads for a few moments, as if in prayer, then turned and walked away across the Rotunda's polished stone floor, which reflected the flag's red and white stripes." Bush, who "said nothing during his one-minute stop in the Rotunda, is to eulogize Ford on Tuesday at his funeral at the National Cathedral."

NBC Nightly News (1/1, lead story, 2:40, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "In all the grandness of the Rotunda in all the public nature of this ceremony, there were also children who grieved for their grandfather, a family moved by a country's respect and a former First Lady, a beloved American woman who actually had done in her own public role before allowed the nation to see her sorrow-up close and share in her burden. Advisors say…Bush invited the Ford family back inside the White House. And for some of the grandchildren it was the first time they had ever been here."

The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Puzzanghera, 850K) notes "Bush declared Tuesday a national day of mourning as a funeral service will be held for Ford at Washington National Cathedral. Most federal offices, including the courts and postal offices, will be closed." Ford's body "will be flown to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich., for a final service and public viewing before burial at Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum on Wednesday."

The Washington Times (1/2, Emerling, Cella, 88K) says "Mr. and Mrs. Bush joined thousands of mourners who braved steady rainfall and frigid temperatures yesterday to say a final goodbye to the 38th president of the United States." Similar stories, describing the scene at the Capitol yesterday, appear in USA Today (1/2, 3A, Page, Jackson, 2.27M) and the Washington Post (1/2, A3, Baker, Harris, 690K).

The New York Times (1/2, Swarns, 1.16M) reports Ford's "former cabinet secretaries and administration staff members will come together here once more, taking their seats in the black cars accompanying the funeral motorcade and in the pews of Washington National Cathedral. … For more than two decades, they had gathered at Mr. Ford's annual White House reunions, most of which were held in the nation's capital, where they chuckled over half-forgotten policy disputes and shook their heads sadly as their numbers dwindled and their host grew increasingly frail." The Times adds, "Even as their career paths and personal lives diverged, they kept in touch with Mr. Ford and with one another, reminiscing at dinner parties and lunches, and in long-distance phone calls. In mourning their president on Tuesday, the alumni of his administration will also be celebrating his life and the intimate circle he created."

The New York Times (1/2, Gay Stolberg, 1.16M) also reports that "of all the aging Washington power brokers who have re-emerged in the shadow of the death of former President Gerald R. Ford, there is one, Henry A. Kissinger, for whom the return to the spotlight may be as much curse as blessing." At a time "when the American public has soured on the war in Iraq -- indeed, at the precise moment the United States is recording the milestone of 3,000 American deaths there -- Mr. Kissinger's reappearance is stirring memories and rekindling debates about his role in managing another unpopular conflict, the Vietnam War." Kissinger, adds the Times, "continues to evoke the passions about Vietnam that Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former defense secretary, evokes today about Iraq."

The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A1, Adamy, 2.04M) reports from Grand Rapids that Ford "will be buried at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum tomorrow, in the city where he spent most of his childhood and launched his political career. As a little boy, he lived in several homes, including at least one in affluent East Grand Rapids." However, "civic leaders made little effort to preserve any of his childhood homes, even though other former presidents have had theirs turned into museums or named historical landmarks. Over the years, some of…Ford's former homes were razed."

Ford Said To Have Deeply Affected Course Of US Politics. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Cannon, 2.03M) reports that when he died last week, former President Ford "was remembered with almost universal respect and admiration as the man who did much to calm the nation after Watergate and the Vietnam War and to restore honesty and stability to the White House."

Newsweek (1/2, Thomas, 3.12M) reports one of the "more peculiar legacies of the Ford era is the attempt by both" Donald Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney "to restore the power of the presidency. They were ambitious young men who served as Ford's chiefs of staff at a time when Ford was trying to dismantle what historian Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. has called 'the imperial presidency.'" Ford was "trying to create an atmosphere of openness and cooperation with Congress and the courts after Nixon's grandiose show of presidential power — from opéra bouffe uniforms for the White House guards to the shadowy Plumbers Unit. But Rumsfeld and Cheney felt that the Watergate reforms had gone overboard, and as members of the Bush war cabinet they have pushed hard to strengthen the executive."

U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Kelly, 2.03M) reports, "Congress, the press, and the Washington establishment had pilloried Richard Nixon – for reasons good and bad – and now were leaning on Ford. 'The feeling I had then, and I think it's been borne out by history,' Cheney told U.S. News last year, 'is that the balance shifted, if you will – that, in fact, the presidency was weakened.'"

In a Newsweek commentary (1/2), Vice President Cheney writes, "He was an unassuming man, our 38th president, and few have ever risen so high with so little guile or calculation. Even in the three decades since he left office, he was not the sort to ponder his legacy, to brood over his place in history."

In a Newsweek commentary (1/2), former President George H. W. Bush said, "Jerry Ford was decent, honorable, trustworthy, down-to-earth. That was his whole personality. I hope it will be his legacy."

In a Newsweek commentary (1/2), former President Clinton says, "After Gerald Ford left the White House, I was grateful for his counsel, for his occasional support on important national issues, for the respectful way in which he articulated his honest disagreements with my policies, for a few unforgettable golf games and for the partnership he forged with President Carter, which I have tried to emulate in my work with former president Bush."

In a Newsweek commentary (1/2), former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said Ford "took over at perhaps the most perilous moment of domestic crisis since the Civil War, and he had neither the months of transition a new president normally has, nor the honeymoon a new president normally has. But he moved with calm and surefootedness into what could have been an overpowering experience."

In a U.S. News and World Report column (1/2), David Gergen says, "Why does Ford look so much better in the rearview mirror? Mostly, I suspect, because the personal qualities that he brought to public life seem so scarce these days. The simplicity of his burial reminds us again that Ford was, first and foremost, a humble man of the Midwest." Most "of all, Ford brought a forthright honesty to politics."

In his U.S. News and World Report column (1/2), Michael Barone says, "Ford was ridiculed as a bumbler though he was a gifted athlete and was dismissed as a lightweight though he entered the White House with a considerable command of foreign and domestic policy. He healed the nation and, more important, proved that it was possible to get America off its downward trajectory and heading upward again, as it did in the 1980s. Something to remember in these pessimistic times."

In Newsweek (1/2, 3.12M), historian Michael Beschloss says, "President for just 29 months, Ford changed the way we live, rescuing the White House from scandal, restoring a measure of confidence in politics and articulating a philosophy of robust executive power that influences President Bush even now. Ford's last two chiefs of staff, Vice President Dick Cheney and ex-Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld — men whose understanding of executive power was shaped by their experience in Ford's White House — have been crucial figures in the Bush years."

More Commentary. Peggy Noonan writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/2, P10, 2.04M) that Ford "was a good man, and that's not nothing -- it's something. Gerald Ford fought for his country. He didn't indulge his angers and appetites. He seems to have thought, in the end, that such indulgence was for sissies -- it wasn't manly. He was sober-minded, solid, respecting and deserving of respect. And at that terrible time, after Watergate, he picked up the pieces and then threw himself on the grenade. We were lucky to have him. We were really lucky to have him. Rest in peace."

Jon Meacham, editor of Newsweek, writes in the Washington Post (1/2, A17, 690K), "During his most critical moments in the White House -- his assumption of power and the pardoning of Nixon -- Ford drew deeply on theological imagery. Everyone knows that Ford said 'My fellow Americans, our long national nightmare is over' on Aug. 9, 1974. Much less quoted, but perhaps more revealing given the pardon, is a sentence he spoke a moment later: '[T]here is a higher Power, by whatever name we honor Him, who ordains not only righteousness but love, not only justice but mercy.'" Meacham adds that "such an understanding, naturally, has hardly been unanimous, and many Americans are reasonably uncomfortable with the idea that our leaders think they are either communing with the divine or carrying out God's mission." But "time and again in the American experience…the culture has been more in line with [Abraham] Lincoln's -- and Ford's -- views on the question of religious expression and thought in the public sphere than it has been to that of strict separationists."

Chief Justice Urges Pay Increase For Judges.

The AP (1/2, Yost) reports, "Pay for federal judges is so inadequate that it threatens to undermine the judiciary's independence, Chief Justice John Roberts says in a year-end report critical of Congress. Issuing an eight-page message devoted exclusively to salaries, Roberts says the 678 full-time US District Court judges, the backbone of the federal judiciary, are paid about half that of deans and senior law professors at top schools." The issue of pay, says Roberts, "has now reached the level of a constitutional crisis."

Pilot Accidentally Flies Over Bush's Crawford Ranch.

The AP (1/1), in an article published on the New York Times' website, reports that the pilot of a small airplane inadvertently flew into restricted airspace over President Bush's ranch in Crawford, Texas, Sunday night, "causing the scrambling of F-16 fighter jets, an Air Force spokeswoman said. The jets used flares to get the attention of the pilot, who landed and was interviewed before being sent on his way, according to the North American Aerospace Defense Command and the Secret Service."

Congress Urged To Bolster US Merchant Fleet. In an op-ed in the New York Times (1/2, 1.16M), John Curtis Perry, director of the maritime studies program at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University; Scott Borgerson, a recent graduate; and Rockford Weitz, a Ph.D. candidate there write, that the Safe Port Act signed by President Bush in October "is a vitally important and overdue step. But it ignores another major problem in maritime commerce: the phenomenal decline of American shipping. While it's true that the United States Navy still dominates the world ocean…American commercial shipping is but a puny remnant of its former self." The writers detail the decline oft the US merchant fleet since the 80s, blaming "an antiquated law that prevents American coastal shippers from buying ships made in other countries. By amending this law and, at the same time, encouraging the development of domestic coastal shipping, Congress could help restore America's status as a great and proud maritime nation."

Shuler Expects Pelosi Will Work With Blue Dogs. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Knight, 2.03M) reports Washington is "buzzing with speculation about how incoming moderate freshman Democrats like Heath Shuler of North Carolina will change congressional dynamics." Shuler will join "the 'blue dogs,' a group of budget-cutting Democrats, mostly from southern states, whose ranks will swell from about 37 to 44 in the new Congress." Asked if he thought Speaker Nancy Pelosi "will work well with the blue dogs and other moderates," Shuler said, "I think she will. She realizes the importance of having that voice in the middle, that moderate Democrat. She has been very easy to work with so far, and I think she certainly realizes and understands how it works politically and realizes what happened this election cycle."

Congressional Committees Hiring Investigators. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, 2.03M) reports that as a "sign that the new Democratic majority plans to get tough, key congressional committees have begun hiring lawyer-investigators to probe the administration and its policies." The House Appropriations Committee, "where Iraq war critic Rep. John Murtha will be influential, is hiring investigators to look into the administration's war policies and spending in Iraq and Afghanistan. Rep. Henry Waxman, the incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, who's been dogging the vice president's energy task force, is also hiring lawyers."

Foreign Investment Said To Be Solution To Social Security Crisis. In a Wall Street Journal (1/2, A23, 2.04M) op-ed, Discovery Institute senior fellow George Gilder asks, "Would conservatives please forget the Social Security 'problem'? As Peter Drucker once wrote in these pages, 'Don't solve problems, pursue opportunities.' When Republicans solve 'problems,' they feed their failures, starve their strengths, and fritter away their remaining power in political imbroglios and special interest pork-fests." Gilder writes that rather than worrying about the perception of a future collapse in the Social Security system, the problem would be better addressed by utilizing "the realities of productivity, technology, immigration and global trade and investment. The key is keeping the economy open to outside investors as our population ages and as the productive center of the global economy shifts toward Asia. As Michael Milken points out, the younger workers around the globe will use their increasing savings to buy the assets of American seniors as they grow older, thus offering liquidity to our retirees, sustaining U.S. asset prices, and expanding U.S. opportunities."

Goode Reaffirms Opposition To Ellison's Use Of Quran. In an op-ed in USA Today (1/2, A8, 2.27M) VA5 Rep. Virgil Goode (R) writes in defense of a letter he wrote criticizing MN5 Rep.-elect Keith Ellison (DFL) over his intention to use a Quran when he is sworn in to Congress. Goode clarifies his position that, as he wrote in the letter, 'If American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Quran,'" arguing that "that we were not attacked by a nation on 9/11; we were attacked by extremists who acted in the name of the Islamic religion. I believe that if we do not stop illegal immigration totally, reduce legal immigration and end diversity visas, we are leaving ourselves vulnerable to infiltration by those who want to mold the United States into the image of their religion, rather than working within the Judeo-Christian principles that have made us a beacon for freedom-loving persons around the world."

Meanwhile, a sharply-toned USA Today (1/2, A8, 2.27M) editorial counters, "Keith Ellison's election to the House, as the chamber's first Muslim, provides the United States with a grand opportunity to showcase its credentials as a nation of opportunity, equality and diversity. What a great story to tell the Muslim world. Five years after 9/11, voters in America's heartland elected Ellison, an African-American who grew up in Detroit and converted to Islam in college, to one of the nation's highest offices." However, the piece continues, America's "chance to shine was tarnished by a few ugly voices. The loudest belongs to [Goode] who used the occasion to take a crude swipe not only at Ellison and the

Quran, but at all Muslims. The piece continues to praise Ellison's reservation on the issue and to pan Goode and others who subscribe to his position.

LATimes Criticizes Senators' Use Of Holds. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, 850K) editorializes against Senators' ability to use holds on legislation they oppose, noting that "the Senate can and should take action to prevent a single senator from imposing his prejudices on the entire body, noting that Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback's (R) "hold on Michigan Appeals Court Judge Janet Neff, who was nominated for a federal district judgeship, was an especially obnoxious use of the procedure. Brownback is fixated on the fact that Neff attended and spoke at a ceremony in 2002 at which the daughter of the judge's next-door neighbor exchanged (legally nonbinding) vows with another woman. … But if Brownback's use of the hold is wrong, so is its use by other senators. Reformers, led by Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), are proposing to do away with secret holds," and "Senate rules should be amended to abolish all holds, secret and open, so that no senator can usurp the right of the entire body to judge a nominee or a piece of legislation. The hold is defended as a form of 'senatorial courtesy,' but it's insulting to the people senators represent."

Economists Predict End Of Housing Slump, Continued GDP Growth. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, Whitehouse, 2.04M) reports, "The US economy is poised to shake off the housing slump and regain momentum by the end of this year, and the credit goes to techies, bankers, chefs and shoppers, according to a Wall Street Journal survey of economists. The panel of 60 economists who participated in the Journal's latest semiannual economic forecasting survey offered an optimistic outlook for 2007: The service sector should keep humming along as the recent weakness in housing and manufacturing abates and the Federal Reserve begins to reduce interest rates." That "would allow the economy to expand at a rate fast enough to keep investors happy, but slow enough to keep inflation at bay." The Journal adds, "Even so, economists haven't stopped worrying about what could happen if the current slowdowns in housing and manufacturing spread further -- a pattern that has characterized previous recessions. In another potentially ominous sign, they increasingly differ about the economy's trajectory."

The New York Times (1/2, De la Merced, 1.16M), however, says "Wall Street economists are looking at 2007 with some caution. They expect at least some slowdown in economic growth. And many worry that housing's slump will spread to other corners of the economy." The analysts surveyed by the Times "predicted that the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, which closed 2006 at 1,418.30, would end 2007 at 1,440 to 1,570."

The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 8, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that "in his New Year's address, President Bush said the expanding US economy was one of the big success stories of 2006 and he predicts more success this year." CBS (Solrozano) showed Michael Levy, chief economist, Bank of America, saying, "Personal incomes are up, wages are rising a little faster than inflation and the consumers continue to be resilient, despite all the curveballs thrown at them." CBS added, "Curveballs like housing. In the first ten months of 2006, new building permits and housing starts went down by 6%. For most of the year there was worry over the housing bubble which at this point has sagged more than burst. Some expect a continued weak market through next year." Robert Brusca, economist, Fact & Opinion Economics: "Going into 2007, there's some people who still hold that view. They still think that housing has another shoe to drop. But as the year true to a close, the housing prices began to abate to some extent."

The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A2, Ford, Gerena-Morales, 2.04M) says that "for the past five years, US corporate profits have grown much faster than the overall economy, one of several reasons why US stock prices keep setting records. But many economists believe that the days of outsize profit growth are nearing an end. Corporate profits, as measured by the Commerce Department, have risen more than 12% a year since 2002, hitting a high of 19% in 2004. In the third quarter of 2006, profit growth was running at an annualized rate of 16%." But "the consensus forecast of economists polled by The Wall Street Journal calls for those gains to slow to the single digits this year and next, with pretax profits rising about 6%."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/2, Trumbull, 59K) reports "a healthy economy could allow American consumers to keep spending even as they borrow less and save more." There is "good news: For most households, this is a relatively benign climate for financial make-overs. Many borrowers have the opportunity to refinance their debt at low interest rates. Moreover, forecasters generally don't foresee a recession in 2007. A healthy economy could allow consumers to keep spending even as they borrow less and save more."

Speculation Surrounds Jeb Bush's Next Move. The New York Times (1/2, Goodnough, 1.16M) reports Gov. Jeb Bush is leaving office "as one of the most popular and prominent governors in state history," and despite his "abrasiveness and the plunging popularity of his brother the president, he has remained well liked -- or at least respected -

- to the end, a feat in a state as ethnically and politically divided as Florida. A poll last month by Quinnipiac University found that 57 percent of Floridians feel he did a 'good' or 'great' job as governor." Bush "has adamantly ruled out a presidential campaign of his own next year, saying that he wants only to return to Miami with his wife, Columba, and their cat, Sugar. Yet rumors about his future have burst forth as regularly as exotic species in the Everglades." Similarly, the Financial Times (1/2, Ward) says "Bush's efforts to duck questions about his future seem unlikely to quash feverish speculation" about his future. While "his brother limps towards the end of his troubled presidency, the younger Mr Bush is leaving office on a high."

Democratic White House Hopefuls May Benefit From Committee Chairmanships. Under the headline, "Senate Panels To Provide Soapbox," the Washington Times (1/2, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Senate Democrats interested in White House bids will get tons of free publicity starting in January with new and prominent posts on key panels. Senators hoping to pontificate on Iraq, global warming or health care policy will enjoy multiple hearings -- some televised live -- and the amplified political microphone that comes with being in the majority party." The Times notes that Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden will chair the Foreign Relations Committee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry will chair the Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee, and Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd will chair the Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee."

The AP (1/2, Miga) also reports that Dodd "will become chairman of the Senate Banking Committee in Congress, giving him oversight of the nation's banking, financial services and insurance industries. The post will create new fundraising opportunities — a potential boost for a longshot prospect like Dodd who must prove he can raise the tens of million of dollars needed to stay competitive in the 2008 campaign. … A surge of Wall Street money could initially boost Dodd's prospects. But it could also undercut his efforts to cast himself as a champion of average working Americans."

McCain Seeks Proxy To Steer GOP Armed Services Staff During White House Bid. The Washington Times (1/2, Scarborough, 88K) reports that Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) will assume the top GOP spot on the Senate Armed Services Committee, when Virginia Sen. John Warner (R), the panel's current chairman, leaves the leadership post because of term limits. The Times notes that McCain is "widely expected to formally announce this year that he is seeking the Republican presidential nomination," and he is working to "piece together a minority committee staff that can operate while he is on the campaign trail." Former Senate staffers say one of the finalists for the key post of minority staff director is Michael V. Kostiw, who was an aide to former Rep. Porter J. Goss on the House Intelligence Committee." The Times lists a number of McCain's national security advisors, and concludes by noting that former Kansas Sen. Bob Dole (R) also served as his party's ranking member on the panel while running for President.

Clinton, Obama Voting Records Provide Contrast Entering Campaign. An analysis piece published on the front page of the Washington Post (1/2, A1, Murray, 690K) reports on the differences in the voting records of New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D), and the impact these differences will have on the Senators' perceived competition for their party's nomination for the 2008 presidential election, leading off, "The attack ads practically write themselves: Hillary Clinton voted against ethanol! Barack Obama wants to increase taxes!" The Post notes that on 40 occasions, their votes differed, generating "a lot of material to mine, and even misrepresent." The Post notes that overall, the two voted alike on many issues during their joint tenure, but that differences can be perceived on such issues as "energy policy, congressional ethics and budget priorities, relations with Cuba, gun ownership, and whether a senator can hold a second job."

Voters' Desire For Change Boosts Obama. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Walsh, 2.03M) reports Sen. Barack Obama "is expected to enter" the 2008 race, "and he plans to announce his decision in the next few weeks. But regardless of whether he runs, the intensity of Obama-mania suggests that the political and societal forces he represents -- particularly a desire for new ideas, new faces, and a less rancorous brand of discourse -- will shape the next election." Other Democratic "presidential wannabes are testing the same themes," but "so far, it is Obama who has ridden the desire for change the furthest and the fastest." Obama said, "I think there is a great hunger for change in the country -- and not just policy change. What I also think they are looking for is change in tone and a return to some notion of the common good and some sense of cooperation, of pragmatism over ideology. I'm a stand-in for that right now."

U.S. News and World Report (1/2, 2.03M) also runs excerpts of its interview with Sen. Obama. Asked to explain his opposition to the Iraq war, Obama said, "It's a classic example of ideology trumping reality. The country has now rejected that approach to governance." Obama said if he planned to "run a competitive race, I would get in in January."

Romney To Open Exploratory Committee After Ford Funeral. The AP (1/2, Johnson) reports that according to an unnamed "top aide," outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) plans to file FEC paperwork to form a presidential exploratory committee by Wednesday this week, "but not until funeral services for former President Gerald R. Ford have concluded." Romney had intended to file on the first business day of the year, but deferred out of respect for Ford's passing. The piece continues to offer a brief biography of Romney's political career.

Spitzer Inaugurated Governor Of New York, Promises Ethics Reform. The New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) reports on the inauguration address of New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer (D), which served as "the beginning salvo in what many see as a gargantuan challenge Mr. Spitzer has set out for himself — to overhaul a state government paralyzed by gridlock and consumed by recurring scandals. Yet Mr. Spitzer's work began hours before the speech: He signed five executive orders before 9 a.m., including directives establishing new ethical guidelines for state workers, among them a ban on accepting almost any gifts, as well as new restrictions on lobbying and the use of state resources. He also barred elected officials or candidates from appearing in advertisements paid for by state entities, a frequent practice of Mr. Pataki."

Financing Of Gubernatorial Inaugural Events Draws Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A8, Cooper, 2.04M) reports, "Chevron Corp. maxed out on its permissible yearly political contributions to California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign with a single donation of $22,300 early in 2006. But that didn't stop" Chevron "from chipping in $50,000 to be a 'Gold Sponsor' of the governor's inaugural celebration," which will give "Chevron officials access to" Schwarzenegger "at two events for sponsors and an invitation-only black-tie ball." Thirty-six recently-elected governors will celebrate their wins "this month with parties ranging from modest to star-studded. Several will cost $1 million or more. Many inaugural events will be exclusive affairs, paid for by nonprofit committees that aren't subject to state campaign-donation limits or reporting requirements designed to contain influence on elected officials." The Journal notes, "In a few cases, such unregulated fund-raising has caused headaches for new governors, many of whom were elected on reform or populist platforms." Florida Gov.-elect (R) Charlie Crist (R) "canceled plans for a donors' ball when he was cited in the media for his no-limits donations drive." Meanwhile, Massachusetts Gov.-elect Deval Patrick (D) "has drawn criticism for planning a sprawling inaugural celebration that includes seven statewide events culminating in a outdoor swearing-in ceremony in downtown Boston on Thursday. Financing for the event is being handled by the Patrick/Murray Inauguration Committee, which allows donations of as much as $50,000."

States Moving To Regulate "Nontraditional" Mortgages. The Washington Post (1/2, D1, Downey, 690K) reports, "Nineteen states and the District of Columbia have moved quickly to warn state-regulated lenders about the hazards to consumers from nontraditional mortgages." The Post notes that federal banking officials in September "issued a sternly worded advisory" to such lenders, telling them that loans such as "interest-only mortgages and other arrangements where the borrower cuts monthly costs by paying back less than full interest and principal" should not be made to consumers who "may be unable to repay them. Within 24 hours of the federal guidance's release, six states had issued similar warnings to their own lenders, a notable flurry of activity in a field known for its slow-moving bureaucracies."

Buffett Donation Part Of "Exceptional Year" For Philanthropy. The Financial Times (1/1, Knight) reports on the $31 billion pledge made by Warren Buffett to the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, which was in excess of previous US spending records "by a huge margin." The Times, noting that the gift "is the biggest charitable donation in history. But even without Mr Buffett's largesse, it was an exceptional year for philanthropy with a record number of gifts of more than $100m. This year there were 14 gifts of $100m or more. In 1998 – the year that came closest to that number – there were 12, and last year, 10 donations of that size were made. 'It's not just the Bill Gates and the Warren Buffetts of the world who are giving; it's a lot of different people,' said Stacy Palmer, Chronicle editor." The Times continues to detail the gifts of other high-level donors in 2006.

NYTimes Praises City Charity. A New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) editorial titled, "Something To Tide You Over," lauds the charitable work of the UJA-Federation of New York, citing the example of the organization's aid to an elderly Jewish woman who immigrated to the US and whose Social Security benefits expired before she could attain her citizenship. The Times notes that the group is a beneficiary of the New York Times Neediest Cases Fund, and the its assistance was sufficient to support the woman until she was able to become a citizen.

New HIV Drug Shows Promise In Blocking Disease. The Los Angeles Times (1/1, Ricci, 850K) reports on the development of a new drug to combat HIV called an integrase inhibitor "that some researchers are calling 'truly phenomenal.'" "Newly published clinical studies showed that it, in combination with two existing drugs, reduced the virus to undetectable levels in nearly 100% of HIV patients taking a regimen for the first time. It had a similar effect on the virus in up to 72% of salvage therapy patients."

The drug prevents the virus's self-replication by blocking its ability to merge with host cells.

Media Urged To "Treat Monica Lewinsky As A Lady." In a Washington Post (1/2, A17, 690K) column, Richard Cohen writes that principals in former President Clinton's impeachment proceedings "finally got to meet the storied Monica Lewinsky, they were floored by her. She was smart, personable and -- as the record makes clear -- dignified. This is more than can be said about some of the people who write about her. I will not name names. But in recent days, Lewinsky has been back in the news. In December she graduated with a master's degree in social psychology from the London School of Economics." Cohen continues to lament Lewinsky's reputation as "a girl toy, a trivial thing, a punch line," as well as the gender inequity applied by the media, concluding, "It would be nice if my colleagues in the media would resolve to treat Monica Lewinsky as a lady, to think of her as they would themselves, to remember their own youth and the things they did and to understand that from this day forward anyone who takes a cheap shot at Lewinsky has a moral and professional obligation to look in the mirror. To proceed otherwise is to miss the joke entirely. No longer is it Monica Lewinsky. It is now the people who write about her."

LATimes Praises Schwarzenegger For Attention To State Healthcare Reform. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, 850K) editorializes, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has set the bar so high in promising healthcare reform that it's tempting to suspect that he broke his leg on purpose, just for the photo-op in his hospital bed to drive home the high costs of healthcare." He "deserves credit for taking on the issue. We hope he won't take it the wrong way when we offer this hope for the unveiling of his proposal next week in his State of the State address: Break a leg."

WPost Hails Fenty's Inauguration. Under the headline, "Welcome, Mr. Mayor," the Washington Post (1/2, A16, 690K) editorializes, "Adrian M. Fenty will be sworn in today as the District's fifth mayor on a wave of hope and optimism so high even his closest advisers wonder how long it can last. Much depends on whether Mr. Fenty (D) is as adept at governing as he was at campaigning. The brash young politician who won the city's unquestionable support now must make good on his promises of progress. It is encouraging that Mr. Fenty has demonstrated sound judgment in the months since his victory in the September primary all but guaranteed his election. … Yet Mr. Fenty's biggest challenge -- the one that carries the most political peril for him and the greatest consequence for the city -- is tackling the abysmal state of the public schools. Despite some of the highest per-pupil school spending in the country, too many D.C students lack the basic skills critical for success, and too many school buildings are in awful shape. … Mr. Fenty is correct in his belief that the city will never truly prosper if its schools remain broken, and his resolve to do something about them should be applauded. But it's vital that he proceed carefully, mindful that even if he succeeds where his predecessor failed in a mayoral takeover of schools, reformed governance is no panacea for the educational ills of a dysfunctional system."

US, Europeans Adapt New Strategy To Increase Pressure On Tehran. The New York Times (1/2, A3, Cooper, Weisman, 1.16M) reports the United States and its allies in Europe, "in a tacit acknowledgment that sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council in late December are too weak to force Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions, have embarked on a new strategy to increase the financial and psychological pressure." The plan involves using "the language of the resolution to help persuade foreign governments and financial institutions to cut ties with Iranian businesses, individuals in its nuclear and missile programs and, by extension, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps," according to Stuart Levey, under secretary of the treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence. Bush administration officials "said envoys would soon head abroad to press officials of foreign governments and banks to interpret the Security Council resolution equally aggressively." The new strategy "builds on the Treasury Department's efforts over the past few months to get Western banks to scale back business with Iran or risk running afoul of American laws."

Iran Seeks To Gain Regional Influence. The Financial Times (1/2, Khalaf, Editor) reports that during a recent trip to Bahrain, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki "suggested Gulf stability was best achieved by removing American forces, well entrenched across the region, and setting up, with Tehran, a regional security alliance." The "call for more self-reliance in the Gulf has some appeal among ordinary Arabs, resentful of the US and frustrated by their own governments' over-dependence on American security. But official circles, in both the Gulf and the US, see his suggestions as a reflection of Iran's suspected ambition for regional superpower status."

US Unit "Works Quietly" Against Iranian Influence. In an article of 1,182 words, the Boston Globe (1/2, Stockman, 413K) reports on the Iran Syria Policy and Operations Group (ISOG): "For nearly a year, a select group of US officials has been quietly coordinating actions to counter the looming threat of a nuclear-armed Iran, including increasing the military capabilities of Arab allies such as Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and Bahrain." Its actions

"include covert assistance to Iranian dissidents and building international outrage toward Iran by publicizing its alleged role in a 1994 terrorist attack in Argentina, according to interviews with half a dozen White House, Pentagon, and State Department officials who are involved in the group's work. ... Its workings have been so secretive that several officials in the State Department's Near Eastern Affairs bureau said they were unaware it existed. ... ISOG was modeled after the Iraq Policy and Operations Group, set up in 2004 to shepherd information and coordinate US action in Iraq. ISOG has raised eyebrows within the State Department for hiring BearingPoint -- the same Washington-based private contracting firm used by the Iraq group -- to handle its administrative work, rather than State Department employees."

Ahmendinejad's Missteps Helping Rival Raise Profile. Newsweek (1/2, 3.12M) reports in its Periscope column, "Iranians are deserting the president they elected by a landslide in June 2005." Some of his "own supporters criticized his recent international gathering of Holocaust revisionists as harmful to Iran's national interests. And thanks to his economic flubs, Iranians are grumbling about inflation instead of reveling in an oil-boom windfall." The legislature "has stopped rubber-stamping the 50-year-old president's decisions, and the latest local elections cost him all but two of his allies on Tehran's 15-seat city council. The big winner: his pothole-filling, street-cleaning successor as mayor of Tehran, Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, 45." Iran's "next presidential vote isn't due until 2009, but Ghalibaf is already casting a shadow on Ahmadinejad's future."

Palestinian Factions Clash In Gaza. The Washington Post/AP (1/2, A11) reports violence erupted in the Gaza Strip Monday, "with warring Palestinian factions firing at each other and kidnapping rivals, and gunmen abducting a foreign news photographer." The clashes in the Jabalya refugee camp near Gaza City "broke a week-long pause in the violent confrontation between" Hamas and Fatah. Meanwhile, "gunmen in Gaza City abducted a photographer with the news service Agence France-Presse, which identified him as Jaime Razuri, 50, of Peru."

Israel Begins Easing Restrictions At West Bank Checkpoints. AFP (1/2) reports Israel has begun easing restrictions at checkpoints in the West Bank "as promised by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at a summit with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas last month." However, an Israeli military spokesman said roadblocks were "not being lifted altogether for the time being."

Bush, Olmert Resisting Overtures From Syria. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Derfner, 2.03M) reports, "In recent weeks, Syrian President Bashar Assad has been peppering the international media with expressions of eagerness to talk peace with Israel." But "does he mean it? A succession of American politicians–Democratic Sens. John Kerry, Christopher Dodd, and Bill Nelson, as well as Republican Arlen Specter–have come away from recent meetings with Assad at least intrigued. Besides that, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group urged the Bush administration to try diplomatic means to persuade Syria to stop supporting Sunni insurgents in Iraq. None of this, however, appeals to President Bush, who considers Syria an auxiliary member of the 'axis of evil.' Or to" Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, "who insists that Assad validate any change of heart by first cutting off Iran and the terrorist groups like Hezbollah and Hamas."

Islamic Militants Flee From Last Somali Stronghold. The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 3, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight Islamic militants are on the run in Somalia after government and Ethiopian forces overran their last stronghold in Kismayo. Thousands of militants retreated to the rugged border with Kenya. Government offered the militants amnesty if they surrender." The Washington Post (1/2, A10, McCrummen, 690K) reports, "Ethiopian forces backing Somalia's weak transitional government" Monday were "chasing the remnants of the Islamic militia along the Indian Ocean coast toward the Kenyan border about 100 miles to the south." In the "final stage of a dramatic power shift," the Islamic fighters "abandoned their heaviest weapons early Monday morning" with Ethiopian and government troops "in hot pursuit of key leaders, including three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania." With "the most hard-core militiamen headed their way," Kenyan authorities Monday "tightened security along their border with Somalia." Meanwhile, Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi called for "the quick deployment to Somalia of a peacekeeping force from the 53-country African Union" to replace the Ethiopian troops "who are guarding the vulnerable new government but are also causing tensions among Somalis who consider them invaders."

The New York Times (1/2, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports that after Somalia's Islamist forces abandoned their final outpost Monday, the transitional government "moved aggressively to assert control, setting a three-day deadline for all weapons to be turned in and calling for international peacekeeping troops to be sent immediately." However, "Clan leaders were skeptical about whether he would succeed, and many Somalis seemed dead set against it." But "whatever lies ahead, encouraging or ominous, most Somalis seemed to agree that after a week of fast-moving events, the rough outlines of a new reality were emerging. For the first time since the former dictator, Mohamed Siad Barre, fled the country in 1991…there is a credible government based in Mogadishu…with serious outside support and no organized military threat from within." Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (1/2, Sanders, 850K) reports that "for the Islamists left behind in Somalia's long-troubled capital, the ordeal is not over. While top Islamic officials escaped south toward Kenya last week, thousands of employees, fighters and other court supporters remain trapped in Mogadishu, struggling to comprehend the new reality. Once part of the city's new elite, many have gone into hiding, fearful about retribution or worried that enemies might finger them as Islamic court collaborators."

The Financial Times (1/2, England) notes that a US official said Washington was "encouraging the government to enter into dialogue with 'all Somali parties of goodwill,' including moderates within the Islamist alliance, and was pushing for the deployment of an African-led peacekeeping force."

Bulgaria, Romania Join European Union. The AP (1/2, Hadjiyska) reports Bulgaria and Romania joined the European Union Monday, bringing the bloc's membership to 27 nations. The two nations "officially joined the EU at midnight to joyous fireworks celebrations that drew tens of thousands of New Year's Eve revelers to the two capitals of Sofia and Bucharest." The New York Times (1/2, Bilefsky, 1.16M) says their membership helped "to end geographic divisions left over from the cold war and extending the borders of the now 27-member bloc eastward to the Black Sea."

Zapatero Urged To Crack Down On ETA After Bombing. The Financial Times (1/2, Mulligan, Burnett) reports Spanish Prime Minister José Luis Rodriguez Zapatero is "under intense pressure" to "crack down heavily on ETA following a car bomb attack that ended a nine-month ceasefire and wrecked his government's controversial efforts to broker peace" with the group. Mariano Rajoy, head of the opposition Popular Party, called on Zapatero to act with "prudence and a sense of realism."

Gazprom, Belarus Reach Deal, Averting Threat To European Gas Supplies. The Financial Times (1/2, Ostrovsky) reports Gazprom "struck a five-year deal to supply gas to Belarus just minutes before a New Year deadline, narrowly avoiding a gas price war that threatened to disrupt supplies to Europe." The agreement "averted a shut-down of gas supplies to Belarus scheduled for 10am on January 1. The new contract doubles the price of gas for Belarus this year and gives Gazprom a 50 per cent stake in the country's pipeline network." The agreement "will phase out a multi-billion dollar gas subsidy to Belarus, which had allowed Alexander Lukashenko, the country's authoritarian president, to subsidise living standards." The "price increase and exemption from export duties gives Belarus more favourable terms than those offered to other former Soviet republics."

The Washington Post (1/2, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports, "Belarus looked headed for a cold New Year's Day until the former Soviet republic's prime minister walked into the offices of Russia's natural gas monopoly, Gazprom, just before a midnight deadline and agreed to most of Gazprom's terms for continued supplies. 'There was a tense atmosphere among the Belarusan delegation since we have agreed to and signed a contract whose conditions for the delivery of gas are not at all favorable,' Belarusan Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky said." The "terms are similar to what Gazprom has been extracting from other neighboring former Soviet republics, such as Ukraine and Georgia. The Russian energy giant wants higher prices for its natural gas, and it is using its leverage as sole or principal supplier to get a share of other countries' domestic pipeline networks and transit lines to the West."

The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A4, Cullison, 2.04M) says, "The last-minute deal that sharply raises the price of Russian natural gas to Belarus highlights the success of a Kremlin energy policy that the West has denounced as bordering on blackmail. By showing that it is willing to cut off countries that won't accept rate increases, Russia has ended an era of cheap energy supplies to former Soviet republics." Relations "between Moscow and Minsk lately have been strained: Though putative allies, each blames the other for failing to follow through on plans to unite the two countries. Moscow is ending duty-free oil shipments to Belarus, a move that is expected to cost more than $1 billion in profits to the country's refining industry."

Thailand PM Blames Bangkok Blasts On Local Politics Rather Than Muslim Insurgency. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, Hookway, A10, 2.04M) reports that Thailand's Prime Minster Surayud Chulanont said that the synchronized New Year's Eve bombings in Bangkok "might have been connected to the September ouster of his predecessor, telecommunications tycoon Thaksin Shinawatra, in a bloodless coup. 'From the evidence we have gathered, there is a slim chance that it is related to the southern insurgency,' Gen. Surayud told a news conference. 'It is likely related to people who lost their political benefits.' The nine bombs exploded Sunday as revelers prepared to ring in the new year. Bangkok's city leaders canceled the celebrations after the first wave of bombings in the early evening. In total, police say the explosions wounded 38 people, including nine foreign tourists. Nobody has claimed responsibility." The Journal notes the impact the bombings could have on the investment and tourism sectors, and notes that some analysts have made comparisons to similar bombings attributed to Islamic factions.

Zapatista Rebels Celebrate Insurgency's 13th Anniversary. The AP (1/1), in an article published on the website of the New York Times, reports, "Thousands of Zapatista rebels celebrated the 13th anniversary of their brief uprising against the Mexican government on Monday, dancing, singing and holding discussions on improving the status of poor Indians in the southern state of Chiapas." The AP notes that Zapatista leader Subcommander Marcos lead the festivities commemorating the group's seizure of "San Cristóbal de las Casas and other Chiapas communities in the name of socialism and Indian rights on Jan. 1, 1994. A cease-fire ended fighting between rebel and government forces after a few days, and the two sides have since maintained an uneasy truce. Marcos, a professor-turned-guerrilla, has continued to champion a quieter social revolution from the jungles of Chiapas, issuing missives harshly critical of Mexico's politicians and government policies."

Bush Urged To Aid Displaced Diego Garcia Natives. In a Washington Post op-ed, American University anthropologist David Vine writes about the US military's forcible relocation of the native population of "Diego Garcia, an obscure British island in the middle of the Indian Ocean," between 1968 and 1973 to make way for the US Navy base there. The native people, called Chagossians, "received virtually no resettlement assistance and found themselves homeless, jobless and with little money," upon their relocation to Mauritania. "In 1975 The Post broke the story of the expulsion, finding the people living in 'abject poverty' as a result of what The Post's editorial page called an 'act of mass kidnapping.' When a single day of congressional hearings followed, the U.S. government denied all responsibility for the islanders." Vine concludes, "the time has come for the story of the Chagossians and Diego Garcia to see the light of day, and for Congress and the Bush administration finally to accept and act on the responsibility of the United States for a people's ongoing plight."

NYTimes Calls On Wolfowitz To Embrace Openness. Under the headline, 'Mr. Wolfowitz And The Bank,' the New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) editorializes, "When Paul Wolfowitz speaks publicly these days, he is usually making good sense. The head of the World Bank (formerly No. 2 at the Pentagon) has criticized Chinese banks for ignoring environmental and human rights standards when they lend to Africa, told the White House it needs to do more to alleviate African poverty, and has vowed that corrupt officials won't be allowed to siphon off money from projects that are supposed to benefit the poor. So why do so many people at the bank mistrust him? … Some of his critics will never forgive him for championing the disastrous Iraq war. But he has compounded their suspicions, surrounding himself with a tight group of former Bush administration officials who — true to their roots — have little patience for explaining themselves and even less for criticism." The Times praises Wolfowitz's work on debt relief for impoverished nations and fighting corruption, but concludes by suggesting "a more inclusive management style and a more diplomatic inner circle, and to articulate broader goals beyond stopping corruption. That way he would have the credibility to fight the good fight."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Uncertainties About Guantanamo Detainees' Rights Remain. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Sullivan, 2.03M) reports that "despite two trips to the Supreme Court, questions about the rights and status of about 400 men held" at Guantanamo Bay "are not much closer to being answered than they were when the first detainees arrived. And so the coming months will see renewed challenges to the facility in both the courts and the new Democratic Congress." President Bush signed the Military Commissions Act in October, "and the administration hopes the legislation provides a constitutional framework for holding war crimes trials for the worst detainees–including 14 'high value' detainees whom Bush transferred to Guantánamo Bay from previously secret CIA prisons." Critics "say the framework is rife with problems," and "things could change with a new Democratic Congress, especially through an effort in the Senate by incoming Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to restore habeas corpus rights to detainees."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Counterterror Advances Said To Have Led To Attack-Free Year In West. The Washington Times/AP (1/2, Haven) reports that though would-be terrorists "had no shortage of murderous ideas in 2006," including "a plot to blow up tunnels and flood New York City's financial district," and "another to bring down packed commuter airliners flying out of London," it was the first year since the September 11, 2001, attacks that "closed without a major attack in the West. In a wide-ranging analysis, security and intelligence leaders around the world told the Associated Press" that the success was the result of "greater human and technological resources, tougher counterterrorism laws, a deeper understanding of the homegrown nature of the threat and the hard lessons learned from past failures." However, "they also cautioned against complacency, saying another attack is inevitable."

Homeland Security Wants Tighter Controls On European Travelers. Newsweek (1/2, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column, "For more than 15 years, British and most other Western European visitors have been allowed to stay in the United States for up to three months without needing to apply for visas. But Homeland Security officials are now accelerating efforts to tighten entry controls on people from these and other friendly countries, including Australia and Japan, NEWSWEEK has learned." The move "follows revelations that European-born Muslims — particularly disgruntled young Brits — have been visiting Pakistan to attend terrorist training camps."

DHS Moving To Increase Visa Restrictions On Friendly Countries. In its "Periscope" column Newsweek (1/8, Hosenball, 3.12M) reports DHS officials "are now accelerating efforts to tighten entry controls on people from" visa-waiver countries, as well as "other friendly countries, including Australia and Japan, NEWSWEEK has learned. The move follows revelations that European-born Muslims—particularly disgruntled young Brits—have been visiting Pakistan to attend terrorist training camps. One proposal under consideration: requiring visitors who don't now need advanced visas to submit electronic visa applications to US authorities via the Internet at the time they purchase their tickets." DHS spokesman Jarrod Agen "said that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has discussed proposed rule changes with congressional leaders but that no formal plan has been sent to Capitol Hill yet."

Major Changes In US Passport Rules Drawing Near. USA Today (1/2, 1A, Yu, 2.27M) reports on its front page, "Five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the US government is on the verge of implementing security-inspired changes to passports that will affect millions of international travelers." A requirement for air travelers to and from Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean to carry a passport starting Jan. 23 and the introduction of new electronic passports for US citizens this spring "represent the most significant changes in border control in years, as federal officials try to bring the process of checking identification into the digital age."

TSA Says It Is Near Decision On Contract For ID Cards. The Washington Post (1/2, D2, Witte, 690K) reports "the Transportation Security Administration indicated last week" that it will award a contract "to provide a new identification card for transportation workers" early this year. Spokesman Darrin Kayser said the agency is "in the final stages of review of the contract, and we will be issuing an award in the coming weeks." The Post adds that the program "has met with repeated delays."

Security At Commercial Ports Said To Leave Room For Improvement. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Marek, 2.03M) reports the US' "361 commercial ports…have gotten so little funding in the past five years that experts routinely call them the 'soft underbelly' of America. In recent months, a flare-up of public indignation over foreign ownership of U.S. port terminals has sparked some major improvements, but further progress is by no means assured, and a host of vulnerabilities remain. With 95 percent of America's imports arriving by sea, there's a lot at stake." There's been "a surge of activity on the port security front since February, when public anxiety was stoked by a proposed $6.8 billion business deal that would have given a firm run by the government of the United Arab Emirates leases to operate terminals in six U.S. ports." In September, Congress "passed the SAFE Ports Act, which mandates that DHS provide the 22 largest U.S. seaports with enough radiation detectors to scan all containers by 2008. The bill also eases the customs staffing crunch by using contractors to review trusted shippers."

WAR NEWS:

White House Signals Increased Troop Level Will Be Part Of New Iraq Strategy. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A6, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports White House officials "say a troop 'surge' almost certainly will be the centerpiece of Mr. Bush's new strategy for Iraq to be unveiled mid-month. But while administration officials have gone to great lengths to emphasize that the extra troops will be in Iraq only temporarily, there is no clear definition of how long that might be." The debate over how long the new forces should remain in Iraq, the Journal writes, "stems from tension between the political and military aspects of the emerging proposal. Mr. Bush has staked his presidency on Iraq, and several White House aides say they believe he would be inclined to leave the extra troops there until improvement is evident. Senior commanders, by contrast, have expressed concern that leaving extra troops too long risks lasting damage to the US armed forces."

NBC Nightly News (12/31, story 3, 2:05, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The President's plan for Iraq to be unveiled in a speech to the nation will likely call for a major troop increase," and "for the first time in his presidency, Congress will be controlled by Democrats -- an added challenge for a White House trying to advance agenda." Also, aides say that during his State of Union address the President "will acknowledge missteps and promote a hopeful vision for this country and Iraq."

The Financial Times (1/2, Luce) reports President Bush "is facing mounting opposition to plans to reinforce America's military presence in Iraq" from both Democrats and Republicans. In the recent days, "a number of prominent Republican senators, including Arlen Specter and Richard Lugar, the outgoing chairmen of the Senate judiciary and foreign relations committees, have voiced strong scepticism about an increase in troops." Meanwhile, the Bush administration "faces the likelihood of tough senate hearings throughout January that Joseph Biden, the new Democratic chairman of the foreign relations committee, plans to hold from next week."

The AP (1/1, Dunbar) reported that "two prominent Senate Republicans bucked the White House" Sunday, "expressing skepticism" about more US troops in Iraq. Sen. Richard Lugar "urged the President to consult with lawmakers before announcing a new strategy on Iraq that could call for additional troops in Iraq." If Bush were to act "without involving the new Democratic-controlled Congress," he can anticipate "a lot of hearings, a lot of study, a lot of criticism," Lugar said. Separately, Sen. Arlen Specter "also questioned the wisdom of sending in more troops, saying he has not seen an administration plan that would justify it."

In a piece appearing in the Washington Post, syndicated columnist Robert Novak wrote (1/1, A13) that President Bush and Sen. John McCain "will have trouble finding support from more than 12 of the 49 Republican senators when pressing for a surge of 30,000 troops," stressing that "what to do about Iraq poses not only a national policy crisis but profound political problems for the Republican Party." Novak says Republican leaders "around the country, anticipating that the 2006 election disaster would prompt an orderly disengagement from Iraq, are shocked that the president now appears ready to add troops." What is happening inside the Republican party, Novak continues, "is reflected by defection from support for his war policy after November's election by two Republican senators who face an uphill race for reelection in 2008: Gordon Smith of Oregon and Norm Coleman of Minnesota."

Administration Officials Say Iraq Policy Unraveled In 2006. In a 3,000-word, front page article, the New York Times (1/2, A1, Sanger, Gordon, Burns, 1.16M) reports Bush "began 2006 assuring the country that he had a 'strategy for victory in Iraq,'" but "ended the year closeted with his war cabinet on his ranch trying to devise a new strategy, because the existing one had collapsed." The Administration's "original plan…called for turning over responsibility for security to the Iraqis, shrinking the number of American bases and beginning the gradual withdrawal of American troops. But the plan collided with Iraq's ferocious unraveling, which took most of Mr. Bush's war council by surprise." In interviews in Washington and Baghdad, "senior officials said the White House, the Pentagon and the State Department had also failed to take seriously warnings, including some from its own ambassador in Baghdad, that sectarian violence could rip the country apart," and "left the president and his advisers constantly lagging a step or two behind events on the ground." In a recent interview with the Times, NSA Stephen Hadley acknowledged that "Iraqi forces were not able to hold neighborhoods, and the effort to build did not show up."

As Bush Debates New Course, US Death Toll Reaches 3,000. The AP (1/1, Jelinek) reported Monday that the number of American deaths in the Iraq war reached "the sobering milestone of 3,000 on Sunday even as the Bush administration sought to overhaul its strategy for an unpopular conflict that shows little sign of abating." The Washington Post (1/1, A1, Trejos, 690K) called it "a symbolic milestone at a time when the Bush administration is rethinking its strategy for the increasingly violent conflict." Meanwhile, public discontent over the war at home "has grown, evidenced by the fact that voters gave Democrats control of the new Congress." ABC World News (12/31, lead story, 2:40, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush is downplaying the significance of the milestone, but not the sacrifice of the fallen troops."

McClatchy (1/1, Youssef) reported Bush spokesman Scott Stanzel said Sunday that the United States "will be fighting violent jihadists for peace and security of the civilized world for years to come." He said Bush would see to it that the sacrifice of US troops "was not made in vain."

Iraq Says Over 16,000 Iraqis Killed In '06. The AP (1/2, Frayer) reports the Iraqi government Monday said 16,273 Iraqi "civilians, soldiers and police died violent deaths in 2006." Meanwhile, the AP said its own accounting, "gleaned from daily news reports from Baghdad, arrived at a total of 13,738 deaths."

Official Says US Failed "In Terms Of Working With Locals." In an interview with Fox Special Report (1/1, story 7, 6:00, Angle), Henry Crumpton, the outgoing ambassador at large for counter-terrorism at the State Department discussed "the next chapter in the war on terror and how far we've come." On the subject of Afghanistan, Crumpton said that "the foundation for success was rooted in intelligence, and the networks that were established back several years ago, in fact. And also, the leadership that we had in the field, some very senior officers deployed into Afghanistan." Asked to compare US efforts in Afghanistan to those in Iraq, Crumpton said, "There are some big differences between Iraq and Afghanistan," most notably, "the variety of different ethnic configurations inside Iraq makes it different. And so in many respects, it required, at least initially, a conventional military approach, whereas Afghanistan did not." Although the US conducted a "very successful [military] campaign," Crumpton said "capturing Baghdad, that's where I think we obviously fell short, in terms of working with locals."

Bush Readying New Plan For Iraq. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Mulrine, 2.03M) reports after "making it clear that he has his own no-go zones (namely, opening a dialogue with Iran and Syria and considering a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops)," President Bush is "expected to release his new plan for Iraq within days. It will very likely include an economic package that will fund microloans for small businesses and jobs in neighborhoods that have been targeted by military strikes–elements of classic counterinsurgency strategy that weave economic and political incentives together with armed measures." But "much of the chatter" surrounds "a so-called surge of U.S. troops, enough to make the total force in Baghdad larger than at any time since the war began." Democrats are "arguing that anything like a surge ignores the message sent by voters in November's midterm elections."

Newsweek (1/2, 3.12M) reports the White House "insists it knows that simply adding more troops isn't the answer. The plan being considered is far more nuanced than what has been reported in the media, a senior aide to Bush, who would only discuss the talks in Crawford anonymously, told NEWSWEEK. He said it includes money for new jobs programs and reconstruction aid for Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, as well as efforts to further shore up his political base." Newsweek adds the "debate over tactics has intensified inside the Pentagon. Bush is now trying to sort through wildly conflicting advice." The Joint Chiefs of Staff "supports the conclusions of the Iraq Study Group that, rather than sending in a new influx of U.S. troops, American advisory teams embedded with Iraqi forces should be quadrupled so Iraqis can take control more quickly. Some hawks, led by two outside advisers, former Army vice chief of staff Gen. Jack Keane and military historian Frederick Kagan, are instead urging Bush to "win the battle of Baghdad" himself. They say he can't wait for the Iraqi government, Army or police to secure the country."

January Seen As Crucial Time For White House. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, 2.03M) reports some senior Republicans "are looking at the next four weeks as 'make it or break it' time for the White House." In early January, "the Democrats will take over Congress and signal how aggressively they will confront the administration on Iraq and a wide range of domestic issues." By mid-January, President Bush "will have delivered his high-stakes speech setting forth 'the way forward' in Iraq. Bush will then give his State of the Union address on January 23." A senior GOP adviser said, "Anything the president wants to do in the last two years of his term will be contingent on the reaction to his new course in Iraq. If he bombs when he gives the Iraq speech, the fat lady sings." US News adds White House officials, "however, argue that Democrats won't be able to escape responsibility for improving the situation in Iraq."

Sunni Protests Of Saddam Execution Seen As Sign Of Growing Defiance. NBC Nightly News (12/31, story 2, 3:30, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported a "cell phone video that captured" Saddam Hussein's "final conversation before he was hanged" hit the Internet Sunday. NBC (Engel) called the video's release "a major public relations blow for the US Administration and the Iraqi government which have been trying to show the world that Saddam Hussein received impartial justice." ABC World News (12/31, story 2, 2:20, Muir, 8.78M) reported the video "reveals an ugly picture."

NBC Nightly News (1/1, story 2, 3:20, Engel, 9.87M) said that with the release of the video, "so many in this part of the world are now saying that Saddam Hussein had a public execution. And it is backfiring on the US and Iraqi administrations" as "anger among Sunnis is growing." Similarly, the CBS Evening News (1/1, story 2, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that "as Sunni anger grows over Saddam Hussein's execution, we are now learning the US wanted it put off at least two weeks. Randall Pinkston on has the latest from Baghdad." CBS (Pinkston) added, "In the hours before" the execution, "the US Ambassador to Iraq reportedly tried but failed to delay the execution." Iraqi officials said "the Ambassador insisted Iraq's Prime Minister provide proper documents, including a signature from Iraq's President."

The New York Times/AP (1/2) says the demonstrations in Baghdad Monday suggest "that many Sunni Arabs may now more actively support the small number of Sunni militants fighting the country's Shiite-dominated government." Sunnis were "not only outraged by Saddam's hurried execution," but "many were also incensed by the unruly scene in the execution chamber, captured on video, in which Saddam was taunted." Similarly, the Washington Times/AP (1/2, Frayer) says the protest was "particularly significant because it signaled a widening expression of defiance among Sunnis."

Meanwhile, the Financial Times (1/2, Negus) reports the Iraqi government Monday launched an inquiry "into how guards filmed and taunted Saddam Hussein on the gallows, turning his execution into a televised spectacle that has inflamed sectarian anger." The events surrounding the execution "captured the extent to which the Shia radicals associated with" Moqtada al-Sadr "have imposed their agenda on the Iraqi state and its institutions, and the magnitude of the task facing" Maliki "as he tries to impose his authority on a deeply fractured and radicalised country."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/2, Murphy, 59K) reports that "peace is unlikely to follow" to Saddam's execution, and "while the US once believed Hussein's fall would help stabilize Iraq…that is no longer the case. What was once described as an insurgency largely made up of Baathist holdouts and some Sunni Islamist fighters, is now seen as a battle for power among Iraq's major sects." President Bush "reflected that view when he cautioned against too much optimism on Saturday." In contrast, USA Today (1/2, 4A, Jervis, 2.27M) says the "hasty execution" will "not hurt ongoing efforts to bridge ethnic rivalries and win backing for Iraq's fledgling government."

Saddam Legacy Lives On in Sectarian Conflict. The Christian Science Monitor (1/2, Blanford, 59K) reports Saddam Hussein "may be gone, but his legacy lives on in the ethnic and religious conflict undermining a nation that he held together through fear." While the "architects of the Iraq war hoped his ouster would help spread Western-style democracy in the region," it "remains to be seen whether the lesson of his life will be the end of brutal dictatorships in the region or whether current unrest in Iraq will bolster Middle Eastern autocrats and increase resistance to democratic reforms."

American Nurse Recalls Time Spend Caring For Saddam. The Washington Times/AP (1/2) reports a US military nurse who cared for Saddam Hussein in jail "said the deposed dictator saved bread crusts to feed birds and seldom complained to his captors, except when he had legitimate gripes." Master Sgt. Robert Ellis, who cared for the former Iraqi dictator from January 2004 to August 2005 at Camp Cropper, recalled his experiences with Saddam in an interview with the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Saddam's Execution Seen As Another US Misstep. In his Newsweek column (1/2), Fareed Zakaria says, "The saga of Saddam's end — his capture, trial and execution — is a sad metaphor for America's occupation of Iraq. What might have gone right went so wrong." The Bush Administration "dismissed the idea of trying Saddam under international law, or in a court with any broader legitimacy" and it "put Saddam's fate in the hands of the new Iraqi government, dominated by Shiite and Kurdish politicians who had been victims of his reign. As a result, Saddam's trial, which should have been the judgment of civilized society against a tyrant, is now seen by Iraq's Sunnis and much of the Arab world as a farce, reflecting only the victors' vengeance."

Newsweek (1/2, Dickey, 3.12M) reports President George W. Bush "was sleeping at 9 p.m. at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, when Saddam Hussein's body plunged through the trapdoor of a gallows in Kadhimiya Prison on the outskirts of Baghdad." But like the "war that overthrew him in 2003, the hanging of Saddam Hussein did not turn out as planned. Instead of a study in modern justice, the tyrant's end looked more like the result of a sectarian show trial. From Crawford, the only comment was a muted, written statement: no proclamation of 'mission accomplished,' just of 'an important milestone' after 'a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops.' The best that could be said was that the trial was fairer than those Saddam gave his many enemies."

Saddam Played Central Role In Both Bushes' Presidency. In his Newsweek column (1/2), Howard Fineman says, "When the history is written, the saga of the Bushes and the Butcher of Baghdad will be a central thread of the family's story — and of America's at the millennium. It is not personal in the literal sense; neither President Bush ever met Saddam." But it is "'the Realists and the Neocons.' For both Bushes, dealing with Saddam became a way to measure presidential manhood -- and to express profoundly different views about the world."

Author Says Iraq Worse Off Than Three Years Ago. Author Mark Bowden writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/2, 2.04M), "I believe that in the long run people on this planet will embrace democracy and diversity, but we are not there yet. I still nurse hope that Iraqis will abandon blood feuds for compromise and a democratic future, but it appears to be a longer shot today than three years ago, and it was a bad bet then. Mr. Bush has staked his legacy on it. So, the tyrant is dead. We may have facilitated his bad end, but, sadly, violence, oppression and fear remain the time-tested ways of forging a nation state out of disparate parts."

WSJournal Says Execution Serves As Example To Dictators. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/2, A22, 2.04M) writes, "The debate over Iraq has become so poisonous that even the weekend death sentence for Saddam Hussein seems to have become morally controversial. So it's worth recalling that what happened early Saturday morning in Baghdad is that rare event -- justice for a tyrant after a fair and open trial." The world, it notes, "will have to endure future tyrants, but Saddam's hanging will have done some larger good if it gives even one of them pause to think he might suffer the same justice. Too often, faced with murderous dictators, the world's moralists demand that America 'do something' (Darfur, Bosnia) only to shrink from the reality of what that requires. In Iraq, President Bush did something. The 3,000 Americans who have given their lives in that noble mission have done so in a just cause that rid the world of a man who might have killed hundreds of thousands more."

Maliki's Shiite Alliances Seen As Undermining Ability To Unify Iraq. In a front page article, the Wall Street Journal (1/2, A1, Shishkin, 2.04M) reports that for Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki the execution of Saddam Hussein was "a crowning moment in a career defined by uncompromising hatred of everything Mr. Hussein had stood for. Now Mr. Maliki is supposed to rise above the sectarian chasm that has pitted Iraq's Sunni minority against his own Shiite branch of Islam. But as Iraq moves closer to full-scale civil war, a look at Mr. Maliki's history of Shiite activism suggests he is ill-prepared to be a true unifying figure." In a Dec. 24 interview, Maliki said, "The problem is that our Sunni brothers ruled Iraq for centuries because there was no democracy, no elections. Therefore, they feel that a right has been taken away from them." However, Maliki says he believes "reconciliation is still possible." But "another huge challenge facing Mr. Maliki is the rising power of Moqtada al-Sadr."

(1/2, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports Iraq's Shiites are "at a crossroads in their rise from oppression to power and in their relationship with the United States. In a nation riven by violence and competing visions, they feel as if they have been handed the keys to their house but never allowed to settle down. Bitter personality rifts have undermined their ability to govern. And they have yet to bridge the growing divide separating them from the Sunnis and further deepened by Hussein's execution on Saturday." As President Bush seeks a new strategy for Iraq, "many Shiites express deep mistrust of the United States and its intentions. In US efforts to engage Iraq's disaffected Sunnis, they perceive betrayal. And in US pressure to dismantle Shiite militias, they see an attempt to weaken their bulwark against Sunni insurgents." As a result, Shiite leaders "have begun to push harder for more independence from their American backers. Most recently, the government ignored US objections to hanging Hussein too hastily. He was executed four days after an appeals court upheld his death sentence."

Iraq Orders Closure Of TV Station. The AP (1/2, Torchia) reports, "The Iraqi government Monday ordered the closure of the Baghdad office of a Dubai-based television station whose newscaster wore black mourning clothes while reporting on the hanging of Hussein. A spokesman for the Interior Ministry said the Al-Sharqiya station, owned by a former chief of radio and television for Saddam, had incited violence and hatred in its coverage and had ignored warnings to stop. ... the order also followed criticism of the tone of Al-Sharqiya's coverage of Saturday's execution, which struck some as sympathetic to the ousted dictator."

US Raid Against Insurgents Kills 6 In Baghdad. The Washington Post (1/2, A10, Trejos, 690K) reports, "US forces killed six people during a raid on a suspected safe house of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq in the capital Monday morning, the military said." Saleh al-Mutlak, "a prominent Sunni member of parliament condemned the operation, saying that two of his buildings were destroyed and two of his bodyguards were killed in the attack. He said his bodyguards were not insurgents and questioned the point of the raid. ... In an e-mail response to written questions, the military disputed Mutlak's account, saying no civilians were killed or injured and that 'the terrorists killed were armed males firing at Coalition Forces.'"

The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports Mutlak also "charged that American forces and the Iraqi government were giving Shiite Muslim militias carte blanche while cracking down on Sunnis. He was still seething after watching videotape of Hussein's execution Saturday, at which guards taunted the deposed president with Shiite militia chants. Mutlak said he planned to meet with fellow Sunnis and members of various parliamentary blocs this week to discuss withdrawing from the government, which is led by Prime Minister Nouri Maliki, a Shiite."

IEDs Have Caused Over Third Of US Troop Deaths In Iraq. The Christian Science Monitor (1/2, Knickerbocker, 59K) reports, "Of the 3,000 American GIs lost in Iraq as of midday Sunday, more have been killed by roadside bombs -- improvised explosive devices (IEDs) -- than any other cause. More than by rifle fire, mortar attack, or car bomb. It's a danger that has bedeviled Pentagon war planners for months, one to which they've responded with a high-level task force headed by a retired four-star general, $6.7 billion in research and development, new high-tech equipment and vehicles, and - perhaps most important - intelligence efforts to get inside the decisionmaking of an insurgency that is sophisticated, if largely low-tech. If anything, the danger is increasing despite efforts to counter it." Improvised bomb attacks on US troops "now top 1,000 a month, four times the rate in 2004."

Roadside Bomb Changed Lives Of Survivors. USA Today (1/2, 6A, Zoroya reports in a human interest story on a March 6 IED explosion in Iraq: "The blast killed Pfc. Ricky Salas Jr. ... The blast that killed Salas left four other soldiers with wounds, physical or emotional, that may never heal." Among them is Spc. Jose Morales, who "suffered the worst injuries of those who survived. After nine months of convalescence, rehabilitation and physical therapy at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C., he still struggles to walk with his prosthesis. ... Although some amputees remain in the Army, Morales is increasingly fearful he will be forced into medical retirement at age 25."

Salas' Family Traumatized By Loss. USA Today (1/2, 1A, Zoroya, 2.27M) reports, "At least 35% of [US casualties] died as Ricky Salas did: in IED explosions. In December, the deadliest month of 2006, at least 48 of 69 Army combat deaths were caused by roadside bombs. In all, 111 U.S. troops were killed last month. ... the Pentagon news release about Salas, 22, only hinted at the human cost of the March 6 explosion. No mention was made of the three other soldiers in the Humvee who were wounded in the blast. Also left unsaid were the stories of those the death toll fails to acknowledge: Salas' 22-year-old widow, the two small children she is left to raise alone, a mother emotionally adrift and a father who drowns his despair in alcohol."

US Urged To Allow More Iraqi Refugees To Enter America. In a front page article, the New York Times (1/2, A1, Tavernise, Worth, 1.16M) reports from Iraq, "With thousands of Iraqis desperately fleeing this country every day, advocates for refugees, and even some American officials, say there is an urgent need to allow more Iraqi refugees into the United States." State Department officials

"say they are open to admitting larger numbers, but are limited by a cumbersome and poorly financed United Nations referral system." Meanwhile, Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA), who is taking over the immigration, border security and refugee subcommittee, has planned hearings this month "on America's responsibility to help vulnerable Iraqis." Critics argue that the Bush administration has been "reluctant to create a significant refugee program because to do so would be tantamount to conceding failure in Iraq," adding that a "major change in policy could happen only as part of a broader White House shift on Iraq." The Times reports that State Department officials "say they are now open to increasing the number of refugee slots the administration formally requested for Iraqis in September." Assistant Secretary Ellen R. Sauerbrey "said the United States was hoping to identify the most vulnerable Iraqi refugees but was also dependent on the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to do that."

War Having Little Effect On "Much Of US." The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Tyson, White, 690K) reports in a front-page article on the impact of the death of Pfc. Ross McGinnis, who committed "a stunning act of self-sacrifice" by falling on a grenade. ... the casualties have rippled across the American psyche -- those close to the events have been profoundly moved, while those at some distance, the majority of Americans, have been largely unaffected. Concentric circles of loss spread outward, starting with grieving parents, spouses and children -- many so young they will not remember the father or mother who was killed in war. Families of the severely wounded face a future they never planned for and financial hardships they never imagined. In small towns, which supply much of the nation's fighting force, one death can send an entire community into mourning." An unnamed Special Forces veteran of Iraq says, "The fatal flaw was when right after September 11 the president asked everyone to go on with their lives. That set the stage for no one sacrificing." Also in the Washington Post (1/2, 690K), the parents of the late Spc. Ross McGinnis write about their grief: "Only time will take the edge off the knives that have wedged into our hearts."

Pop Music Said To Reflect War Fatigue. The New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) reports, "Beyond typical wartime attitudes of belligerence, protest and yearning for peace, in 2006 pop moved toward something different: a mood somewhere between resignation and a siege mentality. ... Unlike World War II, the current situation has brought little national unity; unlike the Vietnam era, ours has no appreciable domestic support for America's opponents. ... the current war has not inspired talk of generationwide rebellion (perhaps because there's no draft to pit young against old) or any colorful, psychedelically defiant counterculture. The war songs of the 21st century have been sober and earnest, pragmatic rather than fanciful."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Apple Options Probe Puts Two Former Officials In Spotlight. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, B11, Wingfield) reports, "Now that Apple Computer Inc. has disclosed further details of its internal probe into backdated stock options at the company, the spotlight is falling on two former executives implicated in the investigation, Fred Anderson and Nancy Heinen." The Journal continues, "While the Cupertino, Calif., company still hasn't publicly named the two former executives its investigation has blamed for improper options-granting practices, people familiar with the matter confirm the pair are Mr. Anderson, Apple's former chief financial officer, and Ms. Heinen, former general counsel and board secretary." The Journal adds, "Apple -- which cleared current management, including Chief Executive Steve Jobs, of wrongdoing on Friday -- has turned the results of its investigation over to the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Apple said in a filing Friday with the SEC that thousands of options grants between 1997 and 2002 were improperly dated. … Federal prosecutors are in the early stages of their examination of Apple's backdating practices, in a process that could take months." The Journal notes, "Within the clubby circles of Silicon Valley, Apple's allegations have caused a stir among people who know the former Apple executives. A person familiar with the matter says Apple may argue that, as financial chief, Mr. Anderson should have been responsible for proper accounting of backdated options. In Ms. Heinen's case, Apple believes it has evidence that Ms. Heinen, as board secretary, was aware of improper documentation that said a board meeting occurred in October 2001 to approve a big option grant to Mr. Jobs, when no such meeting occurred. … Until more specifics are known, associates of both executives say they are standing by them. Mr. Anderson also sits on the board of Internet auctioneer eBay Inc. and is chairman of its audit committee. Meg Whitman, eBay's CEO, said Mr. Anderson will remain in both positions despite the allegations in the Apple investigation."

NYTimes Urges More Action In Options Probes. The New York Times (1/2) editorializes, "The old year was certainly a boom one for American business, with record profits for companies and record bonuses on Wall Street. But in the background a major accounting scandal has quietly spread, now encompassing more than 120 companies. Fudging the grant date for stock options doesn't quite have the spotlight-grabbing immediacy of Enron's collapse, but it is still gaming the system at the expense of shareholders." The Times continues, "A study sponsored by Harvard Law School suggests that a large number of board members, instead of watching out for self-enriching tricks, were sharing in the lucre. As Eric Dash reported in The Times recently, the study found that board members at roughly 460 companies, around 1,400 outside directors, likely received stock options that were manipulated, unnaturally boosting their value. In other words, many directors saw their stock holdings goosed along with executives'. So much for independent oversight." The Times adds, "What is particularly disturbing is that the news of this malfeasance, far from leading to full-throated calls for investigation and punishment, has coincided with a broad-based effort from business advocates to roll back the stiffer regime of enforcement devised in the wake of Enron and WorldCom. … Some logical tweaks were needed. The Justice Department's prosecution tactics in corporate cases had become a little too aggressive, and small companies deserved a break on requirements under the Sarbanes-Oxley law — a reform inspired by the malfeasance of large, complicated companies. But the relaxation of a few miscalibrated, onerous provisions is where this effort should end."

State Regulators Question Banks' Perks To Hedge Fund Traders. The New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) reports on the "hedge fund hotel" run by "giant Swiss bank" UBS, in which Boston hedge fund traders are allowed to live, "as a temporary home, complete with receptionists, espresso machines and consultants to help manage their information systems. In return, the banks hope the hedge fund hotel guests may become big clients." Massachusetts secretary of state William F. Galvin has subpoenaed UBS and other banks in an investigation into whether the practice is at odds with the interests of investors. "While the state investigation is in a preliminary stage and may not lead to any specific charges, at its heart is a thorny issue that has dogged regulators for decades. Money managers, including mutual funds and hedge funds, often pay Wall Street with 'soft dollars,'" which "are controversial because clients pay for the higher commissions, while the services often benefit the manager the most. Higher commissions result in greater expenses for the fund and potentially lower returns for investors."

Shareholder Control Of Corporations Derided. In a op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (1/2, A23, 2.04M) titled, "The 'Corporate Democracy' Oxymoron," Henry G. Manne, Dean Emeritus of the George Mason University School of Law, writes, "They're back! Every 20 or 30 years shareholder democracy ideas come back in vogue, and their time seems to have arrived again -- with a vengeance. The SEC is huddling on whether to facilitate direct shareholder nomination of directors through a new interpretation of its shareholder proposal rule. … But, as has been demonstrated time and again, the modern corporation is a market creation, not a political one. Hardly any aspect of 'capitalism's greatest invention' cannot be explained by reference to the market forces that caused it to evolve as it has. Indeed, there is probably no aspect of modern state corporation laws, including limited liability, 'personhood' and perpetual existence, that could not have evolved (albeit a bit more expensively) in a purely contractual, common law milieu. So it is with the selection of managers."

NYTimes Defends Sarbanes-Oxley. The New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) editorializes on the "major accounting scandal" surrounding some 120 US companies, noting that "fudging the grant date for stock options doesn't quite have the spotlight-grabbing immediacy of Enron's collapse, but it is still gaming the system at the expense of shareholders." The Times notes that this scandal has emerged even as business leaders have worked to "roll back" new restrictions under the Sarbanes-Oxley law, and while acknowledging that some "logical tweaks were needed" in the new regime, concludes, "But the relaxation of a few miscalibrated, onerous provisions is where this effort should end."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Reporters Will Be Key Witnesses In CIA Leak Case. The AP (1/2, Apuzzo) reports, "Some journalists who made careers out of questioning government officials and bearing witness to history may soon find themselves answering questions from prosecutors as key witnesses in the CIA leak case." The AP continues, "Ten or more reporters from some of the most prominent news organizations could be called to testify in the perjury and obstruction case of former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby. It's rare enough for reporters to become witnesses. But the Libby case is even more unusual because journalists will be dueling witnesses – some called by the defense team, some by prosecutors. … 'It will be unprecedented and, as far as I'm concerned, horrifying,' Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said of the case, for which jury selection begins in two weeks." The AP adds, "Prosecutors want to show that Libby lied to investigators about his conversations with journalists regarding outed CIA officer Valerie Plame, and they are expected to rely on former New York Times reporter Judith Miller, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper and NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert to make their case. … Libby, the former top aide to Vice President Dick Cheney, has said he had no reason to lie and simply didn't remember those conversations. His attorneys have said they will call as many as seven unidentified journalists to testify about their conversations with Libby to bolster his case. … The Libby case has rankled news agencies for nearly three years, since Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald began subpoenaing journalists to testify before a grand jury. Fitzgerald said it was the only way he could thoroughly investigate whether any laws were broken."

DOJ Pushes For Access To Internet Records In Child Porn Probes. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/2, Reinan) reports, "The federal government wants your Internet provider to keep track of every website you visit. … For more than a year, the U.S. Justice Department has been in discussions with Internet companies and privacy rights advocates, trying to come up with a plan that would make it easier for investigators to check records of Web traffic." The Tribune continues, "The idea is to help law enforcement track down child pornographers. But some see it as another step toward total surveillance of citizens, joining warrantless wiretapping, secret scrutiny of library records and unfettered access to e-mail as another power that could be abused. … 'I don't think it's realistic to think that we would create this enormous honeypot of information and then say to the FBI, "You can only use it for this narrow purpose,"' said Leslie Harris, executive director of the Center for Democracy & Technology, a Washington, D.C.-based group that promotes free speech and privacy in communication. … 'We have an environment in which we're collecting more and more information on the personal lives of Americans, and our laws are completely inadequate to protect us.'" The Tribune adds, "So far, no concrete proposal has emerged, but U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has made it clear that he'd like to see quick action. … In September testimony before a Senate committee, Gonzales painted a graphic and disturbing picture of child pornography on the Web, which he called an urgent threat to children. The production and consumption of child pornography has exploded as the Internet makes it easier to exchange images, Gonzales said. … But federal agents and prosecutors are hampered in their investigations because Internet companies don't routinely keep records of their traffic, he told the committee. … Gonzales also pushed for Internet records tracking in an April speech at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children."

Democrats Tie Violent Crime Spike To Decreased Federal Law Enforcement Funding. Newsweek (1/8, Isikoff, Murr) reports, "A recent surge in violent crime is creating anxiety at the Justice Department and posing potential political problems for the Bush administration. The 3.7 percent rise for the first six months of 2006, cited in a new FBI report, was greater than expected and included a 9.7 percent spike in robberies. (Minneapolis and Oakland, Calif., saw jumps of more than 30 percent.) Police groups say the surge comes at the same time the White House has drastically cut aid for state and local law enforcement programs. 'We don't have the support from Washington,' says Los Angeles Police Chief Bill Bratton. Government figures show the FBI has shifted agents off standard criminal cases to work counterterrorism; the bureau has 994 fewer criminal case agents than it did on September 11, 2001—an 18 percent drop. (A Justice Department rep says it's 'highly unlikely' the crime increase is tied to federal funding, but they've dispatched teams to investigate.) The numbers have caught the attention of top Democrats on Capitol Hill. 'If you look at the figures, they're pretty striking,' says one Democratic aide, who is not authorized to speak publicly about policy. In a recent letter to FBI Director Robert Mueller, Judiciary Committee member Sen. Dianne Feinstein called the crime increases 'alarming.'"

NYC Crime Rates Continues To Drop, But Homicides Increase. The New York Times (1/1, Buckley) reports, "In New York City, rapes, robberies and assaults, among other crimes, continued to decline last year, prompting the Police Department's top official to herald 2006 as a very good year. Homicides, however, climbed 10 percent in the city, reversing a much-hailed decrease. 'We'd like to see no homicides. The reality is we're going to have them,' said Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly. 'I think this is a very good year.' He called the increase in killings in 2006 all but negligible compared with 1990, a year with one of the highest homicide rates in recent history. That year, crack-fueled violence soared, and 2,262 people were killed. Last year there were 579 killings citywide as of Dec. 24, an increase of 52 homicides over the same period in 2005. Yet overall crime last year was down 5 percent. The number of reported rapes declined by 7.4 percent to 1,486, subway crime plunged 13 percent and auto theft fell 11.4 percent. The police said the year's jump in homicides was rooted largely in an unusually high number of 'reclassified' deaths, deaths linked to injuries incurred in months or years past. There were 38 reclassified homicides in New York last year, compared with 21 in 2005. … Myriad factors account for New York's continuing decline in crime overall, the police and criminologists say. They cited more effective policing, shifting drug patterns and the lowest unemployment rate in 30 years. Yet what is puzzling, one expert said, is that overall crime is dropping even as New York becomes an increasingly polarized city, with haves and have-nots often living side by side in luxury condominiums and public housing."

Houston Mayor Blames Katrina Evacuees For Murder Rate Jump. The AP (1/2) reports, "The number of murders last year in Houston hit a 12-year high and increased by 13.5 percent over 2005, figures the mayor attributes in part to the arrival of evacuees from Hurricane Katrina. Houston had 379 homicides in 2006. That was the most since 1994, when 419 murders were reported, police said. In 2005, the city had 334 homicides. Mayor Bill White pointed to Hurricane Katrina evacuees from New Orleans as one reason for the increase. 'We did have a surge in population from a city where the homicide rate is eight times the national average,' White said. Houston's population increased by 148,000 people in 2006, many of them Katrina evacuees, according to the city's planning department. The swelling population helped keep Houston's homicide rate relatively steady, rising from 16.33 victims per 100,000 residents in 2005 to 17.24 victims in 2006. Nationally, the murder rate increased by 1.4 percent last year, according to FBI figures. Some experts disagreed with White's characterization, pointing to national trends indicating rising rates of violent crime. … Other types of violent crime dropped in Houston in 2006, police said. Robberies, rapes, aggravated assaults, burglaries, thefts and stolen cars dropped between 2 percent and 9 percent when compared with 2005 statistics."

Columbus Sees Slight Decrease In Homicides. The Columbus (OH) Dispatch (1/2, Decker) reports, "Homicides in Ohio's other big cities jumped last year, but slayings in Columbus ebbed slightly." The Dispatch continues, "Columbus police say 2006 ended with 102 killings, two fewer than in 2005. There were 88 in 2004. … Lt. James S. Schrader, a homicide squad supervisor, said the unit had feared that 2006 would surpass the previous year's surge, but the slayings slowed as the year ended. … 'In the last two months, they've leveled off considerably,' he said." The Dispatch adds, "Meanwhile, killings in Cleveland and Cincinnati soared. .. Homicides in Cincinnati topped its 2005 total of 79 by early December. By yesterday, the number had risen to 85, the most victims since police started keeping reliable records in 1950. Cleveland homicides have risen from 78 in 2004 to 109 in 2005 to, as of Saturday, 119 in 2006, the deadliest year in a decade, according to FBI and local statistics. … Nationally, slayings climbed in other cities after a decade of relative peace following the crack-cocaine-driven slaughter of the late 1980s and early 1990s."

Homicides Increase In Seattle. The Seattle Post-Intelligencer (1/2, Castro, Gutierrez) reports, "The increasing number of homicides has ended a steady decline in violent crime that so many large American cities, including Seattle, enjoyed during the past decade. Nationally, the number of murders increased 1.4 percent over the same period in 2005, FBI statistics show. … Seattle, still one of the nation's safest cities, has not been immune to recent crime trends. Although 2006's final statistics weren't yet available, they were expected to show that Seattle's violent crime rate rose, perhaps 1 percent over 2005. In 2005, violent crimes jumped 8 percent over the previous year." The P-I adds, "Assaults involving firearms in Seattle, something Seattle police began tracking in 2004, have climbed 37 percent since then through the end of November. … Driving up this year's homicide rate was Kyle Huff's mass shooting at a Capitol Hill home in March that shocked the community. Four months later, another gunman forced his way into the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle downtown office and shot six people, killing one. … Tose slain in Seattle this past year included a man stabbed to death by his sister's estranged husband, and a cabdriver caught in the cross fire when a woman in a brawl began shooting. … The oldest was 60. The youngest was 14. Three were beaten to death. Four were stabbed."

DC-Area Homicides Fall Sharply. The Washington Post (1/1, A01, Klein) reports, "Homicides dropped sharply in the Washington region in 2006, with the District reaching a 21-year low and Prince George's County showing a significant decrease after an alarming year of bloodshed." The Post continues, "The District recorded 167 killings -- a 15 percent drop from the 196 slayings in 2005. Prince George's had 134 killings last year, compared with a record 169 in 2005. … Overall, 417 homicides occurred in the Washington area last year, down by about 10 percent from 2005, when there were 462 killings. About half of the cases have been solved." The Post adds, "The decline comes as violence rises nationwide. Reports of homicides, assaults and other violent offenses rose by nearly 4 percent in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period in 2005, according to a recent FBI report. … Crime analysts said the Washington area's drop most likely is tied to a variety of factors, including economic gentrification, population shifts, more effective policing strategies and the jailing of violent predators. They also warned that crime is still quite high in some parts of the region. … The national rate of killings for mid-size cities the size of Washington is about 14 per 100,000 people, according to FBI statistics. The rates of the region's urban areas are higher: 29 per 100,000 in the District and 15 per 100,000 in Prince George's."

Columnist Decries Black-On-Black Homicides. In his column for USA Today (1/2, 9A), DeWayne Wickham writes, "Kevin West's murder was the 260th homicide this year in Baltimore — a city in which virtually all of the murder victims and those arrested for murder are black. On the same day that he was gunned down, tens of thousands of demonstrators marched down Fifth Avenue in New York to protest the Nov. 25 killing of another black man. Sean Bell was felled by a hail of police gunfire moments after he and two friends left his bachelor party early on the morning of the day he was to have been married." Wickham continues, "Just why the cops fired on the unarmed men is unclear. Bell's death drew the scorn of civil rights leaders and black activists, many of whom took part in the march. West's killing has generated no such attention. … And that makes me made as hell." Wickham adds, "As troubling as it is that Bell's life might have been cut short by the unlawful actions of some rogue cops, it bothers me more that most of this nation's black murder victims are killed by other blacks. And despite this chilling fact, nowhere have tens of thousands of people taken to the streets recently to protest this carnage. Not in New York, or Baltimore, or Atlanta, or Detroit, or Chicago. Nowhere. … Of the country's 14,860 homicide victims in 2005, 7,125 were black, according to the FBI's Uniform Crime Report. And of the 3,289 cases that year in which a single black was killed by a single assailant, the FBI says, 91% of the killers were black. … Let me put this another way: The number of blacks killed in 2005 in this one homicide category alone approaches the total of all the blacks lynched in this country from 1882 to 1968, according to records maintained by Tuskegee University." Wickham concludes, "The ripple effects of black-on-black killings have turned many inner city neighborhoods into urban wastelands, chased businesses from those communities, fueled a growth in other crimes and sapped the resources of local governments. .. .As mad as black folks have a right to be over the killing of Sean Bell, we ought to be angry over the failure of black leaders to be equally outraged over the murder of Kevin West — and the thousands of blacks who are killed each year by other blacks."

Aryan Brotherhood Prosecution Relies On Inmate Informants. The Los Angeles Times (12/30, Mozingo) reports, "Thick neck twitching, eyes drifting out of sync, Clifford Eugene Smith is not the most credible of witnesses: He says he is a 'drug fiend,' estimates having murdered 'about' 20 inmates over the years and lies on the stand so often that he recently committed perjury about committing perjury. Yet for the second time this year, federal prosecutors called Smith, 53, to testify against members of his former prison gang, the Aryan Brotherhood. In this go-round, prosecutors charge that Robert 'Blinky' Griffin, 58, and John 'Youngster' Stinson, 52, ordered a series of murders in an effort to create a more powerful, disciplined criminal organization and to expand drug and extortion rackets. The case went to a jury in Los Angeles on Dec. 19. The obstacle for the government, as evidenced by Smith's volatile and often colorful testimony, is that the only people who can testify about the gang's inner workings are hulking, tattooed miscreants who might scare the jurors more than the defendants. By contrast, Stinson looked downright scholarly in court, typing on a laptop, thin and pale with a whitening goatee and tortoiseshell glasses. Griffin, in sweater vests and crisp white tennis shoes, chatted amiably with his two attorneys."

Granting Of Police Power To Security Firms Draws Criticism. The Washington Post (1/2, A4, Goldstein) reports from Raleigh, NC, "Kevin Watt crouched down to search the rusted Cadillac he had stopped for cruising the parking lot of a Raleigh apartment complex with a broken light. He pulled out two open Bud Light cans, an empty Corona bottle, rolling papers, a knife, a hammer, a stereo speaker, and a car radio with wires sprouting out. … 'Who's this belong to, man?' Watt asked the six young Latino men he had frisked and lined up behind the car. Five were too young to drink. None had a driver's license. One had under his hooded sweat shirt the tattoo of a Hispanic gang across his back. … A gang initiation, Watt thought." The Post continues, "With the sleeve patch on his black shirt, the 9mm gun on his hip and the blue light on his patrol car, he looked like an ordinary police officer as he stopped the car on a Friday night last month. Watt works, though, for a business called Capitol Special Police. It is one of dozens of private security companies given police powers by the state of North Carolina -- and part of a pattern across the United States in which public safety is shifting into private hands." The Post adds, "Private firms with outright police powers have been proliferating in some places -- and trying to expand their terrain. The 'company police agencies,' as businesses such as Capitol Special Police are called here, are lobbying the state legislature to broaden their jurisdiction, currently limited to the private property of those who hire them, to adjacent streets. Elsewhere -- including wealthy gated communities in South Florida and the Tri-Rail commuter trains between Miami and West Palm Beach -- private security patrols without police authority carry weapons, sometimes dress like SWAT teams and make citizen's arrests." The Post notes, "Private security guards have outnumbered police officers since the 1980s, predating the heightened concern about security brought on by the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. What is new is that police forces, including the Durham Police Department here in North Carolina's Research Triangle, are increasingly turning to private companies for help. Moreover, private-sector security is expanding into spheres -- complex criminal investigations and patrols of downtown districts and residential neighborhoods -- that used to be the province of law enforcement agencies alone."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

HUD, Baltimore To Pay $300,000 In Civil Rights Case Legal Fees. The Baltimore Sun (1/2, Siegel) reports, "The city and the federal government have agreed to pay nearly $300,000 to lawyers representing black Baltimore public housing residents - the latest installment of legal fees in a long-running civil rights case." The Sun continues, "The payments - $236,744 from the city and $53,427 from the federal government - are being made to the American Civil Liberties Union of Maryland and the private firm of Brown, Goldstein & Levy for monitoring a partial consent decree in the case during a two-year period from July 1, 2002, through June 30, 2004, according to court documents." The Sun adds, "City officials say this bill brings the total they have paid out in the case to the ACLU, Brown, Goldstein & Levy and another private firm no longer involved in the case to $1.5 million. … In addition, officials say they have paid $5.1 million since 1998 to the local firm of Whiteford, Taylor & Preston to defend the city against allegations of discrimination." The Sun notes, "LA spokesman for the Justice Department could not say how much the federal government has paid to plaintiffs' lawyers in the case, but court records indicate it is about $500,000. The Justice Department has used lawyers from its civil division to represent the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development. … Under the terms of the decree that allowed the old family public housing high-rises to be redeveloped as mixed-income communities, the city and the federal government agreed to provide some 2,200 units for public housing residents in mostly white middle-class areas of the city and the suburbs by the end of 2002."

Racial Tension Sparks Melee At California Prison. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Mozingo) reports, "The weekend riot at Chino state prison erupted after two inmates — a Latino and an African American — began fighting in a recreation yard, and others, watching from surrounding dormitories, followed suit, clashing along racial lines that have racked the state prison system for decades, prison officials said Sunday. About 200 inmates took part in the 90-minute riot Saturday morning, out of the more than 1,000 inmates housed in the dorms where the fighting occurred, said prison spokesman Lt. Mark Hargrove. … Investigators have no information that the Mexican Mafia prison gang was behind the attack, or that it was meant to precipitate a race war in the prison system, Hargrove said. Wardens across the state were told to monitor activities closely, but only Chino was locked down. Of the 27 inmates taken to hospitals Saturday, 20 were released back to Chino. The prisoner thought to be the most seriously injured suffered a stab wound, a broken jaw and a laceration to the head, and was recovering in the prison hospital. Corrections officials said they had cleaned up much of the mess by Sunday. A majority of the windows in the five dorms were shattered, Hargrove said. 'They were throwing shards of glass,' he said. … Hargrove said prisoners are not normally separated by race in that facility — except after a riot like Saturday's. The facility is 27% black, 31% white, 39% Latino. Of the 27 injured, 24 were African American, including all seven of those still hospitalized."

Shalikashvili Calls For End To "Don't Ask, Don't Tell." In an op-ed in the New York Times (1/2, 1.16M), former Joint Chiefs Chairman John M. Shalikashvili writes that congress is considering legislation to repeal the US military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy regulating the service of gay personnel as part of the drive to increase the size of the armed forces. "The debate must be conducted with sensitivity, but it must also consider the evidence that has emerged over the last 14 years. When I was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I supported the current policy because I believed that implementing a change in the rules at that time would have been too burdensome for our troops and commanders." However, "last year I held a number of meetings with gay soldiers and marines, including some with combat experience in Iraq, and an openly gay senior sailor who was serving effectively as a member of a nuclear submarine crew. These conversations showed me just how much the military has changed, and that gays and lesbians can be accepted by their peers." Shalikashvili notes his belief that the policy's repeal is inevitable, concluding that when it is lifted, "gay men and lesbians will no longer have to conceal who they are, and the military will no longer need to sacrifice those whose service it cannot afford to lose."

WPost Calls For Further Investigation Into FL13 Voting. The Washington Post (1/2, A16, 690K) editorializes on the troubled election to choose the replacement of former FL13 Rep. Katherine Harris (R), in which "a mere 369 votes decided the race in favor of" Vern Buchanan (R), and in which rival Christine Jennings (D) has filed suit contesting the result based on a number of irregularities attributed to electronic voting machines. The Post argues that it is understandable "that there is a tendency to want to move on. But it would be wrong to let such impatience decide the case." Jennings and her supporters "sought access to the voting machines' 'source code' so that an outside expert could conduct an independent review under strict conditions set by a court monitor. Unfortunately, a Florida judge denied the request last week, partly because the information is proprietary. More than a winning commercial formula is at stake here. Hopefully the appeals court will see that the public good would be well served by getting to the bottom of this case. If not, the dispute is headed for what probably will be a very ugly -- and ultimately unsatisfying -- outcome in the House of Representatives."

ANTITRUST:

FCC Commissioner Calls AT&T-BellSouth Deal "Breakthrough" For Consumers. USA Today (1/2, 7B, Cauley) reports, "The Federal Communications Commission's handling of the $85 billion AT&T-BellSouth merger sets a 'new baseline' for protecting the interests of consumers, FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein said in an interview over the weekend." USA continues, "The FCC's approval of the merger on Friday allowed the deal to close immediately. To secure the FCC's blessing, AT&T agreed to a list of consumer-friendly concessions. Among them: For the next 30 months, AT&T agreed to sell 'naked' DSL — meaning consumers don't have to buy any other service from AT&T to get the DSL service — for just $19.95 a month. That's less than half the $44.95 that AT&T now charges." USA adds, "AT&T also agreed to a 'net neutrality' provision that will require the company to treat all broadband services, its own as well as rivals', equally for the next two years. That means AT&T can't favor its own traffic, in terms of transmission speed and quality. … In addition, AT&T agreed to sell some unused wireless spectrum. That could enable a new rival to enter the market, creating more options for consumers." USA notes, "Adelstein called the settlement a 'breakthrough' for consumers in that it establishes a new standard of behavior for the USA's communications giants. Big companies such as AT&T and Comcast 'have told the FCC that they can't live with a net neutrality provision in place,' Adelstein said. 'They can.' … The fact that AT&T agreed to such an aggressive net neutrality clause proves that, he said."

WSJournal Laments Inclusion Of "Net Neutrality" In AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A22, 2.04M) editorializes that AT&T CEO Edward Whitacre "was right" to call "Net neutrality" policies "nuts," and derides him for allowing "the two Democrats on the Federal Communications Commission" to require the adoption of such policies into the recent AT&T merger with BellSouth, continuing, "The more important question in this episode is political: Have we been watching a return of the Old Democratic habit of using rhetoric about 'equity' and 'justice' as a front for carrying water for certain business interests over others?" The Journal argues that "Internet users will benefit most from the rapid rollout of broadband, which requires letting companies get a return on their investment. Net neutrality is all about imposing price controls that shake down one corporate player for the benefit of another."

WSJournal Praises FCC For Easing Bells' Entry Into Cable TV Markets. In a companion piece, the Wall Street Journal (1/2, A22, 2.04M) editorializes "And speaking of the FCC (see above), we think it deserves full marks for its ruling last month that will make it easier for phone companies to enter the cable television business. The usual suspects are crying foul, but this is a decision that really will help millions of consumers who are currently paying cable rates dictated by anticompetitive video franchise agreements. For decades the incumbent cable TV providers enjoyed a virtual monopoly in most markets. Of late, the Bells have been attempting to crash this party with their own video offerings, but they're facing all kinds of barriers to entry." The Journal notes that municipalities are pressuring the phone companies to offer community perks in exchange for franchise approval, and "with some 30,000 local communities out there for the Bells to win over, all this nickel-and-diming adds up."

Tribe's Purchase Of Hard Rock Café Challenged. The Financial Times (1/2) reports, "The Seminole tribe's acquisition of the Hard Rock Cafe was plunged into controversy when Cordish, a US real estate developer, filed a lawsuit claiming it was shut out of the auction for the restaurant chain." The Times continues, "Cordish submitted documents to a Florida court late on Friday alleging that Hard Rock and Hamish Dodds, its chief executive, colluded with the Native American tribe to reduce competition in exchange for assurances that Mr Dodds would continue to run the company after the deal." The Times adds, "Baltimore-based Cordish said it had repeatedly expressed an interest in bidding but was denied access to Hard Rock's books for due diligence. The developer has already filed a suit against Merrill Lynch, the investment bank that ran the auction on behalf of Rank, the British gaming group that owns Hard Rock. … The move by Cordish comes as Rank shareholders prepare to meet next week to vote on the sale of Hard Rock for $965m." The Times notes, "The outcome is far from clear, after some analysts expressed disappointment with the price obtained in the deal. … Although it is common for shareholders to file suits against companies claiming that they might not have maximised value, it is far less common for a rival bidder to claim it was unfairly excluded from an auction."

ENVIRONMENT:

Arlington Begins Push To Curb Greenhouse Gas Emissions. The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Gowen, 690K) reports Arlington County, Va., "will buy more wind-generated electricity, give tax breaks for hybrid cars, require new public buildings to be green-certified and hand out energy-efficient light bulbs to residents as part of a major push toward reducing greenhouse gas emissions, county officials said yesterday. The county has reduced carbon dioxide and other emissions -- making its buildings more energy-efficient and adding hybrid vehicles to its fleets -- by a total of 2.6 percent since 2000, but must now sharply increase its efforts in order to reach its goal of a 10 percent reduction in the next five years, Arlington County Board Chairman Paul Ferguson (D) said yesterday." Ferguson "said he was inspired to launch the environmental initiative after seeing Al Gore's recent documentary, 'An Inconvenient Truth.'"

LATimes Backs Preservation Of Salton Lake. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, 850K) editorializes, "The Salton Sea is an accident of man and an insult to nature, an artificial lake so rank that its rotten-eggs odor often overwhelms its sparkle, an unnatural blunder with too much salt and too many dead fish. It must be saved. If only it were that easy. The lake, created in 1905 when a badly built canal diverted Colorado River water to a depression in the desert straddling

Riverside and Imperial counties, is drying up and in danger of extinction. Yet if the Salton Sea were to dry up entirely, the ensuing dust storms would pollute the Coachella Valley air with toxins now underwater. The sea also is a habitat for an endangered species of fish and a vital stopping ground for 400 species of birds." The Times calls for the state to utilize the most inexpensive plan to preserve the lake.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Colorado Meth-Related Arrests Said To Have Crushed Drug Ring. Calling it a top story for 2006, the Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel (12/31) reported local law enforcement agencies and the DEA "made a decisive blow against the methamphetamine epidemic when they arrested 31 local methamphetamine dealers and runners between January and March. The arrests effectively crushed western Colorado's largest meth distribution network to date, which by some estimates provided more than 70 percent of Mesa County's methamphetamine. … The ring's methamphetamine operation was credited with fueling, in part, the surging number of drug and property crimes that have plagued Grand Junction and its surrounding communities in recent years."

Washington State Marijuana Seizures Lead To More Than 340 Arrests. The AP (12/30) reported, "As 2006 draws to a close, drug-enforcement officials in Washington say they have destroyed more than 130,000 marijuana plants this year as part of a joint state and federal eradication effort. The federal Drug Enforcement Administration says that's nearly the same as last year, when a record 135,000 plants were destroyed. This year's seizures have led to more than 340 arrests and 190 weapons seizures." The Seattle Post-Intelligencer used the AP story.

Wyoming Meth Investigation Leads To 15 Guilty Pleas. The Wyoming Tribune (12/31) reported on a drug-ring investigation that it lists among last year's top stories. The Tribune wrote that law enforcement officials "arrested nine people in March in connection with the drug ring and were looking for three more people. The suspects…had apparently been running the drug ring since the previous June. They traveled to the Denver area to pick up methamphetamine and sold it from homes and hotel rooms in Cheyenne. … Fifteen suspects had pleaded guilty in May, July, August and September. Five more were awaiting jury trials."

In Kentucky, Seizure Indicates Possible Rise In Heroin Use. The AP (12/30) reported heroin "is re-emerging in the Louisville area, the result of Mexican drug-traffickers marketing to a new generation," according to federal authorities. Since July, a drug task force of federal and local police has confiscated more than two pounds of heroin with a street value of about $200,000, including two pounds recently in nearby Charlestown, Ind. Such amounts were unheard of in recent years, Tony King, resident agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration office in Louisville, told The Courier-Journal." An annual National Drug Threat Assessment report "released in October said Mexican heroin circulating in western states was spreading east of the Mississippi."

The Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal (12/30) reported officials "say heroin cases are increasing in Southern Indiana and Northern and Central Kentucky. In Indianapolis, 12 defendants await trial in U.S. District Court on charges of participating in a major heroin distribution ring."

Medical Marijuana Debate Continues In California. In "26 memories of 2006," the Palm Springs Desert Sun (12/31) wrote that the "debate over legalized medicinal marijuana came to the valley's three dispensaries. Federal agents, armed with a warrant, searched a safe deposit box belonging to a Palm Desert medical marijuana dispensary in June, prompting accusations of harassment from the dispensary's owner. … A spokeswoman for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Los Angeles office declined to comment, citing an ongoing investigation."

Dispensary Sales Seen As High-Stakes Drug Dealing. The Los Angeles Times (1/1, Tempest) reported the federal drug agency, which "does not recognize California laws legalizing the sale of marijuana to patients with doctor's prescriptions, contends the amount of money involved proves that the medical marijuana trade is nothing more than high-stakes drug dealing, complete with the same high-rolling lifestyles. 'These people will tell you they are just interested in the terminally ill,' said Gordon Taylor, DEA special agent in charge of the California eastern federal district, 'but what they are really interested in is lining their pockets with illegal drug money. When you pull the mask off, you see that they are nothing more than common dope dealers.'"

Citing the Los Angeles Times story, the Washington Times/UPI (1/1) reported larger California marijuana dispensaries "claim they are being unfairly targeted by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency. Among them is Shon Squier, 34, of Hayward, Calif., whose major storefront operation was shut down last month by the DEA, which also froze bank accounts containing $1.5 million and confiscated several expensive cars, motorcycles and $200,000 in cash."

LATimes Retraces Racketeering, Ecstasy Investigation. The Los Angeles Times (12/29, Mozingo) reported on a racketeering case and wrote that confidential informants "told the Drug Enforcement Administration that Ecstasy traffickers used [Hal] Waknine's postal business to launder millions of dollars. In a single transaction, he allegedly received $11 million to launder," an affidavit by a DEA agent said. An informant "said Waknine also boasted of using his mother's company, Silhouette Paris in Studio City, 'to import MDMA [Ecstasy] in the shoulder pads of women's apparel.'" Waknine was "sentenced…to 10 years in federal prison, a year more than prosecutors were asking."

In Afghanistan, Private Militias Said To Take Orders From Drug Traffickers, Warlords. In Shahr-i-Safa, the Los Angeles Times (12/31, Watson) reported, "It is the hashish harvest season, and marijuana plants as big as Christmas trees are stacked by the thousands against mud-brick homes, curing in the sun. Villagers scrape the gooey resin, which is pressed into blocks and exported along the same routes that move the opium used to produce heroin, a big source of the insurgents' income. Hundreds of gunmen prowl the Ring Road in Helmand. They are members of private militias who take orders from local warlords and drug barons and operate illegal checkpoints, mostly to squeeze money from truck drivers."

FBI Investigating Pipe Bomb Found At Louisiana Church. The Baton Rouge Advocate (1/2) reports, "FBI crime scene investigators returned today to Erwinville Baptist Church to collect evidence from the pipe bomb that was safely detonated by officials outside the church Sunday night. FBI investigators collected debris and combed the area for evidence, West Baton Rouge Parish Sheriff Mike Cazes said. The debris will be sent to the FBI's crime lab in Quantico, Va. The pipe bomb was found by deputies outside the church, along La. 413, south of U.S. 190, at 5:19 p.m. Sunday, authorities have said. The pipe bomb was safely detonated by the Louisiana State Police's Hazardous Material Unit around 9 p.m. Sunday The FBI is handling the investigation, Cazes said."

Birnbaum Says NRA's Warnings Little More Than Fundraising Ploy. Columnist Jeffrey H. Birnbaum writes in the Washington Post (1/2, A15, 690K), "In lobbying, a threat is good for business, whether it's genuine or not," which "might help to explain the dire warnings being issued by the National Rifle Association as the Democrats prepare to take control of Congress this week." Birnbaum notes that the NRA "is displeased with the voting histories of Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other top Democrats in the House and is putting them on notice that it won't tolerate passage of anti-gun measures. The only problem: No one expects gun legislation this year. … No matter. The NRA is on high alert, and its latest weapon is a pamphlet designed to send its members into fits of paranoid rage and to inspire them to open their wallets." A draft of the pamphlet "lashes out at such icons of the left as investor George Soros, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Pelosi," depicting them "as part of 'a marching axis of adversaries far darker and more dangerous than gun owners have ever known.'" Peter Hamm, spokesman for the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence "also said he does not believe Congress will take up and pass major gun legislation anytime in the near future. Still, the pamphlet asserts that 'towering waves of this coming storm are already crashing on our doorsteps.' … So beware -- and make your checks payable to the NRA!"

TAX:

State Legislatures Aim To Lessen Property Tax Burden. The Washington Times (1/2, Hurt, 88K) reports, under the headline, "States With High Taxes Try To Tackle Burden," "Americans are paying more property taxes today than ever before, and several states, including New Jersey and New York, will attempt to lessen the growing burden on homeowners in upcoming legislative sessions." The Times notes that that "rocketing" property tax rates, "fueled by the rapid increase in residential home prices, are being closely watched by anti-tax advocacy groups such as Americans for Tax Reform."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats To Start Session With "Modest Issues," Shunning GOP Input. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Levey, 850K) reports, "When Democrats take power on Capitol Hill this week, House leaders will kick off their legislative campaign with a lightning-fast 100-hour agenda. But there won't be a revolution." In "marked contrast to the Republicans who swept into the majority in 1994," incoming House Speaker Nancy "Pelosi and her legislative allies are not planning to amend the Constitution or eradicate federal agencies. Instead, their initial legislative foray will focus on modest, politically popular issues, including initiatives to expand stem cell research, lower prescription drug prices and tighten congressional ethics rules." The Times adds, "Pelosi's program is expected to receive a warm reception on Capitol Hill, even from some Republicans. Less clear is whether Democrats can follow up with solutions to the deeper problems that are troubling a restive public." Pelosi and the Democrats "plan no dramatic steps to influence the course of the war. Nor has the new majority detailed strategies to tackle other challenges that have confounded lawmakers for years, including rising healthcare costs and the financially imperiled Social Security system." The Times adds, "For now, the relatively safe 100-hour agenda may simply allow the Democrats to show they can accomplish something after a dozen years in the political wilderness."

The Washington Post (1/2, A1, Layton, Eilperin, 690K) says Democrats "are planning to largely sideline Republicans from the first burst of lawmaking." Instead of allowing Republicans "to fully participate in deliberations, as promised after the Democratic victory in the Nov. 7 midterm elections, Democrats now say they will use House rules to prevent the opposition from offering alternative measures, assuring speedy passage of the bills and allowing their party to trumpet early victories. … Democratic leaders say they are torn between giving Republicans a say in legislation and shutting them out to prevent them from derailing Democratic bills." House Republicans "have begun to complain that Democrats are backing away from their promise to work cooperatively. They are working on their own strategy for the first 100 hours, and part of it is built on the idea that they might be able to break the Democrats' slender majority by wooing away some conservative Democrats."

The Washington Times/AP (1/2) reports, "On the first day back, Democrats plan to change House rules on what members can accept from lobbyists. On the second day, they'll vote on other rules changes requiring that new spending or tax cuts be paid for and that pet projects tucked into larger bills be publicly disclosed. The new Democratic Senate, under Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, will take a parallel if somewhat more leisurely track."

The AP (1/2, Abrams) reports that Linda Fowler, professor of government at Dartmouth College, "said that while some of the Democratic proposals could face a tough sell in the Senate, 'what the Democrats have done is quite reasonably recognize that they need some centrist positions that have fairly broad appeal.'" In the Senate, Majority Leader Harry Reid and Republican leader Mitch McConnell "have agreed to open the session with a joint caucus, a gesture aimed at establishing 'a new tone' and an attempt to 'produce real results next year,' said Reid."

The New York Times (1/2, Hulse, 1.16M) notes there are "divergent outlooks" within the Democratic caucus "over how best to fulfill the Democratic promise to clean up the House." These differences are "just one illustration of a friction that could develop in the new Congress as the party takes control after 12 years in exile. While most attention will be focused on the divide between Republicans and Democrats, members of the new majority have their own differing perspectives, corresponding largely to length of service, that could ultimately prove more crucial to their success or failure."

In the Washington Post (1/2, A17, 690K), E.J. Dionne writes, "The Democrats who take power in Congress on Thursday have been given an opportunity that has not come their party's way for a half-century: They can remake their own image -- and Congress's -- and they can begin to restore public confidence in government. … If Democrats don't seize this rare opportunity, their party will pay for a long time. Not only will they disillusion their own supporters, but, more important, the angry centrists of the Ross Perot stripe who voted the Republicans out last year will either go back to the GOP or seek other options." Dionne adds, "What the Democrats are talking about sounds good. What will matter is that the provisions they pass not contain loopholes that render them much less far-reaching than they seem."

Democrats Also Plan To Move On Medicare, Stem Cells. The New York Times (1/2, Pear, 1.16M) reports the new Congress "will return to some of the biggest battles of the last decade as House Democrats try to rush through legislation requiring the government to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare beneficiaries and overturning President Bush's restrictions on embryonic stem cell research. … The Medicare proposal highlights the profound differences between Democrats and Republicans over the future of the nation's health care system, the proper role of government and the role of private markets in securing the best value for the huge sums spent on health care." The Times adds, "State officials say they wish Congress would focus on a more immediate problem: money for the Children's Health Insurance Program, which provides coverage for four million low-income children, is running out in more than a dozen states. … In debating the future of the children's health program, which has broad bipartisan support, Congress will take up proposals to cover some of the 46 million people who have no health insurance."

Yesterday, the New York Times/AP (1/1) reported that "millions of seniors… say they are happy with the" Medicare Part D benefit, "which cost the federal government about $30 billion in 2006." However, "the program affects seniors and the disabled differently, depending upon their income and health. There are many people who believe the program could be improved." The Times adds "The Bush administration estimates that the coverage saves the average beneficiary about $1,200. But many in Washington, particularly Democratic lawmakers, say the savings could be greater if the government were allowed to negotiate with drug manufacturers concerning the cost of medicine rather than leaving that chore to the plans."

WPost Derides GOP "Vandalism" On Spending Bills. The Washington Post (1/2, A16, 690K) editorializes, "They didn't quite trash the place on their way out, but congressional Republicans -- specifically, the Senate leadership under outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) -- engaged in the legislative equivalent of vandalism when it came to getting spending bills passed: They didn't. Of the measures needed to fund the government during fiscal 2007, now three months gone, the 109th Congress managed to approve only bills to pay for defense and homeland security spending. The rest of the government -- $463 billion in discretionary spending -- was left to run on autopilot." The Post adds, "Confronted with this abdication of responsibility, the incoming Democratic management…essentially" wrote off "the 2007 budget process and move on with a clean slate to 2008 -- a process that will begin in February, when Mr. Bush is to present his budget along with a whopper of an emergency spending bill to pay for operations in Iraq." The Democrats "have given themselves the clean slate they deserved. Their real test will come as they work to craft a 2008 budget that is both frugal and fair, not to mention finished on time."

Congress Not Expected To Address Federal Employee Issues In Coming Months. In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (1/2, Barr, 690K) reports, "Making decisions on government spending will be a big and early order of business for the new Congress, which returns this week. Most federal agencies are operating on an interim spending bill that expires Feb. 15. Key lawmakers have said they plan to put the government on a post-holiday diet that will stretch through September, and that could cause some headaches for federal employees." The Post adds "some agencies will have little choice but to curtail training, travel, hiring and the purchase of new equipment. It's possible that cash-strapped agencies might have to send workers home without pay for a few days, but the White House budget office hopes to be able to shift funding around to avoid furloughs and layoffs. … Although congressional aides were reluctant to make any predictions for the new year, it seems likely that the federal budget, the Iraq conflict, lobbying reform and completion of the 9/11 Commission recommendations will push many federal-employee issues to the sidelines in the opening months of the new Congress."

"Pelosi-Palooza" Tour To Precede New House Leader's Ascension To Power. The New York Times (1/2, Korblut, 1.16M) reports, "During her first 100 hours as House speaker, Nancy Pelosi has vowed, she will sweep an aggressive legislative agenda through the newly Democratic-controlled House. But first comes Pelosi-palooza. In a three-day stretch of whirlwind events beginning on Wednesday, Mrs. Pelosi will celebrate her heritage (at the Italian Embassy), her faith (in a Roman Catholic Mass), her education (at Trinity College), her childhood (in Baltimore) and her current home (in a tribute by the singer Tony Bennett, of 'I Left My Heart in San Francisco' fame)." She'll "embrace her status as the first female House speaker with a tea for women," "highlight her pull among Democrats with a $1,000-per-person fund-raising concert," and "will welcome visitors to the halls of Congress in an open-house tour." The Times notes, "The extended, carefully staged festivities are expected to dominate the occasion of Mrs. Pelosi's ascendance as the Democrats take control of Congress." Pelosi's backers "said she had every right -- an obligation, even -- to underscore her new role, given the historic nature of her rise to power. Thus the week is planned to project much more than an ordinary handoff of power in Congress. It is intended to leave a firm imprint of the new House leader's style and substance on the national consciousness, reminding voters that Mrs. Pelosi is both the first woman to take the job as well as a Catholic mother of five with Italian, blue-collar roots."

Bush, Former Presidents Pay Respects To Ford. The CBS Evening News (1/1, lead story, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The ceremony was simple, yet moving and uniquely American. Presidents along with ordinary Americans filing through the US Capitol, briefly paying respects to former President Gerald Ford. His body will lie in state in the Rotunda for one more night and tomorrow his flag-draped casket will be moved to the National Cathedral for the formal funeral service." CBS (Attkisson) added, "President Bush and the First Lady made their way to the Capitol, returning from their Texas ranch. They were followed former President Bush and his wife Barbara and one time Secretary of State James Baker, former President Clinton and Senator Hillary Clinton, Donald Rumsfeld, Defense Secretary to both Mr. Ford and Mr. Bush. Ford's body as brought here Saturday from California where he died at his desert home after a long illness."

The AP (1/2, Riechmann) reports "silence fell under the Capitol dome when the president walked toward the casket, illuminated by spotlights and guarded at each corner by members of the military honor guard. He and Mrs. Bush lowered their heads for a few moments, as if in prayer, then turned and walked away across the Rotunda's polished stone floor, which reflected the flag's red and white stripes." Bush, who "said nothing during his one-minute stop in the Rotunda, is to eulogize Ford on Tuesday at his funeral at the National Cathedral."

NBC Nightly News (1/1, lead story, 2:40, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "In all the grandness of the Rotunda in all the public nature of this ceremony, there were also children who grieved for their grandfather, a family moved by a country's respect and a former First Lady, a beloved American woman who actually had done in her own public role before allowed the nation to see her sorrow-up close and share in her burden. Advisors say…Bush invited the Ford family back inside the White House. And for some of the grandchildren it was the first time they had ever been here."

The Los Angeles Times (1/2, Puzzanghera, 850K) notes "Bush declared Tuesday a national day of mourning as a funeral service will be held for Ford at Washington National Cathedral. Most federal offices, including the courts and postal offices, will be closed." Ford's body "will be flown to his hometown of Grand Rapids, Mich., for a final service and public viewing before burial at Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum on Wednesday."

The Washington Times (1/2, Emerling, Cella, 88K) says "Mr. and Mrs. Bush joined thousands of mourners who braved steady rainfall and frigid temperatures yesterday to say a final goodbye to the 38th president of the United States." Similar stories, describing the scene at the Capitol yesterday, appear in USA Today (1/2, 3A, Page, Jackson, 2.27M) and the Washington Post (1/2, A3, Baker, Harris, 690K).

The New York Times (1/2, Swarns, 1.16M) reports Ford's "former cabinet secretaries and administration staff members will come together here once more, taking their seats in the black cars accompanying the funeral motorcade and in the pews of Washington National Cathedral. … For more than two decades, they had gathered at Mr. Ford's annual White House reunions, most of which were held in the nation's capital, where they chuckled over half-forgotten policy disputes and shook their heads sadly as their numbers dwindled and their host grew increasingly frail." The Times adds, "Even as their career paths and personal lives diverged, they kept in touch with Mr. Ford and with one another, reminiscing at dinner parties and lunches, and in long-distance phone calls. In mourning their president on Tuesday, the alumni of his administration will also be celebrating his life and the intimate circle he created."

The New York Times (1/2, Gay Stolberg, 1.16M) also reports that "of all the aging Washington power brokers who have re-emerged in the shadow of the death of former President Gerald R. Ford, there is one, Henry A. Kissinger, for whom the return to the spotlight may be as much curse as blessing." At a time "when the American public has soured on the war in Iraq -- indeed, at the precise moment the United States is recording the milestone of 3,000 American deaths there -- Mr. Kissinger's reappearance is stirring memories and rekindling debates about his role in managing another unpopular conflict, the Vietnam War." Kissinger, adds the Times, "continues to evoke the passions about Vietnam that Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former defense secretary, evokes today about Iraq."

The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A1, Adamy, 2.04M) reports from Grand Rapids that Ford "will be buried at the Gerald R. Ford Presidential Museum tomorrow, in the city where he spent most of his childhood and launched his political career. As a little boy, he lived in several homes, including at least one in affluent East Grand Rapids." However, "civic leaders made little effort to preserve any of his childhood homes, even though other former presidents have had theirs turned into museums or named historical landmarks. Over the years, some of…Ford's former homes were razed."

Ford Said To Have Deeply Affected Course Of US Politics. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Cannon, 2.03M) reports that when he died last week, former President Ford "was remembered with almost universal respect and admiration as the man who did much to calm the nation after Watergate and the Vietnam War and to restore honesty and stability to the White House."

Newsweek (1/2, Thomas, 3.12M) reports one of the "more peculiar legacies of the Ford era is the attempt by both" Donald Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney "to restore the power of the presidency. They were ambitious young men who served as Ford's chiefs of staff at a time when Ford was trying to dismantle what historian Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. has called 'the imperial presidency.'" Ford was "trying to create an atmosphere of openness and cooperation with Congress and the courts after Nixon's grandiose show of presidential power — from opéra bouffe uniforms for the White House guards to the shadowy Plumbers Unit. But Rumsfeld and Cheney felt that the Watergate reforms had gone overboard, and as members of the Bush war cabinet they have pushed hard to strengthen the executive."

U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Kelly, 2.03M) reports, "Congress, the press, and the Washington establishment had pilloried Richard Nixon – for reasons good and bad – and now were leaning on Ford. 'The feeling I had then, and I think it's been borne out by history,' Cheney told U.S. News last year, 'is that the balance shifted, if you will – that, in fact, the presidency was weakened.'"

In a Newsweek commentary (1/2), Vice President Cheney writes, "He was an unassuming man, our 38th president, and few have ever risen so high with so little guile or calculation. Even in the three decades since he left office, he was not the sort to ponder his legacy, to brood over his place in history."

In a Newsweek commentary (1/2), former President George H. W. Bush said, "Jerry Ford was decent, honorable, trustworthy, down-to-earth. That was his whole personality. I hope it will be his legacy."

In a Newsweek commentary (1/2), former President Clinton says, "After Gerald Ford left the White House, I was grateful for his counsel, for his occasional support on important national issues, for the respectful way in which he articulated his honest disagreements with my policies, for a few unforgettable golf games and for the partnership he forged with President Carter, which I have tried to emulate in my work with former president Bush."

In a Newsweek commentary (1/2), former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said Ford "took over at perhaps the most perilous moment of domestic crisis since the Civil War, and he had neither the months of transition a new president normally has, nor the honeymoon a new president normally has. But he moved with calm and surefootedness into what could have been an overpowering experience."

DOJ_NMG_0110784

In a U.S. News and World Report column (1/2), David Gergen says, "Why does Ford look so much better in the rearview mirror? Mostly, I suspect, because the personal qualities that he brought to public life seem so scarce these days. The simplicity of his burial reminds us again that Ford was, first and foremost, a humble man of the Midwest." Most "of all, Ford brought a forthright honesty to politics."

In his U.S. News and World Report column (1/2), Michael Barone says, "Ford was ridiculed as a bumbler though he was a gifted athlete and was dismissed as a lightweight though he entered the White House with a considerable command of foreign and domestic policy. He healed the nation and, more important, proved that it was possible to get America off its downward trajectory and heading upward again, as it did in the 1980s. Something to remember in these pessimistic times."

In Newsweek (1/2, 3.12M), historian Michael Beschloss says, "President for just 29 months, Ford changed the way we live, rescuing the White House from scandal, restoring a measure of confidence in politics and articulating a philosophy of robust executive power that influences President Bush even now. Ford's last two chiefs of staff, Vice President Dick Cheney and ex-Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld — men whose understanding of executive power was shaped by their experience in Ford's White House — have been crucial figures in the Bush years."

More Commentary. Peggy Noonan writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/2, P10, 2.04M) that Ford "was a good man, and that's not nothing -- it's something. Gerald Ford fought for his country. He didn't indulge his angers and appetites. He seems to have thought, in the end, that such indulgence was for sissies -- it wasn't manly. He was sober-minded, solid, respecting and deserving of respect. And at that terrible time, after Watergate, he picked up the pieces and then threw himself on the grenade. We were lucky to have him. We were really lucky to have him. Rest in peace."

Jon Meacham, editor of Newsweek, writes in the Washington Post (1/2, A17, 690K), "During his most critical moments in the White House -- his assumption of power and the pardoning of Nixon -- Ford drew deeply on theological imagery. Everyone knows that Ford said 'My fellow Americans, our long national nightmare is over' on Aug. 9, 1974. Much less quoted, but perhaps more revealing given the pardon, is a sentence he spoke a moment later: '[T]here is a higher Power, by whatever name we honor Him, who ordains not only righteousness but love, not only justice but mercy.'" Meacham adds that "such an understanding, naturally, has hardly been unanimous, and many Americans are reasonably uncomfortable with the idea that our leaders think they are either communing with the divine or carrying out God's mission." But "time and again in the American experience…the culture has been more in line with [Abraham] Lincoln's -- and Ford's -- views on the question of religious expression and thought in the public sphere than it has been to that of strict separationists."

Chief Justice Urges Pay Increase For Judges. The AP (1/2, Yost) reports, "Pay for federal judges is so inadequate that it threatens to undermine the judiciary's independence, Chief Justice John Roberts says in a year-end report critical of Congress. Issuing an eight-page message devoted exclusively to salaries, Roberts says the 678 full-time US District Court judges, the backbone of the federal judiciary, are paid about half that of deans and senior law professors at top schools." The issue of pay, says Roberts, "has now reached the level of a constitutional crisis."

Pilot Accidentally Flies Over Bush's Crawford Ranch. The AP (1/1), in an article published on the New York Times' website, reports that the pilot of a small airplane inadvertently flew into restricted airspace over President Bush's ranch in Crawford, Texas, Sunday night, "causing the scrambling of F-16 fighter jets, an Air Force spokeswoman said. The jets used flares to get the attention of the pilot, who landed and was interviewed before being sent on his way, according to the North American Aerospace Defense Command and the Secret Service."

Congress Urged To Bolster US Merchant Fleet. In an op-ed in the New York Times (1/2, 1.16M), John Curtis Perry, director of the maritime studies program at the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University; Scott Borgerson, a recent graduate; and Rockford Weitz, a Ph.D. candidate there write, that the Safe Port Act signed by President Bush in October "is a vitally important and overdue step. But it ignores another major problem in maritime commerce: the phenomenal decline of American shipping. While it's true that the United States Navy still dominates the world ocean…American commercial shipping is but a puny remnant of its former self." The writers detail the decline oft the US merchant fleet since the 80s, blaming "an antiquated law that prevents American coastal shippers from buying ships made in other countries. By amending this law and, at the same time, encouraging the development of domestic coastal shipping, Congress could help restore America's status as a great and proud maritime nation."

Shuler Expects Pelosi Will Work With Blue Dogs. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Knight, 2.03M) reports Washington is "buzzing with speculation about how incoming moderate freshman Democrats like Heath Shuler of North Carolina will change congressional dynamics." Shuler will join "the 'blue dogs,' a group of budget-cutting Democrats, mostly from southern states, whose ranks will swell from about 37 to 44 in the new Congress." Asked if he thought Speaker Nancy Pelosi "will work well with the blue dogs and other moderates," Shuler said, "I think she will. She realizes the importance of having that voice in the middle, that moderate Democrat. She has been very easy to work with so far, and I think she certainly realizes and understands how it works politically and realizes what happened this election cycle."

Congressional Committees Hiring Investigators. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, 2.03M) reports that as a "sign that the new Democratic majority plans to get tough, key congressional committees have begun hiring lawyer-investigators to probe the administration and its policies." The House Appropriations Committee, "where Iraq war critic Rep. John Murtha will be influential, is hiring investigators to look into the administration's war policies and spending in Iraq and Afghanistan. Rep. Henry Waxman, the incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, who's been dogging the vice president's energy task force, is also hiring lawyers."

Foreign Investment Said To Be Solution To Social Security Crisis. In a Wall Street Journal (1/2, A23, 2.04M) op-ed, Discovery Institute senior fellow George Gilder asks, "Would conservatives please forget the Social Security 'problem'? As Peter Drucker once wrote in these pages, 'Don't solve problems, pursue opportunities.' When Republicans solve 'problems,' they feed their failures, starve their strengths, and fritter away their remaining power in political imbroglios and special interest pork-fests." Gilder writes that rather than worrying about the perception of a future collapse in the Social Security system, the problem would be better addressed by utilizing "the realities of productivity, technology, immigration and global trade and investment. The key is keeping the economy open to outside investors as our population ages and as the productive center of the global economy shifts toward Asia. As Michael Milken points out, the younger workers around the globe will use their increasing savings to buy the assets of American seniors as they grow older, thus offering liquidity to our retirees, sustaining U.S. asset prices, and expanding U.S. opportunities."

Goode Reaffirms Opposition To Ellison's Use Of Quran. In an op-ed in USA Today (1/2, A8, 2.27M) VA5 Rep. Virgil Goode (R) writes in defense of a letter he wrote criticizing MN5 Rep.-elect Keith Ellison (DFL) over his intention to use a Quran when he is sworn in to Congress. Goode clarifies his position that, as he wrote in the letter, 'If American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Quran,'" arguing that "that we were not attacked by a nation on 9/11; we were attacked by extremists who acted in the name of the Islamic religion. I believe that if we do not stop illegal immigration totally, reduce legal immigration and end diversity visas, we are leaving ourselves vulnerable to infiltration by those who want to mold the United States into the image of their religion, rather than working within the Judeo-Christian principles that have made us a beacon for freedom-loving persons around the world."

Meanwhile, a sharply-toned USA Today (1/2, A8, 2.27M) editorial counters, "Keith Ellison's election to the House, as the chamber's first Muslim, provides the United States with a grand opportunity to showcase its credentials as a nation of opportunity, equality and diversity. What a great story to tell the Muslim world. Five years after 9/11, voters in America's heartland elected Ellison, an African-American who grew up in Detroit and converted to Islam in college, to one of the nation's highest offices." However, the piece continues, America's "chance to shine was tarnished by a few ugly voices. The loudest belongs to [Goode] who used the occasion to take a crude swipe not only at Ellison and the Quran, but at all Muslims. The piece continues to praise Ellison's reservation on the issue and to pan Goode and others who subscribe to his position.

LATimes Criticizes Senators' Use Of Holds. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, 850K) editorializes against Senators' ability to use holds on legislation they oppose, noting that "the Senate can and should take action to prevent a single senator from imposing his prejudices on the entire body, noting that Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback's (R) "hold on Michigan Appeals Court Judge Janet Neff, who was nominated for a federal district judgeship, was an especially obnoxious use of the procedure. Brownback is fixated on the fact that Neff attended and spoke at a ceremony in 2002 at which the daughter of the judge's next-door neighbor exchanged (legally nonbinding) vows with another woman. … But if Brownback's use of the hold is wrong, so is its use by other senators. Reformers, led by Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), are proposing to do away with secret holds," and "Senate rules should be amended to abolish all holds, secret and open, so that no senator can usurp the right of the entire body to judge a nominee or a piece of legislation. The hold is defended as a form of 'senatorial courtesy,' but it's insulting to the people senators represent."

end of this year, and the credit goes to techies, bankers, chefs and shoppers, according to a Wall Street Journal survey of economists. The panel of 60 economists who participated in the Journal's latest semiannual economic forecasting survey offered an optimistic outlook for 2007: The service sector should keep humming along as the recent weakness in housing and manufacturing abates and the Federal Reserve begins to reduce interest rates." That "would allow the economy to expand at a rate fast enough to keep investors happy, but slow enough to keep inflation at bay." The Journal adds, "Even so, economists haven't stopped worrying about what could happen if the current slowdowns in housing and manufacturing spread further -- a pattern that has characterized previous recessions. In another potentially ominous sign, they increasingly differ about the economy's trajectory."

The New York Times (1/2, De la Merced, 1.16M), however, says "Wall Street economists are looking at 2007 with some caution. They expect at least some slowdown in economic growth. And many worry that housing's slump will spread to other corners of the economy." The analysts surveyed by the Times "predicted that the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, which closed 2006 at 1,418.30, would end 2007 at 1,440 to 1,570."

The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 8, 2:40, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported that "in his New Year's address, President Bush said the expanding US economy was one of the big success stories of 2006 and he predicts more success this year." CBS (Solrozano) showed Michael Levy, chief economist, Bank of America, saying, "Personal incomes are up, wages are rising a little faster than inflation and the consumers continue to be resilient, despite all the curveballs thrown at them." CBS added, "Curveballs like housing. In the first ten months of 2006, new building permits and housing starts went down by 6%. For most of the year there was worry over the housing bubble which at this point has sagged more than burst. Some expect a continued weak market through next year." Robert Brusca, economist, Fact & Opinion Economics: "Going into 2007, there's some people who still hold that view. They still think that housing has another shoe to drop. But as the year true to a close, the housing prices began to abate to some extent."

The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A2, Ford, Gerena-Morales, 2.04M) says that "for the past five years, US corporate profits have grown much faster than the overall economy, one of several reasons why US stock prices keep setting records. But many economists believe that the days of outsize profit growth are nearing an end. Corporate profits, as measured by the Commerce Department, have risen more than 12% a year since 2002, hitting a high of 19% in 2004. In the third quarter of 2006, profit growth was running at an annualized rate of 16%." But "the consensus forecast of economists polled by The Wall Street Journal calls for those gains to slow to the single digits this year and next, with pretax profits rising about 6%."

The Christian Science Monitor (1/2, Trumbull, 59K) reports "a healthy economy could allow American consumers to keep spending even as they borrow less and save more." There is "good news: For most households, this is a relatively benign climate for financial make-overs. Many borrowers have the opportunity to refinance their debt at low interest rates. Moreover, forecasters generally don't foresee a recession in 2007. A healthy economy could allow consumers to keep spending even as they borrow less and save more."

Speculation Surrounds Jeb Bush's Next Move. The New York Times (1/2, Goodnough, 1.16M) reports Gov. Jeb Bush is leaving office "as one of the most popular and prominent governors in state history," and despite his "abrasiveness and the plunging popularity of his brother the president, he has remained well liked -- or at least respected -- to the end, a feat in a state as ethnically and politically divided as Florida. A poll last month by Quinnipiac University found that 57 percent of Floridians feel he did a 'good' or 'great' job as governor." Bush "has adamantly ruled out a presidential campaign of his own next year, saying that he wants only to return to Miami with his wife, Columba, and their cat, Sugar. Yet rumors about his future have burst forth as regularly as exotic species in the Everglades." Similarly, the Financial Times (1/2, Ward) says "Bush's efforts to duck questions about his future seem unlikely to quash feverish speculation" about his future. While "his brother limps towards the end of his troubled presidency, the younger Mr Bush is leaving office on a high."

Democratic White House Hopefuls May Benefit From Committee Chairmanships. Under the headline, "Senate Panels To Provide Soapbox," the Washington Times (1/2, Bellantoni, 88K) reports, "Senate Democrats interested in White House bids will get tons of free publicity starting in January with new and prominent posts on key panels. Senators hoping to pontificate on Iraq, global warming or health care policy will enjoy multiple hearings -- some televised live -- and the amplified political microphone that comes with being in the majority party." The Times notes that Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden will chair the Foreign Relations Committee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry will chair the Small Business and Entrepreneurship Committee, and Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd will chair the Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee."

The AP (1/2, Miga) also reports that Dodd "will become chairman of the Senate Banking Committee in Congress, giving him oversight of the nation's banking, financial services and insurance industries. The post will create new fundraising opportunities — a potential boost for a longshot prospect like Dodd who must prove he can raise the tens of million of dollars needed to stay competitive in the 2008 campaign. … A surge of Wall Street money could initially boost Dodd's prospects. But it could also undercut his efforts to cast himself as a champion of average working Americans."

McCain Seeks Proxy To Steer GOP Armed Services Staff During White House Bid. The Washington Times (1/2, Scarborough, 88K) reports that Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) will assume the top GOP spot on the Senate Armed Services Committee, when Virginia Sen. John Warner (R), the panel's current chairman, leaves the leadership post because of term limits. The Times notes that McCain is "widely expected to formally announce this year that he is seeking the Republican presidential nomination," and he is working to "piece together a minority committee staff that can operate while he is on the campaign trail." Former Senate staffers say one of the finalists for the key post of minority staff director is Michael V. Kostiw, who was an aide to former Rep. Porter J. Goss on the House Intelligence Committee." The Times lists a number of McCain's national security advisors, and concludes by noting that former Kansas Sen. Bob Dole (R) also served as his party's ranking member on the panel while running for President.

Clinton, Obama Voting Records Provide Contrast Entering Campaign. An analysis piece published on the front page of the Washington Post (1/2, A1, Murray, 690K) reports on the differences in the voting records of New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D), and the impact these differences will have on the Senators' perceived competition for their party's nomination for the 2008 presidential election, leading off, "The attack ads practically write themselves: Hillary Clinton voted against ethanol! Barack Obama wants to increase taxes!" The Post notes that on 40 occasions, their votes differed, generating "a lot of material to mine, and even misrepresent." The Post notes that overall, the two voted alike on many issues during their joint tenure, but that differences can be perceived on such issues as "energy policy, congressional ethics and budget priorities, relations with Cuba, gun ownership, and whether a senator can hold a second job."

Voters' Desire For Change Boosts Obama. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Walsh, 2.03M) reports Sen. Barack Obama "is expected to enter" the 2008 race, "and he plans to announce his decision in the next few weeks. But regardless of whether he runs, the intensity of Obama-mania suggests that the political and societal forces he represents -- particularly a desire for new ideas, new faces, and a less rancorous brand of discourse -- will shape the next election." Other Democratic "presidential wannabes are testing the same themes," but "so far, it is Obama who has ridden the desire for change the furthest and the fastest." Obama said, "I think there is a great hunger for change in the country -- and not just policy change. What I also think they are looking for is change in tone and a return to some notion of the common good and some sense of cooperation, of pragmatism over ideology. I'm a stand-in for that right now."

U.S. News and World Report (1/2, 2.03M) also runs excerpts of its interview with Sen. Obama. Asked to explain his opposition to the Iraq war, Obama said, "It's a classic example of ideology trumping reality. The country has now rejected that approach to governance." Obama said if he planned to "run a competitive race, I would get in in January."

Romney To Open Exploratory Committee After Ford Funeral. The AP (1/2, Johnson) reports that according to an unnamed "top aide," outgoing Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) plans to file FEC paperwork to form a presidential exploratory committee by Wednesday this week, "but not until funeral services for former President Gerald R. Ford have concluded." Romney had intended to file on the first business day of the year, but deferred out of respect for Ford's passing. The piece continues to offer a brief biography of Romney's political career.

Spitzer Inaugurated Governor Of New York, Promises Ethics Reform. The New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) reports on the inauguration address of New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer (D), which served as "the beginning salvo in what many see as a gargantuan challenge Mr. Spitzer has set out for himself — to overhaul a state government paralyzed by gridlock and consumed by recurring scandals. Yet Mr. Spitzer's work began hours before the speech: He signed five executive orders before 9 a.m., including directives establishing new ethical guidelines for state workers, among them a ban on accepting almost any gifts, as well as new restrictions on lobbying and the use of state resources. He also barred elected officials or candidates from appearing in advertisements paid for by state entities, a frequent practice of Mr. Pataki."

Financing Of Gubernatorial Inaugural Events Draws Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A8, Cooper, 2.04M) reports, "Chevron Corp. maxed out on its permissible yearly political contributions to California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's re-election campaign with a single donation of $22,300 early in 2006. But that didn't stop" Chevron "from chipping in $50,000 to be a 'Gold Sponsor' of the governor's inaugural celebration," which will give "Chevron officials access to" Schwarzenegger "at two events for sponsors and an invitation-only black-tie ball." Thirty-six recently-elected governors will celebrate their wins "this month with parties ranging from modest to star-studded.

Several will cost $1 million or more. Many inaugural events will be exclusive affairs, paid for by nonprofit committees that aren't subject to state campaign-donation limits or reporting requirements designed to contain influence on elected officials." The Journal notes, "In a few cases, such unregulated fund-raising has caused headaches for new governors, many of whom were elected on reform or populist platforms." Florida Gov.-elect (R) Charlie Crist (R) "canceled plans for a donors' ball when he was cited in the media for his no-limits donations drive." Meanwhile, Massachusetts Gov.-elect Deval Patrick (D) "has drawn criticism for planning a sprawling inaugural celebration that includes seven statewide events culminating in a outdoor swearing-in ceremony in downtown Boston on Thursday. Financing for the event is being handled by the Patrick/Murray Inauguration Committee, which allows donations of as much as $50,000."

States Moving To Regulate "Nontraditional" Mortgages. The Washington Post (1/2, D1, Downey, 690K) reports, "Nineteen states and the District of Columbia have moved quickly to warn state-regulated lenders about the hazards to consumers from nontraditional mortgages." The Post notes that federal banking officials in September "issued a sternly worded advisory" to such lenders, telling them that loans such as "interest-only mortgages and other arrangements where the borrower cuts monthly costs by paying back less than full interest and principal" should not be made to consumers who "may be unable to repay them. Within 24 hours of the federal guidance's release, six states had issued similar warnings to their own lenders, a notable flurry of activity in a field known for its slow-moving bureaucracies."

Buffett Donation Part Of "Exceptional Year" For Philanthropy. The Financial Times (1/1, Knight) reports on the $31 billion pledge made by Warren Buffett to the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, which was in excess of previous US spending records "by a huge margin." The Times, noting that the gift "is the biggest charitable donation in history. But even without Mr Buffett's largesse, it was an exceptional year for philanthropy with a record number of gifts of more than $100m. This year there were 14 gifts of $100m or more. In 1998 – the year that came closest to that number – there were 12, and last year, 10 donations of that size were made. 'It's not just the Bill Gates and the Warren Buffetts of the world who are giving; it's a lot of different people,' said Stacy Palmer, Chronicle editor." The Times continues to detail the gifts of other high-level donors in 2006.

NYTimes Praises City Charity. A New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) editorial titled, "Something To Tide You Over," lauds the charitable work of the UJA-Federation of New York, citing the example of the organization's aid to an elderly Jewish woman who immigrated to the US and whose Social Security benefits expired before she could attain her citizenship. The Times notes that the group is a beneficiary of the New York Times Neediest Cases Fund, and the its assistance was sufficient to support the woman until she was able to become a citizen.

New HIV Drug Shows Promise In Blocking Disease. The Los Angeles Times (1/1, Ricci, 850K) reports on the development of a new drug to combat HIV called an integrase inhibitor "that some researchers are calling 'truly phenomenal.'" "Newly published clinical studies showed that it, in combination with two existing drugs, reduced the virus to undetectable levels in nearly 100% of HIV patients taking a regimen for the first time. It had a similar effect on the virus in up to 72% of salvage therapy patients." The drug prevents the virus's self-replication by blocking its ability to merge with host cells.

Media Urged To "Treat Monica Lewinsky As A Lady." In a Washington Post (1/2, A17, 690K) column, Richard Cohen writes that principals in former President Clinton's impeachment proceedings "finally got to meet the storied Monica Lewinsky, they were floored by her. She was smart, personable and -- as the record makes clear -- dignified. This is more than can be said about some of the people who write about her. I will not name names. But in recent days, Lewinsky has been back in the news. In December she graduated with a master's degree in social psychology from the London School of Economics." Cohen continues to lament Lewinsky's reputation as "a girl toy, a trivial thing, a punch line," as well as the gender inequity applied by the media, concluding, "It would be nice if my colleagues in the media would resolve to treat Monica Lewinsky as a lady, to think of her as they would themselves, to remember their own youth and the things they did and to understand that from this day forward anyone who takes a cheap shot at Lewinsky has a moral and professional obligation to look in the mirror. To proceed otherwise is to miss the joke entirely. No longer is it Monica Lewinsky. It is now the people who write about her."

LATimes Praises Schwarzenegger For Attention To State Healthcare Reform. The Los Angeles Times (1/2, 850K) editorializes, "Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has set the bar so high in promising healthcare reform that it's tempting to suspect that he broke his leg on purpose, just for the photo-op in his hospital bed to drive home the high costs of healthcare." He "deserves credit for taking on the issue. We hope he won't take it the wrong way when we offer this hope for the unveiling of his proposal next week in his State of the State address: Break a leg."

WPost Hails Fenty's Inauguration. Under the headline, "Welcome, Mr. Mayor," the Washington Post (1/2, A16, 690K) editorializes, "Adrian M. Fenty will be sworn in today as the District's fifth mayor on a wave of hope and optimism so high even his closest advisers wonder how long it can last. Much depends on whether Mr. Fenty (D) is as adept at governing as he was at campaigning. The brash young politician who won the city's unquestionable support now must make good on his promises of progress. It is encouraging that Mr. Fenty has demonstrated sound judgment in the months since his victory in the September primary all but guaranteed his election. … Yet Mr. Fenty's biggest challenge -- the one that carries the most political peril for him and the greatest consequence for the city -- is tackling the abysmal state of the public schools. Despite some of the highest per-pupil school spending in the country, too many D.C students lack the basic skills critical for success, and too many school buildings are in awful shape. … Mr. Fenty is correct in his belief that the city will never truly prosper if its schools remain broken, and his resolve to do something about them should be applauded. But it's vital that he proceed carefully, mindful that even if he succeeds where his predecessor failed in a mayoral takeover of schools, reformed governance is no panacea for the educational ills of a dysfunctional system."

US, Europeans Adapt New Strategy To Increase Pressure On Tehran. The New York Times (1/2, A3, Cooper, Weisman, 1.16M) reports the United States and its allies in Europe, "in a tacit acknowledgment that sanctions imposed by the United Nations Security Council in late December are too weak to force Iran to abandon its nuclear ambitions, have embarked on a new strategy to increase the financial and psychological pressure." The plan involves using "the language of the resolution to help persuade foreign governments and financial institutions to cut ties with Iranian businesses, individuals in its nuclear and missile programs and, by extension, the Iranian Revolutionary Guard Corps," according to Stuart Levey, under secretary of the treasury for terrorism and financial intelligence. Bush administration officials "said envoys would soon head abroad to press officials of foreign governments and banks to interpret the Security Council resolution equally aggressively." The new strategy "builds on the Treasury Department's efforts over the past few months to get Western banks to scale back business with Iran or risk running afoul of American laws."

Iran Seeks To Gain Regional Influence. The Financial Times (1/2, Khalaf, Editor) reports that during a recent trip to Bahrain, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki "suggested Gulf stability was best achieved by removing American forces, well entrenched across the region, and setting up, with Tehran, a regional security alliance." The "call for more self-reliance in the Gulf has some appeal among ordinary Arabs, resentful of the US and frustrated by their own governments' over-dependence on American security. But official circles, in both the Gulf and the US, see his suggestions as a reflection of Iran's suspected ambition for regional superpower status."

US Unit "Works Quietly" Against Iranian Influence. In an article of 1,182 words, the Boston Globe (1/2, Stockman, 413K) reports on the Iran Syria Policy and Operations Group (ISOG): "For nearly a year, a select group of US officials has been quietly coordinating actions to counter the looming threat of a nuclear-armed Iran, including increasing the military capabilities of Arab allies such as Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, and Bahrain." Its actions "include covert assistance to Iranian dissidents and building international outrage toward Iran by publicizing its alleged role in a 1994 terrorist attack in Argentina, according to interviews with half a dozen White House, Pentagon, and State Department officials who are involved in the group's work. ... Its workings have been so secretive that several officials in the State Department's Near Eastern Affairs bureau said they were unaware it existed. ... ISOG was modeled after the Iraq Policy and Operations Group, set up in 2004 to shepherd information and coordinate US action in Iraq. ISOG has raised eyebrows within the State Department for hiring BearingPoint -- the same Washington-based private contracting firm used by the Iraq group -- to handle its administrative work, rather than State Department employees."

Ahmendinejad's Missteps Helping Rival Raise Profile. Newsweek (1/2, 3.12M) reports in its Periscope column, "Iranians are deserting the president they elected by a landslide in June 2005." Some of his "own supporters criticized his recent international gathering of Holocaust revisionists as harmful to Iran's national interests. And thanks to his economic flubs, Iranians are grumbling about inflation instead of reveling in an oil-boom windfall." The legislature "has stopped rubber-stamping the 50-year-old president's decisions, and the latest local elections cost him all but two of his allies on Tehran's 15-seat city council. The big winner: his pothole-filling, street-cleaning successor as mayor of Tehran, Mohammad Bagher Ghalibaf, 45." Iran's "next presidential vote isn't due until 2009, but Ghalibaf is already casting a shadow on Ahmadinejad's future."

Palestinian Factions Clash In Gaza. The Washington Post/AP (1/2, A11) reports violence erupted in the Gaza Strip Monday, "with warring Palestinian factions firing at each other and kidnapping rivals, and gunmen abducting a foreign news photographer." The clashes in the Jabalya refugee camp near Gaza City "broke a week-long pause in the violent confrontation between" Hamas and Fatah. Meanwhile, "gunmen in Gaza City abducted a photographer with the news service Agence France-Presse, which identified him as Jaime Razuri, 50, of Peru."

Israel Begins Easing Restrictions At West Bank Checkpoints. AFP (1/2) reports Israel has begun easing restrictions at checkpoints in the West Bank "as promised by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert at a summit with Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas last month." However, an Israeli military spokesman said roadblocks were "not being lifted altogether for the time being."

Bush, Olmert Resisting Overtures From Syria. U.S. News and World Report (1/2, Derfner, 2.03M) reports, "In recent weeks, Syrian President Bashar Assad has been peppering the international media with expressions of eagerness to talk peace with Israel." But "does he mean it? A succession of American politicians–Democratic Sens. John Kerry, Christopher Dodd, and Bill Nelson, as well as Republican Arlen Specter–have come away from recent meetings with Assad at least intrigued. Besides that, the bipartisan Iraq Study Group urged the Bush administration to try diplomatic means to persuade Syria to stop supporting Sunni insurgents in Iraq. None of this, however, appeals to President Bush, who considers Syria an auxiliary member of the 'axis of evil.' Or to" Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, "who insists that Assad validate any change of heart by first cutting off Iran and the terrorist groups like Hezbollah and Hamas."

Islamic Militants Flee From Last Somali Stronghold. The CBS Evening News (1/1, story 3, 0:20, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Tonight Islamic militants are on the run in Somalia after government and Ethiopian forces overran their last stronghold in Kismayo. Thousands of militants retreated to the rugged border with Kenya. Government offered the militants amnesty if they surrender." The Washington Post (1/2, A10, McCrummen, 690K) reports, "Ethiopian forces backing Somalia's weak transitional government" Monday were "chasing the remnants of the Islamic militia along the Indian Ocean coast toward the Kenyan border about 100 miles to the south." In the "final stage of a dramatic power shift," the Islamic fighters "abandoned their heaviest weapons early Monday morning" with Ethiopian and government troops "in hot pursuit of key leaders, including three suspects in the 1998 bombings of the US embassies in Kenya and Tanzania." With "the most hard-core militiamen headed their way," Kenyan authorities Monday "tightened security along their border with Somalia." Meanwhile, Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi called for "the quick deployment to Somalia of a peacekeeping force from the 53-country African Union" to replace the Ethiopian troops "who are guarding the vulnerable new government but are also causing tensions among Somalis who consider them invaders."

The New York Times (1/2, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports that after Somalia's Islamist forces abandoned their final outpost Monday, the transitional government "moved aggressively to assert control, setting a three-day deadline for all weapons to be turned in and calling for international peacekeeping troops to be sent immediately." However, "Clan leaders were skeptical about whether he would succeed, and many Somalis seemed dead set against it." But "whatever lies ahead, encouraging or ominous, most Somalis seemed to agree that after a week of fast-moving events, the rough outlines of a new reality were emerging. For the first time since the former dictator, Mohamed Siad Barre, fled the country in 1991…there is a credible government based in Mogadishu…with serious outside support and no organized military threat from within." Meanwhile, the Los Angeles Times (1/2, Sanders, 850K) reports that "for the Islamists left behind in Somalia's long-troubled capital, the ordeal is not over. While top Islamic officials escaped south toward Kenya last week, thousands of employees, fighters and other court supporters remain trapped in Mogadishu, struggling to comprehend the new reality. Once part of the city's new elite, many have gone into hiding, fearful about retribution or worried that enemies might finger them as Islamic court collaborators."

The Financial Times (1/2, England) notes that a US official said Washington was "encouraging the government to enter into dialogue with 'all Somali parties of goodwill,' including moderates within the Islamist alliance, and was pushing for the deployment of an African-led peacekeeping force."

Bulgaria, Romania Join European Union. The AP (1/2, Hadjiyska) reports Bulgaria and Romania joined the European Union Monday, bringing the bloc's membership to 27 nations. The two nations "officially joined the EU at midnight to joyous fireworks celebrations that drew tens of thousands of New Year's Eve revelers to the two capitals of Sofia and Bucharest." The New York Times (1/2, Bilefsky, 1.16M) says their membership helped "to end geographic divisions left over from the cold war and extending the borders of the now 27-member bloc eastward to the Black Sea."

Zapatero Urged To Crack Down On ETA After Bombing. The Financial Times (1/2, Mulligan, Burnett) reports Spanish Prime Minister José Luis Rodriguez Zapatero is "under intense pressure" to "crack down heavily on ETA following a car bomb attack that ended a nine-month ceasefire and wrecked his government's controversial efforts to broker peace" with the group. Mariano Rajoy, head of the opposition Popular Party, called on Zapatero to act with "prudence and a sense of realism."

Gazprom, Belarus Reach Deal, Averting Threat To European Gas Supplies. The Financial Times (1/2, Ostrovsky) reports Gazprom "struck a five-year deal to supply gas to Belarus just minutes before a New Year deadline, narrowly avoiding a gas price war that threatened to disrupt supplies to Europe." The agreement "averted a shut-down of gas supplies to Belarus scheduled for 10am on January 1. The new contract doubles the price of gas for Belarus this year and gives Gazprom a 50 per cent stake in the country's pipeline network." The agreement "will phase out a multi-billion dollar gas subsidy to Belarus, which had allowed Alexander Lukashenko, the country's authoritarian president, to subsidise living standards." The "price increase and exemption from export duties gives Belarus more favourable terms than those offered to other former Soviet republics."

The Washington Post (1/2, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports, "Belarus looked headed for a cold New Year's Day until the former Soviet republic's prime minister walked into the offices of Russia's natural gas monopoly, Gazprom, just before a midnight deadline and agreed to most of Gazprom's terms for continued supplies. 'There was a tense atmosphere among the Belarusan delegation since we have agreed to and signed a contract whose conditions for the delivery of gas are not at all favorable,' Belarusan Prime Minister Sergei Sidorsky said." The "terms are similar to what Gazprom has been extracting from other neighboring former Soviet republics, such as Ukraine and Georgia. The Russian energy giant wants higher prices for its natural gas, and it is using its leverage as sole or principal supplier to get a share of other countries' domestic pipeline networks and transit lines to the West."

The Wall Street Journal (1/2, A4, Cullison, 2.04M) says, "The last-minute deal that sharply raises the price of Russian natural gas to Belarus highlights the success of a Kremlin energy policy that the West has denounced as bordering on blackmail. By showing that it is willing to cut off countries that won't accept rate increases, Russia has ended an era of cheap energy supplies to former Soviet republics." Relations "between Moscow and Minsk lately have been strained: Though putative allies, each blames the other for failing to follow through on plans to unite the two countries. Moscow is ending duty-free oil shipments to Belarus, a move that is expected to cost more than $1 billion in profits to the country's refining industry."

Thailand PM Blames Bangkok Blasts On Local Politics Rather Than Muslim Insurgency. The Wall Street Journal (1/2, Hookway, A10, 2.04M) reports that Thailand's Prime Minster Surayud Chulanont said that the synchronized New Year's Eve bombings in Bangkok "might have been connected to the September ouster of his predecessor, telecommunications tycoon Thaksin Shinawatra, in a bloodless coup. 'From the evidence we have gathered, there is a slim chance that it is related to the southern insurgency,' Gen. Surayud told a news conference. 'It is likely related to people who lost their political benefits.' The nine bombs exploded Sunday as revelers prepared to ring in the new year. Bangkok's city leaders canceled the celebrations after the first wave of bombings in the early evening. In total, police say the explosions wounded 38 people, including nine foreign tourists. Nobody has claimed responsibility." The Journal notes the impact the bombings could have on the investment and tourism sectors, and notes that some analysts have made comparisons to similar bombings attributed to Islamic factions.

Zapatista Rebels Celebrate Insurgency's 13th Anniversary. The AP (1/1), in an article published on the website of the New York Times, reports, "Thousands of Zapatista rebels celebrated the 13th anniversary of their brief uprising against the Mexican government on Monday, dancing, singing and holding discussions on improving the status of poor Indians in the southern state of Chiapas." The AP notes that Zapatista leader Subcommander Marcos lead the festivities commemorating the group's seizure of "San Cristóbal de las Casas and other Chiapas communities in the name of socialism and Indian rights on Jan. 1, 1994. A cease-fire ended fighting between rebel and government forces after a few days, and the two sides have since maintained an uneasy truce. Marcos, a professor-turned-guerrilla, has continued to champion a quieter social revolution from the jungles of Chiapas, issuing missives harshly critical of Mexico's politicians and government policies."

Bush Urged To Aid Displaced Diego Garcia Natives. In a Washington Post op-ed, American University anthropologist David Vine writes about the US military's forcible relocation of the native population of "Diego Garcia, an obscure British island in the middle of the Indian Ocean," between 1968 and 1973 to make way for the US Navy base there. The native people, called Chagossians, "received virtually no resettlement assistance and found themselves homeless, jobless and with little money," upon their relocation to Mauritania. "In 1975 The Post broke the story of the expulsion, finding the people living in 'abject poverty' as a result of what The Post's editorial page called an 'act of mass kidnapping.' When a single day of congressional hearings followed, the U.S. government denied all responsibility for the islanders." Vine concludes, "the time has come for the story of the Chagossians and Diego Garcia to see the light of day, and for Congress and the Bush administration finally to accept and act on the responsibility of the United States for a people's ongoing plight."

NYTimes Calls On Wolfowitz To Embrace Openness. Under the headline, 'Mr. Wolfowitz And The Bank,' the New York Times (1/2, 1.16M) editorializes, "When Paul Wolfowitz speaks publicly these days, he is usually making good sense. The head of the World Bank (formerly No. 2 at the Pentagon) has criticized Chinese banks for ignoring environmental and human rights standards when they lend to Africa, told the White House it needs to do more to alleviate African poverty, and has vowed that corrupt officials won't be allowed to siphon off money from projects that are supposed to benefit the poor. So why do so many people at the bank mistrust him? … Some of his critics will never forgive him for championing the disastrous Iraq war. But he has compounded their suspicions, surrounding himself with a tight group of former Bush administration officials who — true to their roots — have little patience for explaining themselves and even less for criticism." The Times praises Wolfowitz's work on debt relief for impoverished nations and fighting corruption, but concludes by suggesting "a more inclusive management style and a more diplomatic inner circle, and to articulate broader goals beyond stopping corruption. That way he would have the credibility to fight the good fight."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Five Years And Counting In Cuba (USNEWS)

By Will Sullivan

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

Fawzi al-Odah was 25 and full of youthful confidence when he sent the first letter to his parents after being detained in Guantánamo Bay. "I will be established as innocent soon, and then I will return back to you," he insisted. But that was 2002, and this month al-Odah will celebrate his 30th birthday in Cuba.

On January 11, the U.S. naval base at Guantánamo Bay will mark five years since it opened its doors to some of the earliest government-designated "enemy combatants" in the war against terrorism. Since then, the facility has evolved from open-air cages into a complex rivaling any maximum-security prison. But despite two trips to the Supreme Court, questions about the rights and status of about 400 men held there are not much closer to being answered than they were when the first detainees arrived. And so the coming months will see renewed challenges to the facility in both the courts and the new Democratic Congress.

History. Many of Guantánamo Bay's legal ambiguities were supposed to have been resolved in September, when the White House and Congress haggled over legislation to address a Supreme Court ruling–a ruling that effectively tossed out the administration's previous plan to try some detainees in special military commissions. The result of that haggling was the Military Commissions Act, which specified the rules for the commissions, denied detainees the habeas corpus right to challenge their detentions in court, and defined acceptable interrogation methods.

President Bush signed the bill in October, and the administration hopes the legislation provides a constitutional framework for holding war crimes trials for the worst detainees–including 14 "high value" detainees whom Bush transferred to Guantánamo

Bay from previously secret CIA prisons. If convicted, those detainees could be held even after the war on terrorism was thought to have ended. The Pentagon is seeking congressional funds for a courtroom compound at Guantánamo, where the trials would take place.

But the government acknowledges that only about a fifth of the detainees at Guantánamo will face a military commission. Some will be released–hundreds already have been–as the government accelerates efforts to pare down the population to the most serious threats. But those decisions are made by the military, and the administration contends that anyone deemed an enemy combatant can be held until hostilities end, with no access to the courts to challenge their detention.

Critics say the framework is rife with problems. A central irony: Because the most dangerous detainees will go before military commissions, they will have more access to the legal system than those whose detentions are more dubious.

Things could change with a new Democratic Congress, especially through an effort in the Senate by incoming Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to restore habeas corpus rights to detainees. When GOP Sen. Arlen Specter offered a similar amendment to the Military Commissions Act last year, it fell just three votes short of adoption. A batch of new Democrats would seemingly give the bill strong odds of passing, but Congress might have a hard time mustering the votes to overcome a possible presidential veto.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Skill, Luck Credited For Terror-free Year (WT/AP)

By Paul Haven

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

MADRID -- Bombs left on commuter trains in a busy station in Germany, a plot to blow up tunnels and flood New York City's financial district, another to bring down packed commuter airliners flying out of London.

Islamic militants had no shortage of murderous ideas in 2006, but for the first time since the September 11, 2001, attacks, the year closed without a major attack in the West.

In a wide-ranging analysis, security and intelligence leaders around the world told the Associated Press that their success was a result of more than just luck.

Far greater human and technological resources, tougher counterterrorism laws, a deeper understanding of the homegrown nature of the threat and the hard lessons learned from past failures -- all these have all helped avert catastrophe, they said.

But they also cautioned against complacency, saying another attack is inevitable. A senior Spanish intelligence official who recently stepped down as head of a national counterterrorism unit warned that the absence of deadly attacks in 2006 does not mean the world should expect similar results in 2007.

Reinforcing the reality that high-casualty terrorism is still a threat, not only in the West, a bomb attack on trains in Bombay in July killed more than 200 people. India suspects Islamic organizations both at home and in neighboring Pakistan of being behind the bombings.

Muslim militants were not blamed for a Saturday car bombing at Madrid International Airport, which left 26 persons injured and two missing. The attack was thought to be the work of the Basque terrorist group ETA.

Anger among many Muslims is still high over the war in Iraq, the publication of cartoons of the prophet Muhammad, Israel's war against Hezbollah militants in Lebanon and remarks by Pope Benedict XVI that many Muslims considered insulting despite his explanation to the contrary.

"The fact that these threats have not materialized [in 2006] is not for a lack of trying by terror organizations," the Spanish official said. "It is because the counterterrorism fight in Europe and North America has been effective in detecting these aspiring terror groups early," before they could strike.

In Britain, an official familiar with the country's anti-terror policies said the July 7, 2005, bombings of London subways and a bus were a wake-up call, and that intelligence and security protections put in place since those attacks had helped thwart several new plots, including a foiled August scheme to target U.S.-bound jetliners with liquid explosives.

While authorities have said little about how they stopped the carnage, they have acknowledged that some of the suspects were under surveillance for months, both in Britain and Pakistan.

"The extra resources we've devoted since the 7/7 attacks have helped us stop plans that had been in the works for years," said the government official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity owing to the sensitive nature of his work. "Our database is growing. We have more people on the ground. We are a lot more aware now."

MI5, the British domestic spy agency, has added hundreds of staff members in recent years, and Government Communications Headquarters, once home to World War II code breakers, has doubled its corps of analysts to 5,000 -- becoming Britain's largest intelligence agency.

Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller, the head of MI5, has said her agency had foiled five major plots since the 2005 bombings, and that her agents were tracking almost 30 terrorist plots involving 1,600 suspects.

Magnus Ranstorp, a terrorism expert at the Swedish National Defense College, said the absence of attacks on European soil in 2006 reflects a better understanding of how the terror networks operate -- and a little bit of luck.

"Authorities have started to organize much, much better now, and that is starting to show results," Mr. Ranstorp said. "We have much better insight into the networks now, because we have focused our resources on the right problems. I think the security agencies have this under better control than you might think, and know the lay of the land rather well."

Analysts and intelligence officials say the nature of the threat has changed dramatically since September 11, 2001, with concern largely focused on homegrown groups driven by local grievances, rather than professional terrorists trained by al Qaeda and with direct links to Osama bin Laden.

While these groups have the advantage of being small, they are often less sophisticated and easier to catch. Thousands of suspected radicals are under surveillance across Europe, making it harder for plots to emerge.

The closest call in 2006 may have come in Cologne, Germany, when two crude bombs on trains failed to detonate. The biggest threat was the London airliner plot. Lesser defined schemes against the Jewish Quarter in Prague, a church in Bologna, Italy, and the Milan, Italy, subway also failed.

In the United States and Canada, authorities uncovered plots -- some seemingly little more than fantasies -- to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago, flood Lower Manhattan by blowing up tunnels under the Hudson River, and attack public buildings in Ontario.

Authorities in Morocco arrested at least 56 persons, among them soldiers, police and the wives of Royal Air Maroc pilots, over a purported plot to blow up foreign targets. Indonesia, one of the countries most frequently hit by Islamic radicals, enjoyed its first attack-free year since 1999.

Homeland Security: A Tighter Border Plan? (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, January 8, 2007

For more than 15 years, British and most other Western European visitors have been allowed to stay in the United States for up to three months without needing to apply for visas. But Homeland Security officials are now accelerating efforts to tighten entry controls on people from these and other friendly countries, including Australia and Japan, NEWSWEEK has learned. The move follows revelations that European-born Muslims—particularly disgruntled young Brits—have been visiting Pakistan to attend terrorist training camps. One proposal under consideration: requiring visitors who don't now need advanced visas to submit electronic visa applications to U.S. authorities via the Internet at the time they purchase their tickets.

Today, airlines flying to America from overseas must send copies of passenger lists to U.S. authorities as flights depart; officials in Washington then check passenger names against data banks prior to landing. But if foreign fliers have to fill out an Internet questionnaire when they book tickets, American agencies would have more time and raw information about U.S.-bound travelers. A Homeland Security spokesman said visa application data could also be entered into U.S. government data banks, though he said it was "too early" to discuss how long the information would be stored or who'd have access to it. The spokesman, Jarrod Agen, said that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has discussed proposed rule changes with congressional leaders but that no formal plan has been sent to Capitol Hill yet.

Travel To Canada, Mexico Is About To Change With New Passport Rules (USAT)

By Roger Yu

USA Today, January 2, 2007

Five years after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, the U.S. government is on the verge of implementing security-inspired changes to passports that will affect millions of international travelers.

On Jan. 23, air travelers to and from Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean will for the first time need a passport to cross the U.S. border. Starting in the spring, all U.S citizens applying for a passport will get an electronic version that's embedded with a "smart" chip designed to thwart forgery.

The new regulations represent the most significant changes in border control in years, as federal officials try to bring the process of checking identification into the digital age.

Many people heading to Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean now travel with just a driver's license for identification. Under the new rule, U.S. citizens traveling by air need a passport. Though a driver's license will no longer suffice, the government does leave some wiggle room. The Nexus Air card, issued under a USA-Canada cooperative program to prescreened travelers, is acceptable. The passport rule will apply to land and sea travelers no later than June 1, 2009.

For Americans who don't want to pay $97 for a passport, the State Department also plans by the end of 2007 to introduce a "passport card" that would work like a passport. The card, which costs $20 for adults, is good only for those traveling by land or sea to Canada, Mexico and the Caribbean.

The State Department issued 16 million passports in 2006, vs. 12 million in 2005, with the increase largely the result of the new rule. It's now issuing the "e-passport" in some areas of the country. Conversion from the old passport will be complete this spring.

The new passport looks like the traditional type, but its smart chip stores the traveler's photo and personal information. If the chip is broken or malfunctions, the holder can continue to use the document as a non-electronic passport or buy a new one. Traditional passports will remain valid until they expire.

Critics say that transmitting information wirelessly can compromise security, and important data could fall into the wrong hands. With proper equipment, someone could remotely intercept personal data, a practice called "skimming."

Ann Barrett, a top passport official at the State Department, says the department has responded by adding metallic anti-skimming material to the passport's cover. Other protections include encrypting the information.

Marc Rotenberg of the Electronic Privacy Information Center says the State Department should be given credit for responding to privacy concerns. But he says it still needs to add safeguards to the passport card.

Caleb Tiller, a spokesman for the National Business Travel Association, says the organization is satisfied with the changes. "The thing we were concerned about was balancing security and allowing free commerce and business travel," Tiller says. "As far as we can tell, they're striking that balance."

People applying for passports at the federal agencies in Denver, Boston, Washington and Miami now get the new e-passport. Those applying at 13 other agencies may still receive the traditional passport until this spring, when agencies will start issuing only the e-passport.

TSA Nears Decision On Contract For Government ID Cards (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Competition is heating up among contractors to supply the government with identity technology as one agency prepares to award a major contract and another readies a request for bids.

The field of competitors to provide a new identification card for transportation workers has been narrowing, and the Transportation Security Administration indicated last week that an award would be made early this year. The winner would be responsible for screening the backgrounds of about 750,000 workers at airports, seaports and other critical transportation facilities, and issuing them ID cards equipped with microchips.

DOJ_NMG_0110801

"We are in the final stages of review of the contract, and we will be issuing an award in the coming weeks," said Darrin Kayser, a spokesman for the TSA.

The program, one among several that are designed to update the government's identification standards in a bid to enhance security, has met with repeated delays. President Bush signed legislation mandating the new cards in 2002, and the Homeland Security Department initially said it would begin issuing them by the end of 2003.

Among the companies involved in competing for the work as either prime contractors or subcontractors are BearingPoint of McLean, Lockheed Martin of Bethesda and Maximus of Reston.

The General Services Administration, meanwhile, plans by Jan. 12 to issue a call for bids on work supplying identification cards to federal employees and contractors.

The new contract replaces a $104 million deal the GSA had with BearingPoint but pulled out of in November. At the time, GSA officials said that the decision, just two months into the contract, was unrelated to BearingPoint's performance but that the agency wanted to reopen the bidding to give the government more options and better prices.

Government agencies are up against a 2008 deadline to distribute new, standardized identification cards to about 8 million employees and contractors. Agencies can either choose the GSA's contractors or use their own program. BearingPoint had been developing cards for 38 agencies.

Bidding on the GSA contract is open to companies on a list of approved firms, known as a schedule. As of last week, the schedule included the names of 18 contractors. Washington area firms dominate the list.

Computer Sciences of El Segundo, Calif., is not on the GSA's list yet. Tim Ruggles, director of the firm's border and immigration center, said the company is hoping to join soon with a system it has developed using off-the-shelf technology that verifies identity using both biometric information, such as fingerprints and iris scans, and biographic information, such as addresses and age.

Computer Sciences is among the firms competing to produce the transportation worker credential, and it plans to vie for the GSA's business as well.

"It's a big opportunity," Ruggles said.

Closing The Door At The Ports (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, January 8, 2007

ELIZABETH, N.J.–It didn't take too long after September 11 for Chief Kevin McCabe, the official overseeing screening in the sprawling Port of New York/New Jersey complex here, to realize that his job was about to become a lot more stressful. Within months, he was handed an intelligence tip that a container on the way to the port held a so-called dirty bomb made with radioactive material. On the day it arrived, McCabe's team isolated it from 8,000 other container boxes, fed it through a radiation detection machine and an X-ray imager, and then punched holes in its roof to sample the air inside. "It was full of colorful Arabian carpets," McCabe says today, "and that was it." Still, he says officials were "only minutes away" from shutting down the massive port complex.

McCabe's job isn't getting any easier. Nothing's happened yet, but many security analysts believe the smuggling of a nuclear weapon into the United States through a seaport is a very real possibility. The country's 361 commercial ports, meanwhile, have gotten so little funding in the past five years that experts routinely call them the "soft underbelly" of America. In recent months, a flare-up of public indignation over foreign ownership of U.S. port terminals has sparked some major improvements, but further progress is by no means assured, and a host of vulnerabilities remain. With 95 percent of America's imports arriving by sea, there's a lot at stake. "Bomb a seaport," says Joe Curto, an executive vice president of the Maher Terminals here, "and you'll feel it in Iowa supermarkets two days later."

Searching. By any measure, the security challenge is daunting. About 11 million containers arrive by sea each year; U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials closely inspect fewer than 10 percent of them. There have been improvements, though. Prior to 9/11, McCabe says, "every single port was on its own" trying to decide which containers to scrutinize most thoroughly. Customs has since created an automated targeting program that checks the manifests of shipments headed to the United States for anomalies that tag them as "high risk." The Department of Homeland Security has also scooped up 305 radiation monitors once used to detect contaminated scrap metal; today they scan about 83 percent of cargo after it arrives. On a recent morning in Elizabeth, trucks loaded with fresh containers waited in line to exit Maher Terminals. "The only way to drive out," Curto says, "is through those [machines]."

But "we're still pretty far from where we need to be," says Stephen Flynn, a port security expert with the Council on Foreign Relations. One reason: Major security initiatives are still in their infancy. A trusted-shipper program–in which companies boost security in exchange for less customs scrutiny–runs basically on the honor system. Overworked customs inspectors haven't visited about a third of the companies enjoying benefits, and Flynn says many inspectors "aren't exactly experts" in securing the dense network of factories, distribution centers, and couriers that can handle shipments. Staffing crunches have also undermined a separate program that places U.S. Customs officials in 48 foreign ports like Shanghai. A 2005 government study found that 28 percent of containers deemed risky enough for foreign inspections weren't even touched.

But there's been a surge of activity on the port security front since February, when public anxiety was stoked by a proposed $6.8 billion business deal that would have given a firm run by the government of the United Arab Emirates leases to operate terminals in six U.S. ports. The company later agreed to sell the U.S. assets, and American International Group said recently that it had reached a deal to buy them. But the controversy "breathed new life into port security ideas that had seemed dead as a doornail" for months, says a Capitol Hill staffer.

Reform. In September, Congress passed the SAFE Ports Act, which mandates that DHS provide the 22 largest U.S. seaports with enough radiation detectors to scan all containers by 2008. The bill also eases the customs staffing crunch by using contractors to review trusted shippers. "We're also finally giving the ports the money they so desperately need," says Sen. Susan Collins of Maine, a lead SAFE Ports author. The bill requires DHS to hand out $400 million in port grants in each of the next five fiscal years. Seaports have gotten about $800 million total since 9/11 despite U.S. Coast Guard estimates that $5.4 billion is needed just for basics like security cameras and protective fencing.

Most experts cite SAFE Ports as the most substantial piece of maritime legislation in years. But a new Congress will have its own ideas. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi has boasted that she has "even tougher proposals" than the 9/11 commission on port security and plans to push a measure early next year to "screen 100 percent of [maritime] containers long before they reach U.S. shores." Critics say such plans could cost billions. And since current scanning protocols, requiring both radiation and X-ray screening, can take up to 20 minutes per container, pursuing the initiative now could "create massive backlogs," Collins says. The SAFE Ports Act takes a different approach: It requires DHS to try 100 percent inspection in at least three foreign ports next year to learn more. DHS Chief Michael Chertoff said last month that he would launch trial runs in six countries, including Pakistan and Oman. The earliest tests begin in February.

Another issue that could resurface in the new Congress: what to do about America's 750,000 workers who require access to secured areas of U.S. ports. South Carolina Sen. Jim DeMint pushed this fall to have SAFE Ports ban a wide array of felons-including those guilty of rape, kidnapping, and robbery-from working in U.S. ports for seven years after their convictions. The final bill bars only those convicted of treason, espionage, sedition, or acts of terrorism. DeMint says that leaves open the possibility of bribery and smuggling "in a place with a lot of money flowing around, like seaports." A DHS study of New York and New Jersey suggested nearly half of the 9,000 truckers with access to the ports may have criminal records. So implementation of DeMint's proposed standard, almost identical to requirements for aviation screeners, "could be chaos for us," says Curto.

DHS is also running into major snags on an effort to install $1.15 billion worth of more modern, reliable radiation monitors at U.S. ports by 2011. Chertoff said this summer that DHS had "begun to order the first 80" machines and looked forward to "starting to deploy" equipment this autumn. U.S. News has learned, however, that while the machines are out in the field, they've yet to be turned on.

Many say DHS has been slowed by critical reports from the Government Accountability Office. Auditors blasted DHS in October for not including the results of some 7,000 tests on the new monitors in a cost-benefit analysis sent to Congress justifying their purchase. Several tests, according to GAO, found that the most reliable model of the machines now being deployed could detect disguised, highly enriched uranium only 53 percent of the time.

Still, Vayl Oxford, DHS nuclear detection czar, stands by his work. "We tested [monitors] against some scenarios where we didn't expect them to find anything," he says. The department has obligated only $50 million of the $1.15 billion contract so far, and what Oxford calls "more definitive testing"-in concert with tweaking the machines-will be performed in the next few months. "We're on track," he says. "And I think this country will be a lot better off."

They certainly hope so in the Port Newark portion of the complex. On a recent afternoon there, it was clear why new machines, which are supposed to be able to distinguish between harmful and innocuous radiation, are so desperately needed. In a single hour, a row of 10 current-generation monitors was tripped by two shipments of granite from Italy, another one from India, and traces of radiation left over in one trucker's bloodstream from a heart stress test he took two weeks before. The newer machines are expected to save U.S. Customs 2.2 million work-hours each year by eliminating secondary inspections that must be done with unreliable hand-held nuclear detectors. Still, "I'm confident if a radiological device got in this place," McCabe says, "we'd find it." That's a lot of confidence for a man on the hot seat.

WAR NEWS:

Calibrating A Troop 'Surge' (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

WASHINGTON -- For the Bush administration, deploying tens of thousands of additional troops to Iraq may not be as tough a call as deciding when to bring them home.

White House officials say a troop "surge" almost certainly will be the centerpiece of Mr. Bush's new strategy for Iraq to be unveiled mid-month. But while administration officials have gone to great lengths to emphasize that the extra troops will be in Iraq only temporarily, there is no clear definition of how long that might be.

Several Democratic and Republican lawmakers who endorsed the increase say they want the extra troops in Iraq for just three to six months. Senior military commanders believe the extra forces can be sustained in Iraq for only six to 12 months before logistical and manpower strains become untenable. Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, has told associates that 12 months is needed to ensure a substantive effect.

Echoing Gen. Schoomaker's concerns that Iraq's militias would simply wait out a three- or six-month surge and then resume their violence, a report by military historian Frederick Kagan argues that the troops should be in Iraq for at least 18 months. The U.S. has about 140,000 troops in Iraq, and the additional forces could total as many as 20,000.

The debate over how long the new forces should remain in Iraq stems from tension between the political and military aspects of the emerging proposal. Mr. Bush has staked his presidency on Iraq, and several White House aides say they believe he would be inclined to leave the extra troops there until improvement is evident. Senior commanders, by contrast, have expressed concern that leaving extra troops too long risks lasting damage to the U.S. armed forces.

Inside the White House, officials are weighing an array of questions about the increase, with a particular focus on how to integrate Iraqi security forces into any expanded U.S. operations in troubled areas such as Baghdad.

"There might be a need for an Iraqi surge alongside an American one," National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley says in an interview, cautioning that the administration hasn't yet decided to send new U.S. troops to Iraq. "We're still working on the mix of options."

The administration's high-level deliberations about the size and duration of any potential surge have taken on added significance because both opponents and supporters of the war agree that U.S. influence in Iraq is rapidly diminishing. As Iraq confronts a civil war and a faltering political process, adding more U.S. forces could well be the administration's final real opportunity to stabilize the country.

"If we surge and it doesn't work, it's hard to imagine what we do after that," Mr. Kagan says. "But we're already in a very bad spot, and if we don't do anything defeat is imminent."

Still, the military's concerns run deep.

DOJ_NMG_0110804

The long wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have already forced the Army to play a shell game with troops and equipment. To ensure that units in Iraq are fully staffed and equipped, the service has had to pull leadership and weaponry from returning units and rush them to units preparing to deploy. While that has put units heading to Iraq generally in good shape, it has left large Army brigades back home in disarray.

The shortages of leaders and equipment mean that the more troops the Army sends to Iraq now, the fewer that will be available late this year or early in 2008 when the extra troops have to start returning home.

"The Army says it can surge for somewhere on the order of a year," says Daniel Goure, a defense analyst at the Lexington Institute who has been briefed by senior Army officials on the service's strains. "But if that happens a year from now it won't be able to sustain even the current troop levels of 140,000."

If violence worsens over the next year, military commanders could face the task of stabilizing a chaotic country with far fewer troops than they have had during the past 3½ years of the conflict. To mitigate this risk, Gen. Schoomaker has insisted that with a surge the Army must be given more latitude to call up reservists for duty in Iraq.

Under current Pentagon rules, reservists can be called up only for 24 months of cumulative service in Iraq and Afghanistan. Since 2001 the Pentagon has burned through the vast majority of those part-time soldiers. Gen. Schoomaker wants to be able to call up reservists for a second 12-month tour.

Even with wider access to the reserves, Army officials have said there will be a drop in the number of troops available for Iraq duty in late 2007 and 2008. Many reserve units, which typically leave their equipment in Iraq for those who are arriving, are in an even worse state than the active forces. Some National Guard units have only about 40% of their equipment, senior Army officials say. They estimate it could take as much as $35 billion in additional spending over the next three years just to get those units back up to speed.

Army officials also worry that if conditions in Iraq don't improve, they will face political pressure to keep the additional troops in the country longer than a standard one-year deployment. That could damage morale and make it far tougher to retain and recruit troops. Already, the service missed its recruiting goals in 2005 and hit its numbers in 2006 only by lowering standards. To meet its retention goals, it shelled out more than $500 million in additional bonuses.

Army officials have warned that an exodus of experienced sergeants and officers, already weary from multiple deployments, could break the force. Gen. Richard Cody, the Army's vice chief of staff, has said the prospect of such an exodus is what "keeps him up at night."

Rising Opposition To US Troop Increase (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

George W. Bush is facing mounting opposition to plans to reinforce America's military presence in Iraq, as he prepares to unveil his administration's new strategy for dealing with a conflict that has now claimed the lives of 3,000 US soldiers.

The US president is expected to announce a "new way forward in Iraq" sometime before his annual State of the Union address to Congress in late January.

According to a spate of leaks to the US media, Mr Bush is looking at a proposal to increase the number of US troops by between 20,000 and 30,000 as a short-term boost to the existing 140,000 level, with the aim of stabilising the violence in Baghdad and surrounding provinces.

But criticism of the planned "surge" in US forces is growing from within his own party as the death toll of US troops in Iraq rises. The figure last month passed the toll from the September 11 attacks and at the weekend independent groups confirmed the death of the 3,000th US soldier in the country.

In the past two days, a number of prominent Republican senators, including Arlen Specter and Richard Lugar, the outgoing chairmen of the Senate judiciary and foreign relations committees, have voiced strong scepticism about an increase in troops.

Although Mr Bush could expect the support of John McCain, the 2008 presidential hopeful, and Lindsey Graham, another Republican senator, the Republican tide appears to be moving against boosting troop levels. A number of Republicans have pointed out that Nuri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, is also opposed to a beefed-up US military presence.

Mr Bush is also likely to face implacable opposition to any increase in US troop levels from the Democratic party, which controls both houses of the new US Congress that commences on Thursday.

Meanwhile, the Bush administration faces the likelihood of tough senate hearings throughout January that Joseph Biden, the new Democratic chairman of the foreign relations committee, plans to hold from next week.

Democratic leaders have also hinted that they could use their control over the budget process to make life difficult for the Bush administration if it chooses to step up the US military presence in Iraq. This would require higher funding than the estimated $110bn (€83bn, £56bn) the war will have cost in the fiscal year ending in April.

Mr Bush is also expected to push for more funding to expand the overstretched US army, which senior generals have warned is close to breaking point. However, any permanent increase in size would take years to come on stream.

Lugar: Bush, Congress Should Discuss War (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 1, 2007

Two prominent Senate Republicans bucked the White House on Sunday, expressing skepticism about more U.S. troops in Iraq and support for greater dialogue with Iran, Syria and others in the region.

Sen. Richard Lugar, the outgoing chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, urged the president to consult with lawmakers before announcing a new strategy on Iraq that could call for additional troops in Iraq.

If Bush were to act with without involving the new Democratic-controlled Congress, he can anticipate "a lot of hearings, a lot of study, a lot of criticism," Lugar said.

Bush is expected to deliver his Iraq policy speech — laying out his plan to improve security, assist the Iraqis in reaching a political reconciliation between warring sects and help with reconstruction — before his State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Sen. Arlen Specter, just back from a trip to the region, also questioned the wisdom of sending in more troops, saying he has not seen an administration plan that would justify it. "If there is a road map to victory, then I would be prepared to listen to what the president has to say about more troops," he said.

The Pennsylvania Republican described the situation in the Mideast as the most serious he has seen in his 26 years in the Senate.

Specter expressed support for the Iraq Study Group's recommendations that the U.S. engage Syria, Iran and others in negotiations on Iraq's future.

Lugar suggested his committee, which Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., will lead beginning in January, hold a "retreat" to discuss Iraq, even before Bush's expected upcoming address to the nation.

Lugar said the U.S. should not rule out conversations with Iran and Syria, as well as Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey, regarding the instability in the region.

The Indiana senator appeared frustrated that the president has not done more to consult Congress on Iraq policy.

"In the past, the administration has been inclined not to disregard Congress, but to not take Congress very seriously," he said.

When asked whether he would support Bush's plan for a "surge" of more troops into the country, Lugar said "I don't know whether I do or not."

He said the U.S. should have a clear policy on what those troops are required to do. "The administration needs to identify precisely where the battle lines are - who is it we combat. I haven't seen such lines," Lugar said.

Lugar also questioned whether a move to train Iraqis might "lead to Iraqis who are better prepared for civil war against each other."

He said if Bush reaches out to Congress about his plans, hearings before the committee could become "well-informed, sophisticated situations" rather than a "lynching party."

In a partisan flip, Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Democrat turned independent, said he supports an expected recommendation by the White House for more troops in Iraq and argued against dialogue with Syria.

DOJ_NMG_0110806

When asked if he could support sending another "20,000 to 30,000" troops, Lieberman said, "I can and I hope it's exactly what President Bush does."

Specter recently visited Syria and spoke with President Bashar Assad, despite admonitions from the White House against the trip.

Specter said Assad told him that he was "prepared to work with the United States on tightening the border to impede insurgents" and also that Syria would be willing to host an "international conference" in an attempt to bring peace to the region.

"I respect what the administration is doing, but there are others of us who have been in the region who have studied it intently and have some useful suggestions to make," Specter said.

Lieberman accused Syria of allowing al-Qaida to cross its borders and kill American troops and of having a hand in recent assassinations in Lebanon.

Meantime, two Democratic presidential hopefuls affirmed their opposition to additional U.S. troops in Iraq.

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack said the U.S. should not make a "big mistake even bigger by suggesting a surge of troops in some way, shape or form is going to make Iraq safer or better."

Former North Carolina senator John Edwards, described the troop-increase idea as the "McCain doctrine" — after a chief advocate, Sen. John McCain — and said he believes the Arizona Republican is "dead wrong."

Lugar and Vilsack were on "Fox News Sunday," Edwards appeared on ABC's "This Week" while Lieberman and Specter spoke on "Late Edition" on CNN.

A 'Surge' Faces Trouble In The Senate (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

Sen. John McCain, leading a blue-ribbon congressional delegation to Baghdad before Christmas, collected evidence that a "surge" of more U.S. troops is needed in Iraq. But not all his colleagues who accompanied him were convinced. What's more, he will find himself among a dwindling minority inside the Senate Republican caucus when Congress reconvenes this week.

President Bush and McCain, the front-runner for the party's 2008 presidential nomination, will have trouble finding support from more than 12 of the 49 Republican senators when pressing for a surge of 30,000 troops. "It's Alice in Wonderland," Sen. Chuck Hagel, second-ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, told me in describing the proposal. "I'm absolutely opposed to sending any more troops to Iraq. It is folly."

What to do about Iraq poses not only a national policy crisis but profound political problems for the Republican Party. Disenchantment with George W. Bush within the GOP runs deep. Republican leaders around the country, anticipating that the 2006 election disaster would prompt an orderly disengagement from Iraq, are shocked that the president now appears ready to add troops.

The recent McCain congressional delegation was composed of sophisticated lawmakers who have made many previous visits to Iraq. They do not minimize the severity of sectarian civil war. They left their meeting with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki doubting any "sense of urgency" after advising him that he must disarm the militias. They recognize that the national police, corrupt and riddled with radicals, constitutes an unmitigated disaster.

McCain has long called for more troops in Iraq. He was supported within the delegation by his ally Sen. Lindsey Graham (S.C.) and by Sen. Joseph Lieberman, the only Democrat on the delegation (though he now calls himself an "Independent Democrat" after losing the Democratic nomination in Connecticut and being elected with Republican votes). But Sen. John Thune (S.D.) calls his support for the surge "conditional." Sen. Susan Collins (Maine) returned from Baghdad opposing more troops. Rep. Mark Kirk of Illinois, the only House member on the trip, is described as skeptical.

How big and how long should a surge be? The 7,000 or 8,000 troops that were first mentioned now have grown to at least 30,000. Congressional advocates talk privately about an infusion of manpower ending about halfway through this year. But retired general Jack Keane, who has become a leading advocate of additional troops, wrote in The Post last week: "Increasing troop levels in Baghdad for three to six months would virtually ensure defeat."

I checked with prominent Republicans around the country and found them confused and disturbed about the surge. They incorrectly assumed that the presence of Republican stalwart James Baker as co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group meant it was Bush-inspired (when it really was a bipartisan creation of Congress). Why, they ask, is the president casting aside the commission's recommendations and calling for more troops?

Even in Mississippi, the reddest of red states, where Bush's approval rating has just inched above 50 percent, Republicans see no public support for more troops. What is happening inside the president's party is reflected by defection from support for his war policy after November's election by two Republican senators who face an uphill race for reelection in 2008: Gordon Smith of Oregon and Norm Coleman of Minnesota. Coleman announced his opposition to the idea after returning from a trip to Iraq that preceded McCain's.

Among Democrats, Lieberman stands alone. Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden, as Foreign Relations Committee chairman, will lead the rest of the Democrats not only to oppose a surge but to block it. Bush enters a new world of a Democratic majority where he must share the stage.

Just as the president is ready to address the nation on Iraq, Biden next week begins three weeks of hearings on the war. On the committee, Biden and Democrats Christopher Dodd (Conn.), John Kerry (Mass.), Russell Feingold (Wis.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) will compete for intensity in criticizing a troop surge. But on the Republican side of the committee, no less probing scrutiny of Bush's proposals will come from Chuck Hagel.

Chaos Overran Iraq Plan In '06, Bush Team Says (NYT)

By David E. Sanger, Michael R. Gordon And John F. Burns

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

This article is by David E. Sanger, Michael R. Gordon and John F. Burns.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 31 — President Bush began 2006 assuring the country that he had a "strategy for victory in Iraq." He ended the year closeted with his war cabinet on his ranch trying to devise a new strategy, because the existing one had collapsed.

The original plan, championed by Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top commander in Baghdad, and backed by Donald H. Rumsfeld, then the defense secretary, called for turning over responsibility for security to the Iraqis, shrinking the number of American bases and beginning the gradual withdrawal of American troops. But the plan collided with Iraq's ferocious unraveling, which took most of Mr. Bush's war council by surprise.

In interviews in Washington and Baghdad, senior officials said the White House, the Pentagon and the State Department had also failed to take seriously warnings, including some from its own ambassador in Baghdad, that sectarian violence could rip the country apart and turn Mr. Bush's promise to "clear, hold and build" Iraqi neighborhoods and towns into an empty slogan.

This left the president and his advisers constantly lagging a step or two behind events on the ground.

"We could not clear and hold," Stephen J. Hadley, the president's national security adviser, acknowledged in a recent interview, in a frank admission of how American strategy had crumbled. "Iraqi forces were not able to hold neighborhoods, and the effort to build did not show up. The sectarian violence continued to mount, so we did not make the progress on security we had hoped. We did not bring the moderate Sunnis off the fence, as we had hoped. The Shia lost patience, and began to see the militias as their protectors."

Over the past 12 months, as optimism collided with reality, Mr. Bush increasingly found himself uneasy with General Casey's strategy. And now, as the image of Saddam Hussein at the gallows recedes, Mr. Bush seems all but certain not only to reverse the strategy that General Casey championed, but also to accelerate the general's departure from Iraq, according to senior military officials.

General Casey repeatedly argued that his plan offered the best prospect for reducing the perception that the United States remained an occupier — and it was a path he thought matched Mr. Bush's wishes. Earlier in the year, it had.

But as Baghdad spun further out of control, some of the president's advisers now say, Mr. Bush grew concerned that General Casey, among others, had become more fixated on withdrawal than victory.

Now, having ousted Mr. Rumsfeld, Mr. Bush sees a chance to bring in a new commander as he announces a new strategy, senior military officials say. General Casey was scheduled to shift out of Iraq in the summer. But now it appears that it may happen in February or March.

By mid-September, Mr. Bush was disappointed with the results in Iraq and signed off on a complete review of Iraq strategy — a review centered in Washington, not in Baghdad. Whatever form the new strategy takes, it seems almost certain to include a "surge" in forces, something that General Casey insisted earlier this year he did not need and which might even be counterproductive.

In a telephone interview on Friday, General Casey continued to caution against a lengthy expansion in the American military role. "The longer we in the U.S. forces continue to bear the main burden of Iraq's security, it lengthens the time that the government of Iraq has to take the hard decisions about reconciliation and dealing with the militias," he said. "And the other thing is that they can continue to blame us for all of Iraq's problems, which are at base their problems."

Yet if Mr. Bush does send in more American forces, historians may well ask why it took him so long. Some Bush officials argue that the administration erred by refusing to send in a bigger force in 2003, or by sufficiently bolstering it when the insurgency began to take hold.

This year, decisions on a new strategy were clearly slowed by political calculations. Many of Mr. Bush's advisers say their timetable for completing an Iraq review had been based in part on a judgment that for Mr. Bush to have voiced doubts about his strategy before the midterm elections in November would have been politically catastrophic.

Mr. Bush came to worry that it was not just his critics and Democrats in Congress who were looking for what he dismissed last month as a strategy of "graceful exit." Visiting the Pentagon a few weeks ago for a classified briefing on Iraq with his generals, Mr. Bush made it clear that he was not interested in any ideas that would simply allow American forces to stabilize the violence. Gen. James T. Conway, the Marine commandant, later told marines about the president's message.

"What I want to hear from you is how we're going to win," he quoted the president as warning his commanders, "not how we're going to leave."

Sectarian Killings Escalate

When 2006 began, the United States military did not have a systematic means of tabulating sectarian attacks in Iraq. The Sunni-led insurgency was the focus of Mr. Bush's statements, and its destruction the focus of American military strategy.

The Bush administration was jolted on Feb. 22 when Al Qaeda blew up the Askariya Mosque in Samarra, a carefully plotted effort to fan sectarian passions, prompt Shiite retaliation and make Iraq ungovernable.

The day of the explosion, Shiites in Sadr City poured into the streets carrying banners and flags. Men, some dressed in black, the traditional dress for the Shiite militia in the area, piled into open back trucks, carrying weapons and shouting slogans of loyalty to Shiite saints. In Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq, went to Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to insist that the Iraqi government impose a 24-hour nationwide curfew. Mr. Jaafari, a member of the Shiite Dawa Party, was not persuaded.

"You've been here six months, and all of a sudden you know my country better than I do," Mr. Jaafari replied, according to an official who witnessed the exchange. But even some Iraqi leaders, including the current national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, echoed Mr. Khalilzad's advice. "I remember saying to him: 'this is going to be the trigger of an all-out civil war,' " Mr. Rubaie said.

Mr. Jaafari insisted that he had a plan, which involved closing the Sunni television stations in the country, though as the violence grew he belatedly imposed a curfew that evening. It was the beginning of a debilitating pattern. The Shiite-dominated government did too little to protect Sunni citizens. Shiite militias took matters into their own hands. And the American military struggled to hold the city together with overstretched units.

It was clear that the retaliation was highly organized. Sunnis in the eastern portion of Baghdad, in an area called Rusafa, reported that Shiites in SUV's were pulling up, knocking on doors, and seeking specific people. Bodies surfaced in sewers and garbage heaps days later.

When the killing abated, President Bush and his top aides declared that the worst had passed. Both Sunnis and Shiites had "looked into the abyss and did not like what they saw," the president said.

Renegade militias were a concern but "not a major long-term problem as long as the Iraqi armed forces and the Iraqi police continue to be loyal to the central government, as they have been," Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a March 5 appearance on the NBC News program "Meet the Press."

Sectarian-inspired executions, however, rose from almost 200 in January to more than 700 in March, and continued upward, according to the Pentagon.

Even as the violence grew, General Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, appeared confident. He had served as a senior aide for the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon, where he gained the confidence of Mr. Rumsfeld before being sent to Baghdad in 2004. At 58, the four-star general reported directly to the defense secretary.

Mr. Rumsfeld had mused publicly that history showed that it could take a decade or so to defeat an insurgency. He was eager to turn over responsibility for the war to the Iraqis and to reduce the American footprint in Iraq as quickly as possible.

General Casey and Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the United States Central Command, appeared to be like-minded. During the summer of 2005, General Casey had forecast "fairly significant reductions" in American troops by the summer of 2006, an assessment that the commander said reflected "feelers" from Sunni insurgents that they might be willing to negotiate and lay down their arms.

Some of General Casey's aides have said that in developing troop withdrawal plans they were cognizant that the Bush administration had not taken any steps to expand the American military presence despite a persistent insurgency, and seemed to have little appetite for substantially expanding the war effort.

No Wish to Stay Indefinitely

For his part, General Casey said that his plan was aimed at showing Iraqis that the United States did not want to perpetuate its role as an occupier indefinitely, and stressed that he was following a strategy to match the "convoluted" political and military situation in Iraq, and not seeking to advance his career with plans that suited the Bush administration's political agenda.

"I have worked very hard to ask for what I need, for what I thought I needed to accomplish the mission," he said Friday. "It's always been my view that a heavy and sustained American military presence was not going to solve the problems in Iraq over the long term."

By late 2005, the White House accepted the main tenets of the hand-over strategy. "Casey and Abizaid had what seemed like a plausible plan at the time," Mr. Hadley recalled. "It was well thought out, and after the elections in January looked like the direction we were headed in."

President Bush promoted the strategy in a speech to cheering midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md., on Nov. 30, 2005: "We will continue to shift from providing security and conducting operations against the enemy nationwide to conducting more specialized operations targeted at the most dangerous terrorists. We will increasingly move out of Iraqi cities, reduce the number of bases from which we operate, and conduct fewer patrols and convoys."

Yet not everybody at the Pentagon shared General's Casey's confidence. The Defense Intelligence Agency had briefed the White House in early 2006 that the insurgency was winning in Iraq, according to a former military officer. The briefing, which chronicled the steady rise in the number of attacks, prompted a counter-briefing from General Casey's intelligence chief, who prepared an analysis tracing the positive trends in Iraq.

Data gathered by General Casey's own command, which showed a steady increase in weekly attacks and civilian casualties, lent support to the Defense Intelligence Agency assessment.

At the State Department, skepticism about General Casey's strategy ran deep. Philip D. Zelikow, the counselor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice until he resigned in December, went to Iraq in late 2005, and returned with a recommendation that the first part of 2006 be devoted to a big push — military, economic and political — to boost the soon-to-be-formed Iraqi government. His approach contradicted the commitment to reductions.

Still, the general was reluctant to abandon his basic strategy. According to a senior administration official, General Casey told the White House in April, May and June of 2006 that the American military was having success against Al Qaeda of Mesopotamia and the Sunni-based insurgency, and that sectarian violence could be managed.

Calls for a Review of Strategy

DOJ_NMG_0110810

By May 2006, uneasy officials at the State Department and the National Security Council argued for a review of Iraq strategy. A meeting was convened at Camp David to consider those approaches, according to participants in the session, but Mr. Bush left early for a secret visit to Baghdad, where he reviewed the war plans with General Casey and Mr. Maliki, and met with the American pilot whose plane's missiles killed Iraq's Al Qaeda leader, Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. He returned to Washington in a buoyant mood.

The visit meant that the reconsideration of strategy was not as thorough as some officials hoped.

Later in June, General Casey flew to Washington to give briefings on the latest version of his troop reduction plan at the Pentagon and White House. The number of American combat brigades, which then totaled 14, would be reduced by two in September and might shrink to 10 by December, if conditions allowed. If the Iraqis continued to assume more responsibility for their security, there would be only five or six combat brigades in Iraq by December 2007.

Yet already President Bush was signaling to top aides that he wanted to re-evaluate how to keep stability before proceeding with troop withdrawals. His caution matched a growing unease among American field commanders in Iraq, and officers on the streets of Baghdad, who said they were surprised by General Casey's continued advocacy of withdrawals and consolidating bases. They said that American forces should be focusing on a greater counterinsurgency effort, which would require that a substantial number of troops be dispersed to protect that population against insurgent and militia attacks.

Events overtook the White House. In early August, the United States was forced to reverse course and add troops in Baghdad. On reflection, Mr. Hadley said, "Finally the patience of the Shia had worn thin," and, "By the time the unity government took over the cycle of sectarian violence had begun. And they and we have not been able to get ahead of it."

The administration's summer strategy seemed simple: American and Iraqi forces would clear selected neighborhoods of insurgents and militia leaders, hold them with the Iraqi police, and win over the population with job-creating reconstruction programs.

But carrying out the strategy proved maddeningly difficult. The American troop commitment was modest at best. With the addition of roughly 7,000 troops the American military force assigned to carry out the operation in Baghdad was brought to some 15,000. (During one discussion of the operation in August, President Bush asked General Casey whether he had sufficient troops to secure Baghdad; the general assured him that he did.)

The Iraqis never delivered four of the six Iraqi Army battalions that they had committed to the effort. Some of the Iraqi police units proved to be so infiltrated by Shiite militias that they had to be pulled off duty for retraining.

Weaknesses in the Iraqi Forces

In the Sunni stronghold of Dora, in southwestern Baghdad, American troops were forced to clear thousands of homes twice: the Iraqi security forces who moved in behind them were too few, and too little dedicated to the task, to keep the insurgents from returning.

In neighborhoods like Baya, the Shiite-dominated Iraqi National Police set up menacing checkpoints on the routes Sunnis used to seek medical attention or buy fuel.

"They were trying to dominate the Sunni population and terrorize them to the point that they would leave Baghdad or leave the neighborhood," recalled Lt. Col. James Danna, who had led the Second Battalion, Sixth Infantry Regiment, which oversaw those areas. He said that like the first Baghdad security operation, the second also failed. As the American elections approached, White House officials say, they believed it would amount to political suicide to announce a broad reassessment of Iraq strategy. But they recognized that unless they began such a review, they would be forced to accept the conclusions of the final report of the Iraq Study Group — headed by James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, the former Democratic congressman.

The effort started in September, around the time Mr. Bush decided to oust Mr. Rumsfeld. In the days before the election, Mr. Bush suggested during an interview that Mr. Rumsfeld could stay until the end of his term — a deliberately misleading statement that Mr. Bush said later was necessitated by the political season. Similarly, it was days after the election that the White House revealed that a major Iraq review was under way.

In public, Mr. Bush continues to insist that he and Mr. Maliki share the same vision. In private, one of his former aides said, "he questions whether Maliki has the will or the power" to make good on any commitments.

DOJ_NMG_0110811

American military officers have also wondered if the Shiite-dominated Iraqi government and the Americans share the same vision. Were the Iraqis not pulling their weight because they did not have the capability to provide security and proceed with reconstruction? Or did the Iraqi authorities have a sectarian agenda?

As security efforts in Baghdad faltered, a confidential briefing on possible "end states" in Iraq was prepared by officials under the command of Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarielli, who until a few weeks ago led the day-to-day operations in Iraq. It suggested the dark vision of a divided nation that haunts the administration.

Unless the United States persuaded the Iraqi government to change course, those who prepared the briefing foresaw an Iraq run by a relatively weak central government, which would include a largely autonomous nine-province Shiite region in the south and a Shiite-dominated Baghdad. The Kurds would retain their autonomy in the north. The Sunnis would essentially be relegated to the western Anbar Province and other enclaves.

The briefing posed a question: was this an outcome the United States could live with? If so, what could the United States do to minimize the bloodshed? If not, what should be done to alter this course?

Mr. Bush still insists on talking about victory, even if his own advisers differ about how to define it. "It's a word the American people understand," he told members of the Iraq Study Group who came to see him at the White House in November, according to two commission members who attended. "And if I start to change it, it will look like I'm beginning to change my policy."

Bush Mulls Plan As U.S. Toll Hits 3,000 (AP)

By Pauline Jelinek, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 1, 2007

American deaths in the Iraq war reached the sobering milestone of 3,000 on Sunday even as the Bush administration sought to overhaul its strategy for an unpopular conflict that shows little sign of abating.

The latest death came during one of the most violent periods during which the Pentagon says hate and revenge killings between Iraq's sects are now a bigger security problem than ever.

The death of a Texas soldier, announced Sunday by the Pentagon, raised the number of U.S. military deaths in Iraq to at least 3,000, according to an Associated Press count, since the war began in March 2003.

President Bush is struggling to salvage a military campaign that, more than three-and-a-half years after U.S. forces overran the country, has scant support from the American public. In large part because of that discontent, voters gave Democrats control of the new Congress that convenes this week. Democrats have pledged to focus on the war and Bush's conduct of it.

Three thousand deaths are tiny compared with casualties in other protracted wars America has fought in the last century. There were 58,000 Americans killed in the Vietnam War, 36,000 in the Korean conflict, 405,000 in World War II and 116,000 in World War I, according to Defense Department figures.

Even so, the steadily mounting toll underscores the relentless violence that the massive U.S. investment in lives and money — surpassing $350 billion — has yet to tame, and may in fact still be getting worse.

A Pentagon report on Iraq said in December that the conflict now is more a struggle between Sunni and Shiite armed groups "fighting for religious, political and economic influence," with the insurgency and foreign terrorist campaigns "a backdrop."

From mid-August to mid-November, the weekly average number of attacks in the country increased 22 percent from the previous three months. The worst violence was in Baghdad and in the western province of Anbar, long the focus of activity by Sunni insurgents, said a December report.

Though U.S.-led coalition forces remained the target of the majority of attacks, the overwhelming majority of casualties were suffered by Iraqis, the report said.

The American death toll was at 1,000 in September of 2004 and 2,000 by October 2005.

Bush told an end-of-the-year press conference that the deaths distress him.

"The most painful aspect of the presidency is the fact that I know my decisions have caused young men and women to lose their lives," Bush said.

DOJ_NMG_0110812

Asked about the 3,000 figure, deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said Sunday that the president "will ensure their sacrifice was not made in vain."

"We will be fighting violent jihadists for peace and security of the civilized world for years to come. The brave men and women of the U.S. military are fighting extremists in order to stop them from attacking on our soil again," Stanzel said.

Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., called the figure a "tragic milestone" and said the government owes its troops "a new policy that is worthy of their heroism and brings them safely home."

In a statement Bush released Sunday to wish the troops and all Americans a happy new year, the president said the nation depends on the men and women in the armed services and are mindful of their dedication and sacrifice.

"Last year, America continued its mission to fight and win the war on terror and promote liberty as an alternative to tyranny and despair," Bush said in the statement released from his ranch in Crawford, Texas, where he and first lady Laura Bush are spending New Year's Eve with friends.

"In the New Year, we will remain on the offensive against the enemies of freedom, advance the security of our country, and work toward a free and unified Iraq," he said. "Defeating terrorists and extremists is the challenge of our time, and we will answer history's call with confidence and fight for liberty without wavering."

In an interview on Dec. 21 with The Associated Press, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the war was "worth the investment" in American lives and dollars.

In his strategy reassessment, Bush has consulted Iraqis, his uniformed and civilian advisers, an outside bipartisan panel that studied the failing war, and other defense and foreign policy experts. New Defense Secretary Robert Gates journeyed to Iraq in his first week on the job in December to confer with American commanders and Iraqi leaders.

Among the president's options was a proposal to quickly add thousands of U.S. troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq to try to control escalating violence in Baghdad and elsewhere.

Others believe too much blood and money already have been sacrificed. Democrats have wanted Bush to move toward a phased drawdown of forces, while the bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended removing most U.S. combat forces by early 2008 while shifting the U.S. role to advising and supporting Iraqi units.

Having launched the war against the advice of a number of nations, the Bush administration never got a huge international contribution of troops, meaning foreign forces helping the Iraqis are overwhelmingly American.

The death toll shows it. As of late December, the British military has reported 127 deaths in the war so far; Italy, 33; Ukraine, 18; Poland, 18; Bulgaria, 13; Spain, 11; and Denmark, six. Several other countries have had five or less.

U.S. Toll In Iraq Reaches 3,000 (WP)

By Nancy Trejos, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 1, 2007

Deaths in December Most in Two Years

BAGHDAD, Dec. 31 -- The number of U.S. service members killed in Iraq since the war began in 2003 reached 3,000 on Sunday, a symbolic milestone at a time when the Bush administration is rethinking its strategy for the increasingly violent conflict.

As the year drew to a close, the U.S. military announced that a soldier was killed Saturday by a roadside bomb while on patrol in a southeastern neighborhood of Baghdad. Two soldiers were injured in the attack. Their names were not released.

The Defense Department also announced that Spec. Dustin R. Donica, 22, of Spring, Tex., was killed by small-arms fire Thursday in Baghdad.

According to the Associated Press and the independent Web site iCasualties.org, both of which keep counts of war fatalities, the deaths raised the American toll to at least 3,000.

DOJ_NMG_0110813

Reaching that threshold has significance at a time when President Bush is considering a change in strategy that could include sending in more troops. The 140,000 U.S. troops currently in Iraq have not been able to reduce the daily violence caused by an aggressive insurgency in the western province of Anbar and an increasingly bitter sectarian conflict in Baghdad.

"What you see is the U.S. deeply involved in this fight against an insurrection and increasingly trying to bring order to a low-level civil war," Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst for the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said by telephone in Washington. "There's no way you can do that with 140,000 troops in a country of 27 million without having casualties."

He added: "This pace of casualties is likely to go on until we can change or find a new approach."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended that the focus of U.S. troops in Iraq be shifted from combat to training Iraqi soldiers and police officers, and that most combat brigades be withdrawn by early 2008.

The most recent deaths happened during a particularly costly month of the war. With 111 fatalities, according to iCasualties.org, December was not only the deadliest month of 2006 for U.S. troops, but the deadliest in two years.

Most of December's deaths occurred in Anbar province, and most were the result of improvised explosive devices, or IEDs, according to a Washington Post analysis of the data. But insurgents have found other ways to attack troops, among them sniper fire.

The number of service members who have been wounded has continued to climb as well. More than 22,000 troops have been injured so far, according to the latest Defense Department data.

A Pentagon report in December gave a grim assessment of the war, acknowledging that violence soared to its highest level this fall, with anti-U.S. fighters achieving "strategic success" by unleashing a spiral of sectarian killings by Sunni Arab and Shiite Muslim death squads. According to the report, the violence had reached record highs, with 959 attacks per week.

In the United States, public discontent over the war has grown, evidenced by the fact that voters gave Democrats control of the new Congress. Many media outlets and pundits have pointed out that the military death toll in Iraq now exceeds the number of people killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, which Bush has often cited as justification for the war.

White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said Bush "believes that every life is precious and grieves for each one that is lost."

"He will ensure their sacrifice was not made in vain," Stanzel said. "The war on terror will be a long struggle. We will be fighting violent jihadists for peace and security of the civilized world for years to come."

Military leaders played down the significance of reaching 3,000 deaths.

"We don't count that way, because each one is important to us," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad. "Number 2,999 means the same to us as number 3,000. It's an arbitrary number that doesn't mean anything to us."

The Defense Department count of Americans killed in Iraq stood at 2,986 as of Sunday, said a Pentagon spokesman, Lt. Col. Mark Ballesteros. The Pentagon's official count often lags because it does not include a fatality in its official tally until 24 hours after notifying next of kin. The U.S. military in Iraq issues news releases with names withheld before deaths are officially counted.

"Let's set aside discussion of numbers," Ballesteros said. "Every loss is regretted, each loss has a value, significance and importance unto itself, regardless of what number anyone would assign."

Each death, he said, "is felt individually by that person's family and friends. It's particularly difficult during the holidays."

Staff writers Michael Abramowitz in Crawford, Tex., and Elizabeth Williamson in Washington contributed to this report.

U.S. Announces Death Of 3,000th American Soldier (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, January 1, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Saddam Hussein, the deposed dictator hanged Saturday for the murder of 148 fellow citizens, was buried at sunrise in his hometown Sunday, not far from the graves of his two sons. Hours later, on the final day of 2006, the U.S. military announced the death of the 3,000th American soldier to die in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0110814

The death of Spc. Dustin Donica, 22, of Spring, Texas, by small arms fire Thursday in Baghdad, brought the December toll to 111, the deadliest month of the year for U.S. troops. Donica was assigned to a parachute infantry regiment at Fort Richardson, Alaska.

The milestone was reached at a time when President Bush is considering an overhaul of American policy in Iraq - a review that could result in tens of thousands more U.S. troops serving in this strife-torn country.

Bush spokesman Scott Stanzel said that the United States "will be fighting violent jihadists for peace and security of the civilized world for years to come." He said Bush would see to it that the sacrifice of U.S. troops "was not made in vain."

Saddam's burial in his hometown of al Awja, near the northern city of Tikrit, drew about 100 people for a dawn service. The flag draped over his body was that from his regime. The flag's inscribed words, "God is Great," were written in his own hand, not in formal script as it now appears on the official Iraqi flag.

Officials at the province, who took control of Saddam's body from the Iraqi government, said they were grateful the body was treated in an Islamic way. And, on a national television station, they thanked American officials for providing a helicopter to take the body to the burial site.

Meanwhile, on a quiet day marked by the observance of the religious festival of Eid, Iraqis were transfixed by a video that showed Saddam's final moments. Some said the video showed a composed Saddam killed by a Shiite government settling personal scores, not an example of justice; others said it was a fair end for a man who tortured and brutalized innocent Iraqis for more than two decades.

The latest video disputed some initial accounts of what happened in the seconds before execution. Captured on a cell phone camera, it appeared on several Web sites, and picked up where the government-released video released Saturday had cut off - after the tightening of the noose. Not every word spoken was audible.

Five executioners wearing black ski masks surrounded Saddam, who wore a long black coat. As they put the rope around his neck, Saddam called out, "O God."

After tightening the noose, men - both the executioners and witnesses - chanted part of a common Shiite Muslim saying, followed by Muqtada al-Sadr's name, the firebrand cleric who leads one of the most powerful militias in Iraq, the Mahdi Army.

"God's prayer upon the (Prophet) and his family ... May God bring closer his release (referring to the 12th Imam, who Shiites believe will appear again) and curse his enemy. Muqtada, Muqtada Muqtada!" the men chanted in unison, their voices more powerful with each passing word.

It appears more dialogue occurred here, but the words are not clear. Saddam is next heard saying: "Thank God. Is this manhood?"

Someone in the room snapped at Saddam: "Go to hell."

"The hell that is Iraq?" Saddam said.

Another voice then shouted the name Mohammed Bakir Sadr, a relative of Muqtada and the intellectual brains behind the Dawa Party, one of the fiercest Saddam opposition parties. Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki is a member of the party, and thousands of people were either exiled or killed for being suspected members.

Another man appealed for calm: "I beg you no. This man is being executed."

But the crowd became more emboldened. Saddam then began reciting one of the most important Islamic sayings, the Shadada, which Muslims say to prove their faith: "I testify there is no god but God and (Prophet) Muhammad is the messenger of God." As he repeated it, and reached the word "Muhammad," the shaft opened from under him. The picture goes dark, breaking only for flashes from cameras photographing Saddam dead, his eyes open, his body dangling.

The witnesses erupted.

"The tyrant has fallen," one man said as others debated how long Saddam should be kept on the rope.

The Iraqi Special Tribunal convicted Saddam and two co-defendants on Nov. 5, charging that they ordered the execution of 148 people after an unsuccessful assassination attempt against the dictator in Dujail in 1982. Last week an appeals court upheld the conviction; under Iraqi law, Saddam had to be executed within 30 days.

On Saleh al Din channel, based in Saddam's hometown province, music designated for mourning and recitations of the Koran played all day.

16,273 Deaths Reported In Iraq In 2006 (AP)

By Lauren Frayer

AP, January 2, 2007

As enraged crowds protested the hanging of Saddam Hussein across Iraq's Sunni heartland Monday, government officials reported that 16,273 Iraqi civilians, soldiers and police died violent deaths in 2006, a figure larger than an independent Associated Press count for the year by more than 2,500.

The tabulation by the Iraqi ministries of Health, Defense and Interior, showed that 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers were killed in the violence that raged in the country last year.

The Associated Press accounting, gleaned from daily news reports from Baghdad, arrived at a total of 13,738 deaths. The United Nations has said as many as 100 Iraqis die violently each day, which translates into 36,500 deaths annually.

In Samarra, a mob broke the locks off a bomb-damaged Shiite shrine and marched through carrying a mock coffin and photo of the dictator.

The demonstration in the Golden Dome, shattered in a bombing by Sunni extremists 10 months ago, suggests that many Sunni Arabs may now more actively support the small number of Sunni militants fighting the country's Shiite-dominated government. The Feb. 22 bombing of the shrine triggered the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiia, in the form of daily bombings, kidnappings and murders.

Monday's protest came on a day that saw the U.S. military kill six Iraqis during a raid on the offices of a prominent Sunni political figure, who was suspected of giving al-Qaida in Iraq fighters sanctuary.

Until Saddam's execution Saturday, most Sunnis sympathized with militants but avoided taking a direct role in the sectarian conflict — despite attacks by Shiite militia that have killed thousands of Sunnis or driven them from their homes. The current Sunni protests, which appear to be building, could signal a spreading militancy.

Sunnis were not only outraged by Saddam's hurried execution, just four days after an appeals court upheld his conviction and sentence. Many were also incensed by the unruly scene in the execution chamber, captured on video, in which Saddam was taunted with chants of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada."

The chants referred to Muqtada al-Sadr, a firebrand Shiite cleric who runs one of Iraq's most violent religious militias. He is a major power behind the government of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Many Sunnis are also upset that Saddam was put to death the day that Sunni celebrations began for Eid al-Adha, a major Muslim festival. The judge who first presided over the case that resulted in Saddam's death sentence said the former dictator's execution at the start of Eid was illegal according to Iraqi law, and contradicted Islamic custom.

The law states that "no verdict should implemented during the official holidays or religious festivals," said Judge Rizgar Mohammed Amin, a Kurd.

Rizgar presided over Saddam's trial on charges he killed 148 Shiite men and boys in Dujail, north of Baghdad, in a botched assassination attempt in 1982. The judge was removed from the case after Shiite complaints that he was too lenient.

In a Sunni neighborhood in northern Baghdad, hundreds of demonstrators mourned the executed leader. Some praised the Baath Party, the outlawed nationalist group that under Saddam cemented Sunni Arab dominance of Iraq.

"The Baath party and Baathists still exist in Iraq, and nobody can marginalize it," said Samir al-Obaidi, 48, who attended a Saddam memorial in the Azamiyah neighborhood.

In Dor, 77 miles north of Baghdad, hundreds more took to the streets to attend the dedication of a giant mosaic of Saddam. Children carried toy guns and men fired real weapons into the air.

Mourners at a mosque in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit slaughtered sheep as a sacrifice. The mosque's walls were lined with condolence cards from tribes in southern Iraq and Jordan who were unable to travel to the memorial.

Saddam's eldest daughter briefly attended a protest Monday in Jordan — her first public appearance since her father was hanged.

"God bless you, and I thank you for honoring Saddam, the martyr," said Raghad Saddam Hussein, according to two witnesses. She addressed members of the Professional Associations — an umbrella group of unions representing doctors, engineers and lawyers — in the group's office parking lot in west Amman.

In the midst of the protests, U.S. forces continued operations in Iraq.

Six Iraqis were killed in a U.S.-led raid on the Baghdad offices of a top Sunni politician, Saleh al-Mutlaq. The U.S. military and Iraqi police said they suspected the offices were being used as an al-Qaida safe house.

Al-Mutlaq is a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, which holds 11 of the 275 seats in Iraq's parliament.

U.S. forces said they took on heavy fire from automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades as they sought to enter the building. Ground troops were backed by helicopters that "engaged the enemy with precision point target machine gun fire," the military said.

It was unclear whether the deaths resulted from the ground assault or fire from U.S. helicopters.

Associated Press Television News footage showed masses of rubble in the area and what appeared to be a long smear of blood where a body had been dragged across the floor of one of the buildings.

Walls were pitted with what appeared to be bullet and shrapnel holes.

The U.S. death toll, meanwhile, climbed to at least 3,002 by the final day of 2006 as the American military reported the deaths of two more soldiers in an explosion Sunday in Diyala Province, northeast of the capital. With the announcement, the Associated Press count of fatalities showed that at least 113 U.S. service members died in December. That makes it bloodiest month of 2006.

Iraqi authorities Monday reported that 16,273 Iraqis — including 14,298 civilians, 1,348 police and 627 soldiers — died violent deaths in 2006. The total exceeds the Associated Press count by more than 2,500.

On the first day of the New Year, Iraqi Police reported finding the 40 handcuffed, blindfolded and bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad. A police official, who refused to be named out of security fears, said 15 of the bodies were discovered in the mainly industrial Sheik Omar district of northern Baghdad.

An Iraqi worker for the Algerian Embassy in Baghdad was shot to death, police said.

Also Monday, the Iraqi government raided and sealed the offices of a privately owned television station, charging it had incited violence and hatred in its programming. In its coverage of the execution of Saddam over the weekend, a newscaster had worn black mourning clothes.

The satellite television channel Al-Sharqiya, which broadcasts from Dubai, remained on the air late Monday. The station is owned by Saad al-Bazzaz, a one-time chief of radio and television for Saddam.

Under Fire (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, January 2, 2007

December drew to a close as the deadliest month in two years for American soldiers in Iraq. At his ranch in Crawford, Texas, President Bush gathered his national security team–including new Defense Secretary Bob Gates–to draw up what may well be a last-chance strategy to turn back the tide of chaos. It couldn't have lightened the mood any that morning to glance at the Washington Post's front page: "Ford Disagreed With Bush About Invading Iraq." Former President Gerald Ford, who died last week at age 93, criticized Bush's rationale for the war in a posthumously published July 2004 interview with the Post's Bob Woodward. Said Ford, "I don't think I would have gone to war."

For a current president who famously doesn't like to look back, Ford's delayed critique may mean little, but it raises the stakes a bit higher for Bush's effort to sell the American people on whatever he decides to do next in Iraq. With concern growing almost daily about U.S. soldiers and marines facing hostile fire and increasingly powerful roadside bombs, caught in the middle of what looks to many like an Iraqi civil war, Bush faces the most daunting challenge of his presidency. In urban Baghdad–not just in the insurgent badlands of Al Anbar province–some streets are so regularly booby-trapped with roadside bombs that they are treated as no-go zones for U.S. patrols.

After making it clear that he has his own no-go zones (namely, opening a dialogue with Iran and Syria and considering a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops), Bush is expected to release his new plan for Iraq within days. It will very likely include an economic package that will fund microloans for small businesses and jobs in neighborhoods that have been targeted by military strikes–elements of classic counterinsurgency strategy that weave economic and political incentives together with armed measures. But much of the chatter–and the real political stakes–surround a so-called surge of U.S. troops, enough to make the total force in Baghdad larger than at any time since the war began. That would, the thinking goes, improve security in the city of some 6 million and give the Iraqi government more time to take charge if it can. But it would be hard to pull off. "The big question," says one U.S. commander at Baghdad headquarters, "is what do they want us to do with these troops, exactly, that we're not doing already?"

Wordplay. In Washington, the word surge is increasingly accompanied by something akin to virtual quotation marks. It's more politically palatable than "escalation," with its echoes of Vietnam, and carries the implication of limited duration, or an ebb. But new troops will be on the ground for a while. In a widely circulated PowerPoint presentation, Frederick Kagan, a neoconservative military historian at the American Enterprise Institute, touts the benefits of a surge in a "plan for success," adding that a minimum of 30,000 troops should be sent to the country for "18 months or so." "That's not a surge," says one military official. "It's a troop increase, plain and simple."

'Surge' Strategy (NSWK)

By Michael Hastings, Michael Hirsh And Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 - He was caught just like a rat." Those were the simple, happy words of Ray Odierno three years ago, after units of his Fourth Infantry Division cornered Saddam Hussein in Tikrit. The hulking general went on to declare that the capture was a "major operational and psychological defeat" for the insurgents, who had been "brought to their knees." It was a heady moment, but as it turned out that's all it was—a moment. On Dec. 14, 2006, three years and a day after Saddam was hauled out of his hole, Lt. Gen. Odierno returned to take day-to-day command of Coalition forces in Iraq. His mood since then has been far more sober. "You now have different groups ... trying to vie for power within Iraq," Odierno told NEWSWEEK in an interview last week from his headquarters at Camp Victory near Baghdad. "That's what makes this extremely more complex than this has been in the past. It's not simply Sunni insurgents or Al Qaeda that we're fighting anymore—fighting is the wrong term—we're trying to influence [Iraqis] to operate within the confines of the government."

The words sound odd coming from a traditional Army warrior known for his kick-in-the-door tactics. But Odierno's transition from certainty to complexity—and from fighting to "influencing"—mirrors the journey made by the U.S. military as a whole. After weeks of intensive discussions, President George W. Bush is expected to announce his new Iraq strategy as early as next week. Most of the debate has centered on whether to "surge" 20,000 or more U.S. troops into the Baghdad area in an effort to succeed, at long last, in securing the Iraqi capital. The question is whether those forces are the right tool for the job at hand—can any number of U.S. troops stop what has become a Sunni-Shiite civil war?—not to mention whether they're even available.

Odierno knows very well that success requires more-subtle tactics than the ones he was once criticized for. An internal Army report in December 2003 concluded that Odierno's Fourth I.D. had indiscriminately rounded up so many military-age Iraqis that prisons like Abu Ghraib overflowed. Odierno rejects the accusation of overaggressiveness, calling it "anecdotal" and adding: "We executed more [reconstruction] projects than anyone else. All that has been forgotten." But he concedes that "a lot has changed since the last time I left" and that he's learned much about fighting an insurgency.

The White House insists it knows that simply adding more troops isn't the answer. The plan being considered is far more nuanced than what has been reported in the media, a senior aide to Bush, who would only discuss the talks in Crawford anonymously, told NEWSWEEK. He said it includes money for new jobs programs and reconstruction aid for Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki, as well as efforts to further shore up his political base. "We know the counterinsurgency plan is clear, hold and build," says the source. "We have to talk about surging troops and surging resources as being equally important."

Even so, the debate over tactics has intensified inside the Pentagon. Bush is now trying to sort through wildly conflicting advice. His Joint Chiefs of Staff supports the conclusions of the Iraq Study Group that, rather than sending in a new influx of U.S. troops, American advisory teams embedded with Iraqi forces should be quadrupled so Iraqis can take control more quickly. Some hawks, led by two outside advisers, former Army vice chief of staff Gen. Jack Keane and military historian Frederick Kagan, are instead urging Bush to "win the battle of Baghdad" himself. They say he can't wait for the Iraqi government, Army or police to secure the country.

U.S. Army officials fret they don't have the forces or equipment for the kind of long deployment (perhaps 18 months or more) that would be required. According to a former senior Army official who would describe the internal discussions only if he was not identified, "Keane told the president: 'Don't you dare let Army and Marine Corps tell you they can't do it.' Soon afterward, Gen. Richard Cody, the vice chief of staff of the Army, called Keane in and gave him the actual figures on readiness, telling him: 'Look, here's the status of these brigades today. It's not doable'." Keane did not respond to several calls asking for comment, but the senior White House aide denies that the Pentagon is resisting any surge plan. "The military leadership is committed to doing what is required to be successful," he says.

Kagan worries Bush will end up splitting the difference and decide on a smaller, short-term offensive. That, Kagan says, would be disastrous, repeating the failure of Operation Forward Together in Baghdad last summer and fall, which he blames on too few U.S. troops (about 8,000). By putting the onus for stabilizing Baghdad on U.S. forces again, a troop surge would also reverse the policy of the soon-to-depart overall commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, who is Odierno's boss. "This is the antithesis of the strategy Casey's been pursuing for two years, which is more and more Iraqi control," says Kagan. Maybe the only certainty any longer is that Odierno's new mission is sure to be a lot harder than finding Saddam Hussein.

Bush's Big Act: If He Bombs, Does the Fat Lady Sing?

Some senior Republicans are looking at the next four weeks as "make it or break it" time for the White House. In early January, the Democrats will take over Congress and signal how aggressively they will confront the administration on Iraq and a wide range of domestic issues. By mid-January, President Bush will have delivered his high-stakes speech setting forth "the way forward" in Iraq. Bush will then give his State of the Union address on January 23. "Anything the president wants to do in the last two years of his term will be contingent on the reaction to his new course in Iraq," says a senior GOP adviser. "If he bombs when he gives the Iraq speech, the fat lady sings." White House officials, however, argue that Democrats won't be able to escape responsibility for improving the situation in Iraq. "The Democrats are going to own this policy, too," a senior White House official says.

Like Bill Clinton, a Person of the People

Nancy Pelosi plans to celebrate becoming the first-ever female speaker of the House with an elaborate parade of events linking her heritage in blue-collar Baltimore and Italian-Catholic roots to her new and history-making post. As aides describe the run-up to her January 4 swearing-in, it will be similar to the weeklong trip former President Bill Clinton took to Washington. Pelosi's week will culminate with a concert and a "people's house" celebration, where plain folks can meet her and the rest of the new Democratic leadership in the Cannon House Office Building.

And So, Let the Investigations Begin

As a sign that the new Democratic majority plans to get tough, key congressional committees have begun hiring lawyer-investigators to probe the administration and its policies. The House Appropriations Committee, where Iraq war critic Rep. John Murtha will be influential, is hiring investigators to look into the administration's war policies and spending in Iraq and Afghanistan. Rep. Henry Waxman, the incoming chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, who's been dogging the vice president's energy task force, is also hiring lawyers. In the Senate, officials said similar hirings were underway in a speeded-up effort to have people in place for the start of the new Congress, especially the planned early-January hearings into the war and military spending that are set to begin January 8.

Better Be Ready to Take the Big Hit

Concerned about potential vulnerabilities to terrorist attacks, the incoming chairman of the House Science Committee, Rep. Bart Gordon of Tennessee, is pressing the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to require more stringent designs in any new nuclear reactors. The NRC, he notes in a letter, has not licensed a new plant since 1978, but it has approved a design for two new plants, while many other reactors are in planning stages. The NRC, responding, says its staff is developing new rules requiring companies "to assess specific security features that could be incorporated into the facility design ... to enhance security effectiveness." But one NRC commissioner, Gregory Jaczko, says that's not enough: The commission, he says, should require that "any new plants be designed and built to successfully withstand commercial aircraft crashes and large fires and explosions."

Angry Protests In Iraq Suggest Sunni Arab Shift To Militants (NYT)

The New York Times, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 1 (AP) — Enraged crowds protested the hanging of Saddam Hussein across Iraq's Sunni heartland on Monday, as a mob in Samarra broke the locks off a bomb-damaged Shiite shrine and marched through carrying a mock coffin and a photo of the executed dictator.

Skip to next paragraph

The Reach of War

Go to Complete Coverage » The demonstration at the Golden Dome shrine, shattered in a bombing by Sunni extremists 10 months ago, suggests that many Sunni Arabs may now more actively support the small number of Sunni militants fighting the country's Shiite-dominated government. The Feb. 22 bombing of the shrine set off the current cycle of retaliatory attacks between Sunnis and Shiites.

The Sunni protests, which appeared to be building, could signal a spreading militancy. Sunnis were outraged by Mr. Hussein's hurried hanging on Saturday, just four days after an appeals court upheld his conviction and sentence, and many were incensed by the unruly scene in the execution chamber, captured on a cellphone, in which Mr. Hussein was taunted with chants of "Moktada! Moktada! Moktada!" — the name of the Shiite cleric who runs one of Iraq's most violent militias.

Many Sunnis are also upset that Mr. Hussein was put to death during the Id al-Adha holiday.

In a Sunni neighborhood in northern Baghdad, hundreds of demonstrators mourned Mr. Hussein. Some praised the ousted Baath Party, which Mr. Hussein rode to power.

In Ad Dwar, about 80 miles north of Baghdad, hundreds more took to the streets to attend the dedication of a giant mosaic of Mr. Hussein. Children carried toy guns, and men fired weapons into the air.

Mourners at a mosque in Mr. Hussein's hometown, Tikrit, slaughtered sheep as a sacrifice for their former leader. The mosque's walls were lined with condolence cards from tribes in southern Iraq and Jordan who could not travel to the memorial.

Mr. Hussein's eldest daughter, Raghad, briefly attended a protest on Monday in Jordan, where she sought refuge after the American invasion in 2003. It was her first public appearance since her father was hanged.

"God bless you, and I thank you for honoring Saddam, the martyr," she said, according to two witnesses. She addressed members of the Professional Associations, an umbrella group of unions representing doctors, engineers and lawyers, in the group's office parking lot.

In the midst of the protests, American forces continued operations in Iraq. Six Iraqis were killed in an American-led raid on the Baghdad offices of a top Sunni politician, Saleh Mutlaq, a former member of the Baath Party. The United States military and Iraqi police said they suspected that the offices were being used as a safe house by Al Qaeda. Mr. Mutlaq is a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, which holds 11 of the 275 seats in Parliament.

American forces said they took heavy fire from automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades as they tried to enter the building. Ground troops were backed by helicopters that "engaged the enemy with precision-point target machine gun fire," the military said.

It was unclear whether the deaths resulted from the ground assault or fire from American helicopters.

Meanwhile, the American military reported the deaths of two more soldiers in an explosion on Sunday in Diyala Province, northeast of the capital, bringing the list of American military fatalities in Iraq to 3,002. With the announcement, The Associated Press count of fatalities showed that at least 113 American service members died in December, making it the bloodiest month of 2006.

Iraqi authorities reported that 16,273 Iraqis —among them 14,298 civilians, 1,348 policemen and 627 soldiers — died violent deaths in 2006. The total exceeds The A. P. count by more than 2,500.

The police reported finding the bodies of 40 handcuffed, blindfolded and bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad on Monday. A police official said 15 of the bodies were discovered in the mainly industrial Sheik Omar District of northern Baghdad.

An Iraqi worker for the Algerian Embassy in Baghdad was shot to death, the police said.

Also on Monday, the government raided and sealed the offices of a privately owned television station, charging that it had incited violence and hatred in its programming. In its coverage of the execution of Mr. Hussein over the weekend, a newscaster wore black mourning clothes.

Sunni Areas Erupt In Rage Over Saddam (WT/AP)

By Lauren Frayer, Associated Press

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD -- Rage over the hanging of Saddam Hussein spilled into the streets in many parts of the Sunni Muslim heartland yesterday, especially in Samarra, where a mob of protesters broke the locks of the badly damaged Shi'ite Golden Mosque and marched through carrying a mock coffin and photo of the executed former Iraqi dictator.

Sunni extremists had blown apart the glistening dome on the Shi'ite holy place 10 months earlier, setting in motion the sectarian slaughter that now grips the troubled land.

The U.S. death toll climbed to at least 3,002 by the final day of 2006 as the American military reported the deaths of two soldiers in an explosion Sunday in Diyala province, northeast of the capital.

The Samarra protest was particularly significant because it signaled a widening expression of defiance among Sunnis, the minority Muslim sect in Iraq that had enjoyed special status and power under Saddam and had oppressed the now-ascendant Shi'ite majority for centuries.

Until Saddam was executed, excluding a few days of protests after his death sentence was handed down Nov. 5, the broader Sunni population had sought a low profile in the sectarian conflict that had seen thousands of them killed or driven from their homes by Shi'ite militia forces since the Samarra bombing Feb. 22.

The Sunnis were angered not only by Saddam's hurried execution, just four days after an appeals court upheld his conviction and sentence, but also by the unruly and undignified manner in which the hanging was carried out.

A clandestine video of the hanging showed Saddam was taunted by some present at the execution with chants of "Muqtada, Muqtada, Muqtada" in the last moments of his life.

The chants were a reference to anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who runs one of the deadliest religious militias in Iraq and is a major power behind the government of Shi'ite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who had pushed for Saddam to be hanged before the year was out.

Iraq's government said yesterday that it would investigate the video and the taunts at the execution.

Saddam was put to death on the eve of the Shi'ite celebration of the Eid al-Adha, the major Muslim festival marking the end of the hajj pilgrimage to Mecca and a remembrance of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice his son, now symbolized by the slaughtering of sheep.

The first judge in the so-called Dujail trial, Rizgar Mohammed Amin, said Saddam's execution during Eid was illegal according to Iraqi law. Sunni Muslim festivities marking the holiday began on the day that Saddam was hanged.

Judge Amin, a Kurd, was removed as chief judge in the case after Shi'ite complaints that he was too lenient. He was replaced last January by Judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman.

Judge Amin said: "The implementation of Saddam's execution during Eid al-Adha is illegal according to Chapter 9 of the tribunal law. Article 27 states that nobody, even the president (Jalal Talabani), may change rulings by the tribunal and the implementation of the sentence should not happen until 30 days after publication that the appeals court has upheld the tribunal verdict.

"The hanging during the Eid al-Adha period [also] contradicts Iraqi and Islamic custom.

"Article 290 of the criminal code of 1971 states that no verdict should be implemented during the official holidays or religious festivals," he said.

Iraq's 1971 legal code was largely used in the Saddam trial.

"The Ba'ath Party and Ba'athists still exist in Iraq, and nobody can marginalize it," said Samir al-Obaidi, 48, who attended a Saddam memorial in the Azamiyah neighborhood.

In Dor, 77 miles north of Baghdad, hundreds more took to the streets to inaugurate a giant mosaic of Saddam. Children carried toy guns, and men fired into the air.

Mourners at a mosque in Tikrit, near Saddam's hometown, slaughtered sheep as a sacrifice for their former leader. The mosque's walls were lined with condolence cards from tribes in southern Iraq and Jordan who were unable to travel to the memorial.

Saddam's eldest daughter briefly attended a protest yesterday in Amman, Jordan -- her first public appearance since her father was hanged.

Raghad Saddam Hussein stopped in at the demonstration staged by the Professional Associations, a body that groups unions for doctors, engineers and lawyers, in its office parking lot in west Amman.

"God bless you, and I thank you for honoring Saddam, the martyr," two witnesses recalled Mrs. Hussein as telling the protesters, who included a junior Cabinet minister, on her arrival. She left a minute later.

Also, U.S. forces killed six persons in a raid on the Baghdad offices of a top Sunni politician, Saleh al-Mutlaq, on suspicion it was being used as an al Qaeda safe house, the military and Iraqi police said.

The U.S. military took on heavy fire from automatic weapons and rocket-propelled grenades as they sought to enter the building. Mr. al-Mutlaq is a senior member of the National Dialogue Front, which holds 11 of the 275 seats in Iraq's parliament.

Police reported finding 40 handcuffed, blindfolded and bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad on the first day of the new year.

Iraq To Probe Filming Of Saddam Hanging (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, January 2, 2007

The Iraqi government launched an inquiry on Monday into how guards filmed and taunted Saddam Hussein on the gallows, turning his execution into a televised spectacle that has inflamed sectarian anger.

Many in Iraq were transfixed by the footage, apparently shot on a videophone.

With Saddam executed, Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki now faces the job of trying to impose state authority upon a shattered society that is on the verge of sectarian civil war. The run-up to Mr Saddam's death illustrates how difficult that task will be.

As the noose was tightened around the deposed president's neck, several in the chamber began to chant a slogan affiliated with the radical Shia Sadrist movement, whose founder, the Ayatollah Mohammed Sadeq al-Sadr, was assassinated by presumed agents of Saddam in 1999.

Despite pleas from one unidentified voice in the room to allow Saddam a dignified end, the chanting of the name of the ayatollah's son and the movement's new leader built up to a crescendo – "Moqtada! Moqtada! Moqtada!"

The moment captured the extent to which the Shia radicals associated with the Sadrs have imposed their agenda on the Iraqi state and its institutions, and the magnitude of the task facing Nuri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, as he tries to impose his authority on a deeply fractured and radicalised country.

Further emphasising the splits within Iraqi society was the pilgrimage of hundreds of mourners to Saddam's tomb in the town of Awja, where he was born in 1937. Mr Maliki's government appears to have rejected initial plans to bury the former leader in an unmarked grave, and Saddam's body was flown to the town in a US helicopter.

Much of the confusion that reportedly surrounded Saddam's last hours is probably down to the uneasy relationship between Mr Maliki and the Sadrists, who are one of the key parties in his ruling coalition but whose militias are also blamed for a large share of the sectarian killing.

Saddam's swift execution has been a central demand of the Sadrist movement ever since his capture in December 2003. Rushing the former president to the gallows may have afforded the prime minister a rare opportunity to look decisive in front of his core constituency.

The Sadrists control 30 seats in the 275-member parliament, which makes them one of the three largest forces in Mr Maliki's Shia-led coalition but belies their true strength as what is almost certainly Iraq's largest mass movement.

Although Mr Maliki, a member of the Shia Islamist al-Dawa party, has received Sadrist support in the past, recently their relationship has been strained, with the radicals accusing Mr Maliki of bowing to US pressure to reach out to the Sunni. The Sadrists, who control three main ministries, announced last month they were boycotting Iraq's government in protest at Mr Maliki's decision to meet US President George W. Bush in Jordan.

The execution may allow Mr Maliki a window of political opportunity. For the Sadrists, as for many other Shia, Saddam's hanging represents a point of no return for the old Sunni-dominated political order, and evidence that his former ruling Ba'ath party, which has a strong role in the insurgency, can no longer dictate events.

Iraq will now see what Mr Maliki does with this opportunity. Mr Maliki has suggested he would attempt early in the new year to disarm Shia militias, of whom the Sadrists' Mahdi Army is by far the largest. The government has also said it would consider allowing members of the former ruling Ba'ath party, purged from public life in 2003, to be rehabilitated.

But Shia leaders have been under pressure from the US and others to reach out to the Sunni for well over a year, but have consistently put off key decisions. It is not yet clear whether the swift execution of Saddam has given Mr Maliki the political capital he needs to take steps that will almost certainly be criticised by the Sadrists, if he even wants to do so at all.

Era Ends As Saddam Hussein Is Put To Death (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, January 2, 2007

Saddam Hussein, the former Iraqi dictator who got his start in politics as an assassin and who never lost that brutal approach as he led Iraq for more than 30 years, was led to the gallows by a group of burly men in balaclavas and executed early Saturday morning.

Hussein was executed for the only crime for which he's been convicted: the 1982 murder of more than 200 people from the village of Dujail. Many Iraqis, though, particularly the Shiites and Kurds who lost hundreds of thousands to his bloody regime, saw his death as justice for the broader crimes of his rule.

Yet peace is unlikely to follow, analysts say. Hussein still has the power to arouse fierce passions among Iraqis. His death was cheered by millions of Iraqis, setting off wild celebrations in the Shiite quarters of Baghdad and other cities. Many Sunnis, however, saw it as a national humiliation - a proud Arab leader put to death at the hands of a government the United States helped to install - and were angered by the fact that the execution took place on Eid al-Adha, Islam's most important holiday.

Still, the demise of the man who led bloody wars against Iran and the United States, and whose police state was famously called the "republic of fear" by one dissident, may now be oddly irrelevant to Iraq's future, as the country's broad sectarian violence has moved far beyond camps of Hussein supporters and opponents.

While the US once believed Hussein's fall would help stabilize Iraq - his capture in a dim spider hole three years ago set off celebrations in US military command centers "akin to VE day," one US military intelligence officer recalls - that is no longer the case. What was once described as an insurgency largely made up of Baathist holdouts and some Sunni Islamist fighters, is now seen as a battle for power among Iraq's major sects.

President Bush reflected that view when he cautioned against too much optimism on Saturday.

"Bringing Saddam Hussein to justice will not end the violence in Iraq," Mr. Bush said in a statement. "But it is an important milestone on Iraq's course to becoming a democracy."

Since Hussein's capture and trial, tens of thousands of Iraqis have been killed in the deepening civil conflict, and sectarian militias have mushroomed throughout the country. Shiite death squads allied to some of Iraq's major political parties have been particularly active in Baghdad and Basra, the country's second largest city, and have used torture techniques to rival those of Hussein's feared secret police.

Last Monday, for instance, British forces raided and then destroyed the serious crimes unit in Basra, which they said was a base of operations for a Shiite militia. They found more than 100 prisoners there, many of whom had been tortured with electric shocks, burned with cigarettes, or shot in the knees.

Before Hussein's execution, US and Iraqi forces braced for a possible surge in violence. About 70 people were killed around Iraq following his death, most by two suicide car bombs, one in the Shiite town of Kufa, the other in Baghdad, a level of violence that has been fairly common in recent months.

The move to execute Hussein was swift. He was on trial facing charges of genocide against Iraq's Kurds, and at least four other trials were expected to follow. While US advisers to the court had said that they expected that the execution would be delayed to allow the justice process to go forward for his other crimes, Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Islamist whose popularity has flagged as Iraq's violence has deepened and unemployment has surged, grew determined to see Hussein killed without further delay.

Ahead of the execution, Mr. Maliki said the swift carrying out of the sentence underscored his government's commitment to protecting "human rights."

Michael Scharf, a legal scholar at Case Western University in Cleveland, Ohio, and expert in war-crimes tribunals who has provided legal advice to the judges who tried Hussein, former Yugoslav leader Slobodan Milosevic, and other dictators, says that he is "saddened" that Hussein won't face further charges.

But, he says, he understands why the Iraqi government made the decision. "In a way, it cheapens his crimes. It's like treating Saddam as if he were Al Capone. Crimes against humanity are a very serious charge, but there is a hierarchy of evil, and at the top of that pyramid is genocide."

Hussein's execution was held in a former torture facility of Hussein's in the Shiite neighborhood of Khadimiya, another piece of symbolism designed to appeal to Iraq's Shiite majority. State television showed the noose being put around Hussein's neck, and later displayed footage of his body. Celebratory gunfire - Iraqis call it "happy fire" - broke out, particularly in Sadr City, the stronghold of militant cleric and Shiite militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr, who US officers now say is among the greatest threats to peace and stability.

In a statement, Maliki said that the carrying out of Hussein's sentence provided a "lesson" to dictators around the world. He said it was wrong to view him as a Sunni Arab, or to blame Sunni Iraqis in general for Hussein's crimes.

"The tyrant represented nothing but his own evil soul," the statement reads.

Many observers note that Hussein's foreign wars, and the international sanctions that followed his 1991 attempt to annex Kuwait, drove the economy into the ground. But he is also remembered by many Iraqi Sunni Arabs and some Shiites as presiding over an unprecedented era of prosperity. He came to power amid the region's oil boom, and his Arab Socialist Republic, as he called it, poured much of that wealth into health and literacy programs that left the country with the best university system in the region and its largest middle class.

Hussein was also a popular figure in the broader Middle East, where state-controlled media almost never reported his crimes. Instead, he was seen as a rare Arab leader willing to stand up to the US, and who took a strong stand in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, giving thousands of dollars to the families of Palestinians killed in attacks on Israel.

Most Arab regimes, close to the US but mindful of the popularity of the ousted dictator among their people, have avoided comment on the execution so far, though Libyan dictator Muammar Qaddafi declared three days of national mourning. In contrast, Iran, which lost hundreds of thousands of its citizens in the war with Iraq in the 1980s, hailed the execution as an act of justice.

Few doubt that Hussein was responsible for mass murder and the routine torture of political opponents and even one-time friends - he ordered the executions of a number of the men who helped him seize power in 1968, his two sons-in-law, and was alleged to have personally murdered opponents in the Baath Party during his rise to power.

But the fairness of his trial was criticized by international human rights organization. Human Rights Watch charged in a report last month that his trial was "deeply flawed" and damaged the rule of law in Iraq. Among the group's concerns was the violence against the court - three defense lawyers were assassinated in the course of the trial -as well as what it alleged was government interference in the workings of the court, and "demonstrated bias" of the presiding judge, an ethnic Kurd who lost family members when Hussein's government attacked the Kurdish village of Halabja with sarin nerve gas.

Mr. Scharf disputed the criticisms of Human Rights Watch and others. He says that he would give the tribunal a "low passing grade" and agrees with Maliki that it does send a message to dictators.

DOJ_NMG_0110824

"We are really entering this new period where dictators can't count on a comfortable retirement," he says. "With [Chilean dictator Augusto] Pinochet dying under house arrest, Milosevic dying in custody, and now this. I tell the critics they should read the 298-page judgment against Saddam - the largest war-crimes judgment since Nuremberg - before going any further."

Scharf says that the government decided the cost of allowing Hussein to live to face further charges was greater than ending his life now. "Early on, there was a feeling that people would want him around to face justice in these other cases," he says, "but [their view is that] he's been not only a continuing disruptive influence in court but actually inciting violence outside of it."

Saddam's Execution Unlikely To Hurt Reconciliation (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD — The hasty execution of Saddam Hussein, which some Iraqis criticized for its sectarian overtones, will not hurt ongoing efforts to bridge ethnic rivalries and win backing for Iraq's fledgling government, political leaders said Monday.

Videos of the execution angered some Iraqis because guards were heard shouting Shiite slogans as Saddam was about to be hanged. Saddam was a Sunni Muslim.

"This government is on its way out," said Falah Hussein al-Ubeidi, 32, a Shiite government worker. "They have lost a lot among their voters. I now regret ever voting for those monsters."

Iraqi political leaders say the handling of Saturday's execution will not hurt reconciliation efforts aimed at getting Iraq's factions together to help curb violence and steer some militant groups into the political process.

The execution was widely viewed in the form of a government-released video and another clip taken by someone in the chamber with a cellphone.

During the execution, some of the guards chanted the name of Muqtada al-Sadr, an anti-American Shiite cleric whose militia is engaged in violence against Sunnis, the cellphone video showed. The guards also cursed Saddam just before he was hanged.

There were a number of Sunni protests around Iraq on Monday.

Sunni and Shiite leaders have been trying to keep the country from collapsing further into factional violence. Some say the reaction to Saddam's execution shouldn't hurt those efforts.

"Everybody — Sunni and Shiite — was against Saddam," said Ayad al-Samarrai, deputy chairman of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni group. "I don't think it will have an effect on the reconciliation process at all."

Saddam was sentenced to death Nov. 5 for his role in the killing of 148 Shiites in Dujail in 1982.

Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker and member of the national reconciliation committee, said the timing of the execution was poorly planned. It was held on the first day Sunni Arabs observe the Eid al-Adha holiday and just four days after the appeals section of the Iraqi High Tribunal confirmed Saddam's death sentence.

The execution also sidestepped an Iraqi law requiring the signatures of the president and two vice-presidents and another law prohibiting executions on holidays.

Othman said the outcome — Saddam put to death by hanging — was expected and won't stall reconciliation efforts.

"If this happened two years ago, even one year ago, it would be different," Othman said. "But now, with so much happening, it's just not that important."

Saddam, 69, was hanged just after 6 a.m. Saturday at the site of the deposed government's military intelligence headquarters in northwest Baghdad. His body was later flown to his home village of Ouja, north of Baghdad, in a U.S. military helicopter and buried by local tribesmen and relatives.

Al-Maliki pressed to quickly carry out the execution out of fear that pressure from the Sunni community, Arab countries and international groups would delay the execution or even force officials to commute the sentence, said lawmaker al-Askari, who witnessed the execution.

"They thought: 'The faster we could do it, the better,' " he said of the prime minister's office.

Reconciliation efforts have been slow, but progress has been made. Al-Maliki, a Shiite, recently promised to review the program that bars ranking members of Saddam's former ruling Baath Party from government positions.

A Dictator's Mideast Legacy (CSM)

By Nicholas Blanford

The Christian Science Monitor, January 2, 2007

BEIRUT, LEBANON

The execution of Saddam Hussein was a subdued finale for a man whose merciless rule shaped the course of Middle East history for a quarter century.

Mr. Hussein may be gone, but his legacy lives on in the ethnic and religious conflict undermining a nation that he held together through fear. His attacks on nearby countries - Iran, Kuwait, and Israel - won widespread condemnation and, ultimately, little reward.

While the architects of the Iraq war hoped his ouster would help spread Western-style democracy in the region, violence in Iraq has grown so bad that recent polls say most Iraqis believe life was better under Hussein.

It remains to be seen whether the lesson of his life will be the end of brutal dictatorships in the region or whether current unrest in Iraq will bolster Middle Eastern autocrats and increase resistance to democratic reforms.

"The downfall of Saddam and its aftershocks only empowered the regimes of the Middle East," says Sami Moubayed, a Syrian political analyst. "Leaders can now say 'Look to Iraq. This is what the Americans will bring.' By failing in Iraq, the Americans actually did democracy a great disservice."

While democracy may have yet to flower in the Arab world, the seeds have been sown, other analysts say, with the Hussein experience in Iraq serving as a stark warning of the consequences should the long-term reform effort falter or fail.

"I do believe that the Middle East is coming to a conclusion and learning from the Saddam lesson," says Shafeeq Ghabra, a Kuwaiti professor of politics and president of Jusoor Arabiya Leadership and Consultancy Company.

"Yet the learning is not as quick and fast as one would like. It will take time for the region to understand that era and go beyond it to an era of pluralism and development where people can express themselves without fear," he says.

Hussein's ambition and sense of self-destiny combined with impulsive and vengeful acts propelled Iraq into a series of disasters that has left an indelible mark on the region.

"He was a catalyst, he made things happen and usually they were not positive and constructive, but he constantly kept the Middle East in a state of turmoil," says Gary Sick, executive director of the GULF 2000 project and professor of international affairs at Columbia University in New York.

Hussein's rise to absolute power began in 1968 when he participated in a bloodless coup that saw his cousin Ahmad al-Hassan al-Bakr become president. In the 1970s, Hussein, who gradually came to overshadow the president, led an economic modernization program, funded by the proceeds of the 1973 oil boom.

He also helped forge a sense of national unity rooted in Baath Party ideology, overcoming Iraq's diverse ethnic and sectarian composition. "He was able to bring to Iraq a sense of development for a period.... Then it was all destroyed year after year with adventurous decisions," says Professor Ghabra.

Hussein pushed aside the ailing Bakr and became president in 1979, the same year that Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi was toppled in neighboring Iran by the Islamic revolution that brought Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini to power.

The rise of a militant Shiite theocracy in Iran alarmed the Sunni Arab states. Hussein, fearing Khomeini's influence over Iraq's restless Shiites and tacitly backed by his Sunni Gulf neighbors, invaded Iran in 1980, setting in motion a devastating eight-year war that cost hundreds of thousands of lives.

Hussein intended to smash the disorganized fledgling Islamic regime in Iran, an act that would confirm his leadership of the Arab world and earn the gratitude of his neighbors. But the war was to have the unintended consequence of strengthening Mr. Khomeini's rule.

"It forced the Islamic revolution to get out of its zealous craziness and begin to organize itself and pull itself together," says Professor Sick, an Iran specialist. "In a way, Saddam stabilized the Iranian revolution and kept the mullahs in power."

The conflict also triggered an alliance between Iran and Iraq's archenemy, Syria, which was ruled by a rival branch of the Baath Party. The Iranian-Syrian relationship has proved enduring, and in the past year has further strengthened to become one of the region's most significant geo-strategic alignments.

DOJ_NMG_0110826

When the Gulf War ended in 1988, the Iraqi economy was in ruins with some $75 billion owed to Iraq's Arab nation backers. Relations between Iraq and Kuwait steadily deteriorated over the next two years with the latter's refusal to forgive the war debt and cut oil production to raise revenues for Iraq.

A bitter Hussein sent his war-weary army into Kuwait in 1990, triggering a fresh convulsion in the Middle East. The US assembled a coalition of Arab and European allies to remove Iraqi forces from Kuwait. This Gulf war also marked the beginning of a prolonged US military deployment in Saudi Arabia, which would later be used by Osama bin Laden to partly justify his anti-American actions, culminating in 9/11.

The UN sanctions against Iraq during the 1990s, the most severe ever against any country, devastated an already weakened economy, but failed to bring down Hussein's regime.

Although the 2003 invasion of Iraq finally ended Hussein's tyrannical rule, its aftermath has turned Iraq into a byword of sectarian violence.

Although Hussein is dismissed by most Arabs as a tyrant who ran a regime of unmitigated brutality and greed, some regard him as a champion of Arab steadfastness against American "imperialism" and Israeli aggression.

The mock funerals in the West Bank Sunday testified to Hussein's lingering support among Palestinians. Hussein adopted the Palestinian cause as a cornerstone of his foreign policy, dispensing millions of dollars to armed Palestinian groups. Analysts say Hussein manipulated the plight of the Palestinians to curry popularity and burnish his Arabist credentials. "You can't judge the Palestinians by their reaction [to Hussein's death]," says Sateh Noureddine, columnist with Lebanon's As-Safir newspaper. "They are a desperate people looking for any sign of support from anyone. Saddam was a tyrant, and there was nothing positive from his era."

Saddam's Sensitive Side (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 2, 2007

ST. LOUIS (AP) -- A military nurse who cared for Saddam Hussein in jail said the deposed dictator saved bread crusts to feed birds and seldom complained to his captors, except when he had legitimate gripes.

Master Sgt. Robert Ellis cared for the former Iraqi dictator from January 2004 to August 2005 at Camp Cropper, the compound near Baghdad where "high-value detainees" were held.

Sgt. Ellis, 56, an operating room nurse in the St. Louis suburb of St. Charles, said he was ordered to do whatever was needed to keep Saddam alive.

"That was my job: to keep him alive and healthy, so they could kill him at a later date," he told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. Saddam was hanged Saturday.

Sgt. Ellis checked on Saddam twice a day and wrote a daily report on his physical and emotional condition.

Saddam told Sgt. Ellis that cigars and coffee kept his blood pressure down, and it seemed to work. Saddam would insist that Sgt. Ellis smoke with him.

Sgt. Ellis said Saddam did not complain much, and, when he did, his complaint was usually legitimate. "He had very good coping skills," Sgt. Ellis said.

Saddam shared with Sgt. Ellis memories of happier times when his children were young. Sgt. Ellis said the former dictator recalled telling the youngsters bedtime stories and giving his daughter half a Tums tablet when she had a stomachache.

When he was allowed short visits outside, Saddam would feed the birds bread crusts saved from his meals. He also watered a dusty plot of weeds.

"He said he was a farmer when he was young, and he never forgot where he came from," Sgt. Ellis said.

When Sgt. Ellis told Saddam that he had to leave for America because his brother was dying, Saddam hugged him and said he would be Sgt. Ellis' brother.

"I was there to help him, and he respected that," Sgt. Ellis said.

Saddam reportedly never discussed dying and expressed no regrets about his rule.

DOJ_NMG_0110827

"He said everything he did was for Iraq," Sgt. Ellis said. "One day when I went to see him, he asked why we invaded. Well, he made gestures like shooting a machine gun, and asked why soldiers came and shot up the place. He said the laws in Iraq were fair and the weapons inspectors didn't find anything.

"I said, 'That's politics. We soldiers don't get caught up in that sort of thing.' "

Vengeance Of The Victors (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - The saga of Saddam's end—his capture, trial and execution—is a sad metaphor for America's occupation of Iraq. What might have gone right went so wrong. It is worth remembering that Saddam Hussein was not your run-of-the-mill dictator. He created one of the most brutal, corrupt and violent regimes in modern history, something akin to Stalin's Soviet Union, Mao's China or Kim Jong Il's North Korea. Whatever the strategic wisdom for the United States, deposing him began as something unquestionably good for Iraq.

But soon the Bush administration dismissed the idea of trying Saddam under international law, or in a court with any broader legitimacy. This is the administration, after all, that could see little advantage to a United Nations mandate for its own invasion and occupation. It put Saddam's fate in the hands of the new Iraqi government, dominated by Shiite and Kurdish politicians who had been victims of his reign. As a result, Saddam's trial, which should have been the judgment of civilized society against a tyrant, is now seen by Iraq's Sunnis and much of the Arab world as a farce, reflecting only the victors' vengeance.

This was not inevitable. Most Iraqis were happy to see Saddam out of power. In the months after the American invasion, support for the Coalition Provisional Authority topped 70 percent. This was so even among Iraq's Sunni Arabs. In the first months of the insurgency, only 14 percent of them approved of attacks on U.S. troops. (That number today is 70 percent.) The rebellious area in those early months was not (Sunni) Fallujah but (Shiite) Najaf.

But during those crucial first months, Washington disbanded the Iraqi Army, fired 50,000 bureaucrats and shut down the government-owned enterprises that employed most Iraqis. In effect, the United States dismantled the Iraqi state, leaving a deep security vacuum, administrative chaos and soaring unemployment. That state was dominated by Iraq's Sunni elites, who read this not as just a regime change but a revolution in which they had become the new underclass. For them, the new Iraq looked like a new dictatorship.

Why Washington made such profound moves with such little forethought remains one of the many puzzles of the Bush administration's foreign policy. Some of the decision making was motivated by ideology: Baathism equaled fascism, so every school teacher who joined the Baath Party to get a job was seen as a closet Nazi; state-owned enterprises were bad, the new Iraq needed a flat tax, etc. Some of it was influenced by Shiite exiles who wanted to take total control of the new Iraq. Some of it simply reflected the bizarre combination of ignorance and naivete that has marked the policies of Bush's "tough guys."

The administration has never fully understood the sectarian nature of its policies, which were less "nation building" than they were "nation busting" in their effects. It kept insisting that it was building a national army and police force when it was blatantly obvious (even to columnists) that the forces were overwhelmingly Shiite and Kurdish, mostly drawn from militias with stronger loyalties to political parties than to the state. The answer to these fundamentally political objections was technocratic: more training. But a stronger Shiite Army made—makes—the Sunni populace more insecure and willing to support the insurgency.

Iraq's Sunnis are not the good guys in this story. They have mostly behaved like self-defeating thugs. The minority of Sunnis who support Al Qaeda have been truly barbarous. The point, however, is not their vices but our stupidity. We summarily deposed not just Saddam Hussein but a centuries-old ruling elite and then were stunned that they reacted poorly. In contrast, on coming into power in South Africa, Nelson Mandela did not fire a single white bureaucrat or soldier—and not because he thought that they had been kind to his people. He correctly saw the strategy as the way to prevent an Afrikaner rebellion.

It has now become fashionable among Washington neoconservatives to blame the Iraqis for everything that has happened to their country. "We have given the Iraqis a republic and they do not appear able to keep it," laments Charles Krauthammer. Others invoke anthropologists to explain the terrible dysfunctions of Iraqi culture. There may be some truth to all these claims—

DOJ_NMG_0110828

Iraq is a tough place—but the Bush administration is not quite so blameless. It thoughtlessly engineered a political and social revolution as intense as the French or Iranian one and then seemed surprised that Iraq could not digest it happily, peaceably and quickly. We did not give them a republic. We gave them a civil war.

Death Of A Tyrant (NSWK)

By Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - President George W. Bush was sleeping at 9 p.m. at his ranch in Crawford, Texas, when Saddam Hussein's body plunged through the trapdoor of a gallows in Kadhimiya Prison on the outskirts of Baghdad. It was dawn in the Iraqi capital, and the 69-year-old Butcher of Baghdad wore no blindfold. He had carried a Qur'an for the last few steps before his death, looking uncertain, even afraid, according to one of the witnesses close to him, but mouthing words of defiance. He sneered at Shiite guards—the warlord Moqtada al-Sadr's men, by one account. He praised God and, as he neared the gallows, proclaimed, "Iraq without me is nothing."

Like the war that overthrew him in 2003, the hanging of Saddam Hussein did not turn out as planned. Instead of a study in modern justice, the tyrant's end looked more like the result of a sectarian show trial. From Crawford, the only comment was a muted, written statement: no proclamation of "mission accomplished," just of "an important milestone" after "a difficult year for the Iraqi people and for our troops." The best that could be said was that the trial was fairer than those Saddam gave his many enemies.

Saddam Hussein's savage totalitarian rule lasted more than three decades. Torture and murder were his métiers, both practiced without evident remorse or the slightest regret. (Telling a joke about Saddam was a capital crime in his Iraq.) His arrogance led him to disastrous misjudgments. He launched a war against Iran that lasted eight years, and one against Kuwait that ended with his humiliating defeat in Desert Storm. He dreamed of imposing himself on the region with weapons of mass destruction, and acted as though he had them even when he didn't. He kept his distance from Al Qaeda, but aided and abetted many other terrorist groups. And he annihilated would-be rebels—along with their extended families—killing tens of thousands of Shiites and Kurds with guns, bombs, chemical weapons: whatever worked. If the evil that men do lives after them, then Saddam Hussein will long endure.

But the much more complicated question for now and for the future concerns the "good" he achieved, which may well have been interred with his regime. At a terrible cost, but with ruthless efficacy, he kept Iraq unified and provided a critical balance of power against Iran. If the Middle East is to be stabilized, and American long-term interests protected, those goals are still critically important.

So as Bush searches for ways to extricate the United States from the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq, which has now cost almost 3,000 American lives and drains more than $2 billion a week from U.S. coffers, little is gained from Saddam's demise. The challenge was not how to eliminate him: he ceased to be a factor when he was dragged out of a "spider hole" three years ago. The problem remains how to replace him.

Bush and his national-security team no longer talk about transforming the Middle East, merely about strengthening the current Iraqi government so it can sustain itself without the backing of 140,000 U.S. troops. According to a senior Bush aide who declined to be named while discussing internal deliberations, the administration's new strategy for doing so, likely to be announced next week, will involve three pillars: a temporary surge of more troops, more money for jobs and reconstruction, and an attempt to broaden political support for plodding Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki.

But the confusion that surrounded Saddam's execution suggests just how complicated the task will be, and how little care Maliki takes to disguise the sectarian leanings of his Shiite-dominated government. After Saddam's last appeal was rejected, Maliki reportedly told the families of some of his victims that any hesitation about hanging him would be insulting. "Our respect for human rights requires us to execute him," Maliki said, "and there will be no review or delay in carrying out the sentence." As one of Maliki's top aides told NEWSWEEK privately, the prime minister's "vision for reconciliation doesn't include those who would support Saddam Hussein in any way."

Instead of working for the broad sense of healing other societies emerging from repression and war have sought, the Maliki government took a proprietary view of the suffering Saddam inflicted—as if only its supporters had felt his cruelty. During a deeply flawed trial, judges deemed too lenient were fired or pressured to resign, and three of Saddam's defense lawyers were murdered. He was finally hanged for ordering the killing of 148 Shiite men and boys in the town of Dujail in 1982 after members of Maliki's Dawa Party, which was then a clandestine terrorist organization, tried to assassinate him. The Kurds still want their day in court: Saddam massacred tens of thousands of them in a genocidal campaign that included an infamous poison-gas attack on the town of Halabjah in 1988. His fellow Sunnis and Baath Party rivals, slaughtered on his orders and even by his own hand, are not even the subject of a court case.

Washington has never had a very deep understanding of Iraq's leaders. The Bush administration was so focused on the threat that Saddam's weapons of mass destruction might pose that it brushed aside the idea he might be bluffing. (Saddam's motivation? The threat of poison gas and biological agents could deter rebels and keep Iran at bay.) The Americans vastly overestimated the support exiled politicians would receive after returning to Iraq. They also underestimated the influence of religious leaders like Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, and failed to understand how sectarian Iraq's politics would become once elections were held.

After Saddam's brutally effective tyranny, any democracy might look feckless. But there has been such chaos since the dictator's fall that it's now common to hear Iraqis yearn for the order imposed by his strong-arm rule. Even some Americans share that sentiment. "I feel like we should let Saddam out of jail and say, 'Sorry, we didn't realize you were so brutal because you had to be'," a member of a U.S. Special Operations unit told NEWSWEEK after a hard day's fighting in Fallujah in 2004. (The soldier said he was under orders not to give his name.) "It's going to take someone either exceptionally cruel or exceptionally intelligent to rule this country."

That's a little too facile. While the U.S.-led invasion was the catalyst, the core problems in Iraq are ones Saddam helped to create. He violently despised and suppressed all authority but his own; it's little wonder that the leaders who followed could not approach his stature. Born to an impoverished mother in a rural village near the town of Tikrit in 1937, he never knew his father and was raised by an uncle who served in the Iraqi Army. He was rejected by the military academy, and slipped into the violent and conspiratorial politics of the Arab-nationalist Baath Party. At the age of 22, he took part in a failed attempt to murder the then President Abdel Karim Kassem in the streets of Baghdad. By the time the Baath Party seized power in 1968, Saddam was its rising star, effectively ruling the country from his position as vice president.

In 1979, at the age of 42, he took the top job for himself and quickly moved to eliminate all opposition. At a Baath Party congress, he charged dozens of rivals with treason. One by one they were forced to leave the hall and face immediate execution. They screamed and shouted, pleaded and cried. Slightly bored, he sat behind a desk on the stage sipping a glass of water and smoking Cuban cigars. Then he had a video of the meeting distributed throughout the Arab world to show what happened to anyone who might even think about challenging his rule.

The 1979 Iranian revolution led by Ayatollah Khomeini gave Saddam an opening to the West. Few U.S. officials had illusions about his murderous regime, but Washington was fixated on the threat posed by Tehran. U.S. diplomats were being held hostage. Khomeini was preaching jihad, and "Shiite fundamentalism" seemed to threaten the whole region. So, few objections were raised when Saddam set about murdering Shiite leaders inside Iraq who might, or might not, sympathize with the mullahs in Iran. Then his decision to invade the Islamic Republic looked like a good way to weaken Tehran.

In 1983, President Ronald Reagan sent Donald Rumsfeld as a special envoy to Baghdad to forge a working alliance with Saddam. By the mid-1980s, U.S. satellite intelligence was helping the Iraqis focus chemical-weapon attacks on Iranian troops. So strong was Washington's "tilt" toward Saddam that in 1987, when one of his jet fighters launched a missile strike on a U.S. frigate in the Persian Gulf, killing 37 sailors, the United States accepted his excuses and responded by stepping up pressure on his enemies in Iran.

Though the Iran-Iraq War ended in stalemate in 1988, the West's support emboldened Saddam. He asserted his power and influence all over the region, convinced that the United States would back his play. He hunted down enemies in neighboring states. He stepped up support for Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat, who was often resident in Baghdad. As Saddam pressed his secret program to develop atomic weapons, he publicly threatened to incinerate Israel. Still, by 1990, high-level U.S. delegations coveting lucrative commercial agreements were regular visitors to Baghdad.

His mistake was to invade the oil-rich emirate of Kuwait, which he claimed should have been part of Iraq all along. His envoys said he'd gotten the nod from Washington. But his new conquest put Saddam in a position to threaten Saudi Arabia and dominate the world oil market. When he refused to pull back, the administration of President George H.W. Bush forged an international coalition of Western powers and Arab countries to demolish his forces in 1991's Desert Storm.

Inside Iraq, however, neither the hundreds of thousands killed fighting Iran nor the crushing defeat in Kuwait fazed Saddam. When the Kurds rose up against him in the late 1980s, he used chemical weapons against them. When they tried to revolt again in 1991, just the threat that such horrors would be unleashed sent them fleeing from their homes by the hundreds of thousands. In southern Iraq, Shiites encouraged by the Bush 41 administration and helped by Iran attacked the remnants of Saddam's armed forces after Desert Storm. Saddam's response: mass murder. The U.S.-led coalition stood back. Saddam hung on.

But the foundations of the modern nation he had tried to build began to crumble under the pressure of sanctions and international isolation. By the time the United States invaded in 2003, Iraq's economy and institutions, including its armed forces, were fragile shells of what they'd been 15 years before. Shia and Kurdish leaders, many of them already in exile, started cultivating policymakers in Washington, even as they lost touch with Iraqis on the ground. In Baghdad, Saddam adopted a new religiosity, playing to Sunni fundamentalists. The already poor Shia grew poorer and more disenfranchised; the political culture grew more corrupt.

When George W. Bush decided to eliminate Saddam once and for all in 2003, Bush personalized the war, and for understandable reasons. Saddam was a useful symbol—a seeming madman. Hadn't he tried to kill Bush's retired father on a visit to Kuwait in 1993? And Saddam so dominated Iraq that it was much easier to sell the threat when you could put his sinister face on it. But that also led to the misconception that removing him would solve all problems—the notion that all Iraqis wanted was "freedom," even though for generations under totalitarian rule they had no clear idea what that meant. Because so many Iraqis hated Saddam, Washington wrongly figured they would welcome invading Americans. Instead, the U.S.-led occupation opened the way for multiple insurgencies.

The moment when Saddam Hussein's capture could be hailed as a turning point in the conflict is long past. Having focused the world's attention on the evil of this one man, the Bush administration treated him as a kind of totem, declaring new victories when his statue was pulled down by U.S. Marines in Baghdad, when he was dragged out of the hole where he was hiding several months later, when he was put on trial and when he was convicted. But the execution? A "milestone" on a long and dangerous road.

Here, then, is the tragedy of America's involvement in Iraq, now and in the future: what Saddam achieved for his country came at a terrible cost, and of the countless problems he created and perpetuated, his death solves none.

The Bushes' Saddam Drama (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, January 2, 2007

Jan. 8, 2007 issue - Evil was on the loose in the world, President George W. Bush had told the country, and on his first Thanksgiving in office—November 2001—he was on his way to Fort Campbell in Kentucky to dine with newly trained troops heading out to fight the (evil) Taliban in Afghanistan. In the conference room aboard Air Force One, we talked about evil. "Is Saddam evil?" I asked. Glancing across the table at his aides, he demurred. I asked again; again, a demurral. We went on to other topics. Several exchanges later, Bush interrupted an answer to blurt out a declaration: "By the way, Saddam is evil!"

When the history is written, the saga of the Bushes and the Butcher of Baghdad will be a central thread of the family's story—and of America's at the millennium. It is not personal in the literal sense; neither President Bush ever met Saddam. True, intelligence sources (not all of them necessarily reliable) said Saddam tried to have Bush 41 killed in 1993. And in 2002, drumming up support for the approaching second gulf war, Bush Two called Saddam the "guy who tried to kill my dad." Still, there is no evidence that the Bushes loathed Saddam, and I am told that Dad remains skeptical about the purported assassination plot. "It's not like 'the Hatfields and McCoys'," says a family friend who doesn't want to risk his relationship being quoted by name.

But it is "the Realists and the Neocons." For both Bushes, dealing with Saddam became a way to measure presidential manhood—and to express profoundly different views about the world.

For Bush One, manhood meant a hard-boiled (critics said cynical) restraint. He always made it his business to know all things geopolitical, long before—and certainly after—he took over as head of the CIA. As Ronald Reagan's vice president, he hewed to the CIA view of Saddam, which was that, as sadistic as he was, he had his uses as a counterweight to fundamentalist Iran. When Saddam turned bellicose in 1989, Saudi friends advised the new president to ignore him. Only when Saddam invaded Kuwait did Bush crank up the rhetoric—branding him "another Hitler"—but that was not really Bush One's style. When advisers told him to tone down the apocalyptic language, he did, even as he shrewdly led the Coalition forces that ousted Saddam from Kuwait.

The Hitler reference stuck, however, and it had consequences. Scholars say that it diminished Bush One, and hurt his popularity among conservatives. If Saddam indeed was another Hitler, should Bush not have gone to Baghdad to take him out? That was an argument the Neocons made throughout the '90s, and made to Bush Two as he went through his precampaign tutorials in Austin in 1999. That, together with the younger Bush's evangelical Christian faith, made Saddam an inviting target. Bush Two had little understanding of the nuances of the Middle East, which his father had spent a lifetime learning, and Bush Two had a lack of interest bordering on contempt for diplomatic nuance. He viewed it as a lack of will, of confidence, of power.

That was his father's game. He would play another.

Those close to the family say there is little evidence that father and son have ever had a detailed discussion about the Iraq war—either before it began or since. When Bush Two visited his father in Kennebunkport, Maine, at the start of the 2000 campaign, he said that if he did not win, he would have a lot more time to go fishing with his dad. Father and son may yet get their chance for fishing trips. They will both be relieved that Saddam is gone, but I bet that the subject won't come up.

So, Saddam Is Dead . . . (WSJ)

By Mark Bowden

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

Now that they have hanged Saddam Hussein, perhaps we can begin to appreciate the irony and the lessons of his demise.

Any nation is, at heart, an idea. Once people started organizing themselves in groups larger than their own blood lines, they had to invent reasons for considering themselves part of something bigger -- tribes, city states, feudal kingdoms, nations, empires. Language, customs, religion, ideology and geographic proximity have all served. The idea of a state that accepts as equal citizens people from all corners of the globe, a nation founded on abstract principles, is a relative newcomer. We have been trying to get the people inhabiting a large swath of land between and on both sides of the Tigris and Euphrates to embrace the concept. It is an ongoing struggle with less-than-encouraging results.

One of our better allies in promoting this idea was none other than Saddam, who may have died the last true believer in a multiethnic, nonsectarian Iraq. He made his idea of Iraq real by ruthlessly suppressing dissent, particularly with the Shiite majority, by enforcing obedience from Sunnis and the Kurds, and by resisting (or co-opting) the vision of Islamist radicals. American leaders wrestling with Moqtada al-Sadr and his ilk have doubtlessly found themselves admiring the dictator's success, if not his methods.

The old tyrant had long been out of touch with his country, locked behind the high walls of his palaces, protected by body doubles and flattering liars, moving from secret bed to secret bed. The hand-written letter he purportedly released from prison last week, when it became apparent he was to be executed, showed once more how disconnected he was. He addressed the Iraqi people as one, and encouraged them to rise up against the American occupiers. "Do not trust those who speak of Shias and Sunnis," he wrote. Except for the part about attacking Americans, it might have been written by one of the Pentagon's propaganda contractors.

In fact, no one who cares about the idea of Iraq is rooting for the U.S. to depart any time soon. Saddam could be excused, perhaps, because he had lived in a fantasy world for years. Those who advocate it here are transparently heedless of its consequences in Iraq, the operative notion being to avoid shedding more American blood for a cause deemed hopeless or unworthy or both. Unless something dramatic happens soon to alter the sorry trends, it will eventually be the policy of our country.

Saddam had long since ceased to be the beloved figure he believed himself to be. In this stubborn insurgency there has been little evidence of him as a rallying point. His death did not provoke violent recriminations or even much angry rhetoric. Once he was toppled, once deprived of his vicious state apparatus, he ceased to be relevant. Just as the resistance never stopped or even slowed after his capture, the deaths of his sons or the arrests or killings of the other leading Baathist figures on the notorious U.S. military deck of cards, it will not be affected by his death. Saddam was bigger than the bloody divisions that now preoccupy his people. None of the various murderous factions are fighting for his vision of a greater Iraq. The Sunnis are fighting to resist Shiite domination, the Shiites to rid themselves of Sunni oppression, and the Islamists just to frustrate the democratic vision of the U.S.

We Americans consistently underestimate the deep hatreds that divide people. Our political system is designed to wrestle peacefully with the divisions of race, class, ethnicity, religion and competing ideological or geographical interests, and has generally worked as intended -- the Civil War being the one glaring exception. Generations have struggled to live up to ideals of tolerance and diversity. When we look out at the world, we tend to see millions longing to get past the blood feuds, to be, in short, more like us. George Bush and the neocon intellectuals who led us into Iraq are just the latest in a long line of evangelical Americanists. No matter how many times history slaps us in the face, the dream persists.

Nine years ago, in the epilogue to "Black Hawk Down," I quoted an unnamed State Department official (he was Michael Sheehan, ambassador for counter-terrorism) as follows: "The idea used to be that terrible countries were terrible because good, decent, innocent people were being oppressed by evil, thuggish leaders. Somalia changed that. Here you have a country where just about everybody is caught up in the fighting. You stop an old lady on the street and ask her if she wants peace, and she will say, 'Yes, of course, I pray for it daily.' All the things you would expect her to say. Then ask her if she would be willing for her clan to share power with another to have that peace, and she'll say, 'With those murderers and thieves? I'd die first.' People in these countries . . . don't want peace. They want victory. They want power. Men, women, old, and young. Somalia was the experience that taught us that people in these places bear much of the responsibility for things being the way they are. The hatred and killing continues because they want it to. Or because they don't want peace enough to stop it."

The statement is too harsh, as Mr. Sheehan himself agrees (he was at that point a veteran of Somalia, Rwanda and Bosnia). Any effort to characterize millions with the expression "these people" is unfair and wrong. But there is a principle here struggling to emerge: Before a state can exist where there are deep-rooted, competing interests, there must be some broadly accepted concept of a nation strong enough to at least compete with parochial interests. There must be some generally accepted idea of a nation.

Mr. Sheehan was wrong about one thing. Somalia didn't change anything. Substitute Iraq for Somalia in the quote, and the observation is as accurate today as then. Maybe we need to better appreciate that our nation remains an exception. I believe that in the long run people on this planet will embrace democracy and diversity, but we are not there yet. I still nurse hope that Iraqis will abandon blood feuds for compromise and a democratic future, but it appears to be a longer shot today than three years ago, and it was a bad bet then. Mr. Bush has staked his legacy on it.

So, the tyrant is dead. We may have facilitated his bad end, but, sadly, violence, oppression and fear remain the time-tested ways of forging a nation state out of disparate parts. Until Mr. Sheehan's doctrine is no longer true, the way of the world will remain Saddam's.

Mr. Bowden is the author, inter alia, of "Black Hawk Down" (Atlantic, 1999).

Justice For A Tyrant (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

The debate over Iraq has become so poisonous that even the weekend death sentence for Saddam Hussein seems to have become morally controversial. So it's worth recalling that what happened early Saturday morning in Baghdad is that rare event -- justice for a tyrant after a fair and open trial.

DOJ_NMG_0110833

Most of the world's dictator-killers escape such a reckoning. Stalin and Mao died in their own beds. Hitler escaped the hangman by committing suicide, while Nicolae Ceausescu was shot by a vengeful mob after a perfunctory trial. Idi Amin and Pol Pot were ousted from power but lived into old age without punishment. Slobodan Milosevic made it to trial but died before a verdict could be rendered. Others -- Castro, Kim Jong Il -- live on in power, terrorizing their countrymen to this day.

Saddam may not have been history's worst murderer, but he was an accomplished one. He began as a Baath Party assassin, rose after a 1968 coup to become Iraq's feared vice president and intelligence chief, and consolidated his power in 1979 with a videotaped purge of his enemies, nearly 500 of whom were soon dead.

There followed the invasion of Iran, the gassing of the Kurds, the looting of Kuwait, more slaughter of Kurds and Shiites, an attempt on the life of a former U.S. President, and support for international terrorism. The precise number of Saddam's victims is impossible to know. But add the Iraqi estimate of 400,000 bodies found in mass graves to the casualties during his wars with Iran, Kuwait and the U.S.-led coalition, and his death total may equal two million.

There would surely have been more. Never mind that no stockpiles of chemical weapons were found in Iraq after 2003. Saddam was the only living national leader to have ordered the use of chemical weapons -- twice. Were he still in power today, does anyone doubt he would be racing with Iran to obtain a nuclear bomb?

Saddam's trial had its critics, just as Nuremberg did in its time. But the dictator received far more due process than his own victims ever did. He was able to play to the cameras of al Jazeera, giving the illusion to his former allies in the insurgency that he might return. He could denounce his Iraqi judges as American stooges, though the U.S. studiously left his fate to Iraqis and even protected Saddam in captivity from vengeful ill-treatment. What the dictator could not do is gainsay the evidence of his guilt, which ran to thousands of exhibits and pages of testimony and would have included hundreds of witnesses had the other cases against him gone forward.

His hanging will not end the violence in Iraq, but it is important for that country's future nonetheless. It will reassure majority Shiites that Saddam's day is finally past, making it easier for the moderates among them to compromise with Sunnis on the shape of their government. The anti-Saddam taunts of a few of his executioners were tasteless, but they also show the catharsis his death represents.

Perhaps the more important effect will be on the psychology of Iraq's Sunnis. Many of them actually did believe that Saddam might return to power, just as Saddam told them he would in his televised trial proceedings. And they continued to believe that Saddam could punish "traitors," like a mafia don, from his jail cell. As Shiite leader Ayad Jamal al-Deen remarked, "The death of this man will help to release many Baathists from Saddam's mafia."

The world will have to endure future tyrants, but Saddam's hanging will have done some larger good if it gives even one of them pause to think he might suffer the same justice. Too often, faced with murderous dictators, the world's moralists demand that America "do something" (Darfur, Bosnia) only to shrink from the reality of what that requires. In Iraq, President Bush did something. The 3,000 Americans who have given their lives in that noble mission have done so in a just cause that rid the world of a man who might have killed hundreds of thousands more.

Iraqi Leader's Past Of Shiite Activism Undermines Pledge To Heal Rifts (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- His only son was getting married on Friday, but the Iraqi prime minister couldn't stay long at the wedding. Nouri al-Maliki greeted the guests and then quickly left to make sure that when the sun rose over Baghdad again, his arch-nemesis Saddam Hussein would be dead.

Mr. Maliki wanted to leave nothing to chance. His mind raced through several scenarios, however improbable, that might have derailed the execution, says a close adviser who spoke with him. What if the Americans struck a secret deal sparing Mr. Hussein's life in exchange for a halt to attacks against U.S. troops? What if the former dictator's lawyers succeeded in blocking his hanging through U.S. courts? And finally, what if insurgents abducted a group of schoolchildren and threatened to kill them unless the hanging was canceled?

Mr. Maliki hurriedly gathered final signatures for the execution to proceed, dismissing U.S. suggestions that he delay it for 15 days. By the time Mr. Maliki awoke for dawn prayers on Saturday, Mr. Hussein was dead, his disfigured corpse displayed on television with rope marks on the neck.

For the 56-year-old Mr. Maliki, it was a crowning moment in a career defined by uncompromising hatred of everything Mr. Hussein had stood for. Now Mr. Maliki is supposed to rise above the sectarian chasm that has pitted Iraq's Sunni minority against his own Shiite branch of Islam. But as Iraq moves closer to full-scale civil war, a look at Mr. Maliki's history of Shiite activism suggests he is ill-prepared to be a true unifying figure. On his watch, Iraq has become further polarized along sectarian lines, significantly complicating the U.S. efforts to reduce the violence. (See related article.1)

Things here started spinning out of control long before Mr. Maliki took office, and fissures have been hardening among political factions with narrow sectarian interests, sharply limiting Mr. Maliki's room to maneuver. "He's got the world's most difficult job," says Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

In a Dec. 24 interview, Mr. Maliki admitted he's exhausted, and would much rather serve his country without holding high office. "I wish I could be done with it," he says.

As the violence rages on, Mr. Maliki feels frustrated by his failings and by the gulf of mistrust that has opened between him and ordinary Iraqis, say his associates and colleagues. When his heavily armed convoy moves through Baghdad disrupting traffic, Mr. Maliki gets annoyed because it reminds him of Mr. Hussein's old motorcades.

Born near Babylon, Mr. Maliki studied religion and Arabic poetry. In the 1960s he joined the Dawa party, a moderate Shiite Islamist group whose members were targeted for torture and executions by Mr. Hussein's regime. Like many of his party colleagues, Mr. Maliki changed his first name -- from Nouri to Jawad, in his case -- to make it harder for authorities to identify him and his family.

Mr. Maliki briefly lived in the marshes of southern Iraq, hiding in crude shacks made of reeds and organizing resistance, says Hassan al-Sunaid, a longtime friend of the prime minister. Once, a Dawa camp came under attack by government forces. One member was killed and four were wounded. When Mr. Maliki arrived on the scene and was briefed on the casualties, he told supporters not to be depressed because all five could have perished. "We just gained four people," Mr. Sunaid recalls Mr. Maliki as saying. In 1979, Mr. Maliki moved to Syria, where he coordinated Iraqi opposition meetings and published a Dawa newspaper.

In 1982, Dawa helped organize a botched assassination attempt against Mr. Hussein, who responded by executing some 150 Shiite civilians. That massacre earned the former dictator his death penalty.

Following the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, Mr. Maliki returned to Baghdad and became one of the most enthusiastic enforcers of Washington's sweeping program to purge Iraq's institutions of Baath party members. Many, though not all, were Sunnis. That decision is now widely viewed as a mistake because it antagonized many Sunnis, particularly in the military, and pushed them into the insurgency.

Mr. Maliki's zeal for the program surprised even those who shared his distaste for the Baath party. Mithal al-Alusi, a former Sunni exile who worked under Mr. Maliki on the de-Baathification commission, says he once wanted to clear the names of some 400 low-level Baathists, who were forced to join the party under Saddam to keep their jobs. Facing objections from Mr. Maliki and some others, Mr. Alusi says he leaked the list to an Iraqi newspaper, after which the commission's hand was forced and the names were cleared. "Maliki was very upset about it," recalls Mr. Alusi. "He's allergic to Baathists." Mr. Maliki was concerned that these Baathists hadn't submitted proper applications for clearance, says Sami al-Askari, his friend and adviser.

Mr. Maliki and his close associates believe the Shiites finally assumed the rightful positions of leadership in Iraq, after decades under repressive Sunni rule. "The problem is that our Sunni brothers ruled Iraq for centuries because there was no democracy, no elections," Mr. Maliki said in the interview. "Therefore, they feel that a right has been taken away from them."

The Sunni-Shia split dates to the battles at the dawn of Islam over who should succeed the Prophet Muhammed as the leader of the Muslim world. Eventually, the Sunnis gained the upper hand throughout most of the Middle East, with the notable exception of Iraq's neighbor Iran.

Preserving the new Iraq as a Shia-controlled state is an indispensable ideological consideration for the latest crop of Shiite leaders, who still recall a missed opportunity back in 1920. After an armed uprising against the British colonial rule back then, Shiite sheiks withdrew from politics and paved the way for the ascendancy of the Sunni minority that lasted until 2003.

"The current leaders learned that lesson very well," says Sadiq al-Rikabi, the prime minister's political adviser. Mr. Maliki has a personal connection to the events of 1920: His grandfather was a cleric who took part in the uprising, wrote national-liberation poetry and was detained by the British several times. Mr. Maliki went on to write his master's thesis on his forebear, whose verses he can recite from memory.

After 2003, the Sunnis themselves withdrew from politics and allowed the Shiites and Kurds to form a government without them. Security forces took on a Shiite tint, and Sunnis began to complain of sectarian death squads allegedly operating with the complicity of the interior ministry.

From his seat in parliament, Mr. Maliki was lobbying for more Shiite influence in the relatively nonsectarian Iraqi army.

In 2005, he approached the Sunni minister of defense with a request to hire more senior Shiite officers -- a move that many Sunnis now cast as sectarian meddling. In the end, the defense minister ignored the request, according to people familiar with the episode.

The Sunnis ended their boycott of politics in December 2005 and won seats in the new parliament, though the Shiites still maintained a majority. Banding together with ethnic Kurds, the Sunnis engineered the ouster of the Shiite prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whom they viewed as inefficient. As a senior Dawa official, Mr. Maliki emerged as the Shiite coalition's second choice for prime minister, though most Iraqis didn't know anything about him. Mr. Maliki never coveted the post and decided to take it only after his Shiite colleagues spent days persuading him to step in, he and others involved in the selection say. "That decision for me was heavier than a mountain," Mr. Maliki recalls, stooping his shoulders under its imaginary weight.

Upon taking office, Mr. Maliki surrounded himself with trusted Shiite advisers, most of whom hail from the same exile underground that shaped him. Then he pledged to reach out to the Sunni insurgent groups and former Baathists, the very people he worked hard to isolate before becoming prime minister. "Yes, he was very tough against Baathists, but now he's ready for dialogue with some of them," says Mr. al-Askari. "Some people were surprised by this."

Even Ansar al-Sunna, one of the toughest insurgent groups in the country, has been approached and has sent in a list of "requirements for negotiation," says Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the prime minister's national security adviser. Yet, there are no signs that reconciliation is working. In early December, Ansar al-Sunna plastered several Baghdad universities with leaflets attacking Mr. Maliki's government and blaming it for killing Sunnis.

"This reconciliation came very late, three years late or at least two," says Mahmoud Othman, a veteran Kurdish politician. The Kurds, most of whom live in their peaceful northern region, have largely sat out the conflict between Iraq's Sunni and Shiite Arabs.

The prime minister says reconciliation is still possible. "It is not only about slogans; it is a matter of will," he says, adding that he's working on establishing a retirement plan for some former Baathists and senior officers of the old army.

Another huge challenge facing Mr. Maliki is the rising power of Moqtada al-Sadr, a Shiite strongman whose parliamentary votes were critical for his nomination as prime minister. Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mehdi army, is accused of conducting sectarian attacks against Sunnis and driving them out of mixed neighborhoods in Baghdad. (Mr. Sadr's advisers deny this.) In February, three months before Mr. Maliki ascended to Iraq's top post, Sunni insurgents destroyed a landmark Shiite shrine in Samarra, and the Mehdi army quickly emerged as a vigilante Shiite self-defense force and one of the most intractable players in the escalating violence. Mr. Maliki promised to tackle militias, but instead he has chosen to seek a political accommodation with Mr. Sadr, fearful that direct military action would alienate him.

In October, Mr. Maliki told the U.S. military to remove roadblocks surrounding Sadr City, a massive Shiite district of Baghdad that serves as a base of operations for the Mehdi army. The checkpoints had gone up just a week earlier to facilitate the search for a kidnapped American soldier of Iraqi descent who was reportedly held somewhere in the sprawling slum of some two million residents.

Shiites "thought it was a big victory," says Lt. Col. Steve Miska, a U.S. Army officer stationed in Baghdad. "The prime minister forced the coalition to stand down." The Sunnis were baffled by the decision, interpreting it as Mr. Maliki's coddling of the Mehdi army. "The roadblocks were put in to destroy the gangsters," says Saleem Abdullah of the Iraqi Islamic Party, one of the biggest Sunni political organizations. "When they were lifted, that plan was ruined."

Mr. Maliki thought the roadblocks were simply ineffective, snarling traffic and disrupting daily lives of the mostly poor Sadr City residents. "He felt that people are suffocating there," says Mr. Rubaie, his national-security adviser. "And these are the same measures Saddam used against the Shia in that slum."

Mr. Maliki has also blocked some American efforts to arrest Mehdi army operatives. Once, he was given a list of 10 people whom the U.S. military wanted to detain in Sadr City. The prime minister vetoed arresting one person because that would be politically sensitive, Mr. Rubaie recalls. Mr. Maliki, he adds, is committed to wiping out the rogue Mehdi army forces who are involved in sectarian attacks, but he wants to engage moderate elements in dialogue.

Mr. Maliki says the rise of the Shiite militias was a natural defensive reaction to the Samarra shrine bombing, but they have since become a danger to the integrity of the state. "We will continue confronting them with force and we'll work on winning over some militiamen to our side," he says.

Many Sunni leaders, though, suspect a conspiracy: "Maliki knows that the Mehdi army can destroy Sunnis, that's why he doesn't disarm them," says Adnan al-Dulaimi, a hard-line Sunni member of parliament. Last year, a guard on Mr. Dulaimi's private-security detail was detained by the Americans on suspicion of plotting bombing attacks. Though Mr. Dulaimi himself wasn't implicated, the Shiites pounced on the arrest as a sign of some Sunni politicians' complicity in terrorism.

That underlies a broader Shiite perception that the decision to share power with the Sunnis after 2005 elections may have been a mistake because the Sunni insurgency has only grown stronger. In late November, several car bombs killed more than 200 Shiites inside Sadr City, the bloodiest attack since the U.S.-led invasion. When Mr. Maliki recently went for a visit there, his convoy was pelted with rocks.

His allies and some opponents describe him as a man with a common touch and none of the haughtiness that often comes with high office. His days begin at the crack of dawn when he wakes up to pray, and they often last past midnight. To unwind, he reads Arabic poetry and can recite many verses from memory, including his own grandfather's work. He writes his own poems, but these days, he says, "only very little because I don't have time." He's been known to personally grab and wipe a dusty chair for a visitor, and he's vetoed government appointments at the slightest hint of corruption in a candidate.

In the recent interview, Mr. Maliki sat under a huge Iraqi flag and reminisced about his life, shaped by the fight against Mr. Hussein. "I'm still fighting Baathists," he said, quickly adding: "But not all Baathists, only those who have the attitude of Saddam."

For Iraq's Shiites, A Dream Deferred Breeds Mistrust Of U.S. (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, January 2, 2007

BAGHDAD -- As a dull winter sun nibbled away at the chilly morning, Hussein Lefta stood beside the Rahman Mosque. Before him, Shiite Muslim worshipers passed through an emerald green gate and shuffled across a stone-covered field. Behind him the giant gray shrine rose above Mansour, a mainly Sunni Arab neighborhood that was once home to the elite of the late Iraqi president Saddam Hussein.

Built to proclaim Hussein's glory, the mosque is one of the most visible symbols of his fall. Thousands of oppressed Shiites took control of the unfinished building following the U.S.-led invasion. On that day in April 2003, Shiites say, their history was reshaped, their politics reborn and their faith reinvigorated .

Lefta, 42, was among the many Shiites who thanked the Americans for their freedom. He dreamed that his community, Iraq's majority, would exert the political influence the Sunnis had long denied it.

Today, the mosque is still incomplete, as are Lefta's dreams.

"The Americans are afraid the Shia will take over Iraq," he explained.

Iraq's Shiites are at a crossroads in their rise from oppression to power and in their relationship with the United States. In a nation riven by violence and competing visions, they feel as if they have been handed the keys to their house but never allowed to settle down. Bitter personality rifts have undermined their ability to govern. And they have yet to bridge the growing divide separating them from the Sunnis and further deepened by Hussein's execution on Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0110837

As President Bush seeks a new strategy for Iraq, many Shiites express deep mistrust of the United States and its intentions. In U.S. efforts to engage Iraq's disaffected Sunnis, they perceive betrayal. And in U.S. pressure to dismantle Shiite militias, they see an attempt to weaken their bulwark against Sunni insurgents.

Against this backdrop, Shiite leaders have begun to push harder for more independence from their American backers. Most recently, the government ignored U.S. objections to hanging Hussein too hastily. He was executed four days after an appeals court upheld his death sentence.

Casting a shadow over discussions with Shiites such as Lefta is a despairing sense, inspired by centuries of oppression and suspicion of outsiders, that their community is handcuffed, effectively prevented from shaping its future.

Lefta's friend Wisam al-Taieb, 27, a gaunt Oil Ministry worker with dark, intense eyes, stood next to him at the mosque.

"What future?" Taieb demanded. "Now the Shia are suffering from a campaign of genocide. The Americans are in total control of our security forces. Our elected government does not have the power to move a single military unit. How do you expect me not to be pessimistic?"Shifting Attitudes

Under Hussein's government, Lefta, a tall man with a soft gaze, was among the millions of Shiites who were marginalized. He studied French in college, hoping to work for the government. But the jobs he sought always went to the Sunni elite, the favored class since the Ottoman Empire colonized Iraq. Today, Lefta doesn't speak a word of French.

Following the U.S. invasion, he was among the first Shiites to take over what was then known as the Grand Saddam Mosque, a majestic shrine with the appearance of a spaceship. They renamed it the Rahman -- or Merciful -- Mosque.

Around them, the Americans demolished the old order of Sunni domination. The occupation administration of L. Paul Bremer purged Sunnis from the army and outlawed Hussein's Baath Party while trying to restore the rights of Shiites and Kurds, the groups most oppressed under Hussein.

Still, educated men such as Lefta felt uneasy as they watched their fellow Shiites embrace the United States. He recalled the U.S. failure to support Shiites in their 1991 rebellion against Hussein. After the Americans toppled Hussein, Lefta said, "We were watching carefully what the new days would bring and what the future was hiding."

Ali Adeeb, a silver-haired, gray-suited Shiite lawmaker, has seen the shift in his community's attitude toward the United States. He pointed to the February 2006 bombing of a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra. "Before Samarra, when the Shiites used to be slaughtered they kept silent," Adeeb said. "Afterward, they exploded."

Shiite militias attacked Sunni mosques. Sunni leaders have accused Shiite death squads of hundreds of killings. "The Sunnis started to ask for rescue from the Americans, especially now that they have joined the political process and have become close to the Americans," Adeeb said. "This is when the doubts about the Americans began."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad declared the Shiite militias the most significant threat to Iraq's stability, replacing the Sunni insurgency and al-Qaeda. Frustrated by the Shiite government's inability to govern and bring security, U.S. officials began pressuring Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to dismantle the militias. They zeroed in on the Mahdi Army of radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, upon whom Maliki depends for power.

"They are attacking people at mosques, at stadiums," Lefta said, referring to the Sunni insurgents. "But the Americans overlook that. They concentrate on the militias. The militias are merely a reaction to the violence."'A Wrong Reading'

Where Bremer alienated the Sunnis, an action now seen as having fueled the insurgency, Khalilzad sought to integrate them into Iraq's political process, a strategy that many U.S. officials hoped could lead to a way out of Iraq.

The ambassador has met with Sunni leaders from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and other states to enlist their support in isolating the Sunni insurgents. In November 2005, after U.S. soldiers found Sunnis being tortured in a secret prison run by the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry, Khalilzad rebuked the Iraqi government.

Shiite politicians and analysts say Khalilzad is backing the Sunnis to limit the power of Shiites in the government. They say the United States and its allies, concerned about the growing influence of neighboring Iran's Shiite theocracy, will never allow an independent Shiite government, much less a religious one, to fully blossom in Iraq.

"We know the U.S. is under great pressure from Arabic and Islamic countries, who are Sunni," said Ridha Jawad Taqi, a member of parliament with the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Shiite party with strong ties to Tehran. "They fear the growing power of the Shia inside Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0110838

"The Americans have a wrong reading of Iraq," said Hasan Suneid, a member of the Shiite Dawa party and a close aide to Maliki. "And who is responsible for this reading? It is the diplomatic channel, that is, Khalilzad."

Suneid, an owlish civil engineer and poet who favors dark, crumpled Western suits, is among the many Shiite former exiles who owe their current positions to the U.S. toppling of Hussein. He now sees Khalilzad trying to engage Sunni insurgents and former Baathists. "I don't mind if the Americans are talking with our enemies," Suneid said. "But they should not change their strategy."

"Who are the secularists?" demanded Adeeb, the Shiite lawmaker, his eyes tightening. "The secularists are the Baath Party."

"It means the base of their thinking is not stable," he continued, referring to the Americans. "They are going to lose the Shiites. And they won't win the Sunnis back, because they attacked them at the beginning. So now both sides will lose confidence in the United States."

Michael McClellan, chief spokesman at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said Khalilzad was aware of the Shiites' concerns but said it had not affected his ability to work with Maliki and other Shiite leaders.

"These issues often require compromises by the parties involved, and sometimes they do not like that," McClellan said in an e-mail. "This is true of both Sunnis and Shiites, but we do not favor one group over another."Another Turning Point

From his wallet, Baghdad shop owner Abdul Amir Ali pulled out two yellowing black-and-white passport photos of his brothers. In the 1980s, Hussein ordered their executions, along with more than 100 other men from the northern town of Dujail, in retribution for an attempt on his life. One brother was 20, the other 23.

When Hussein was sentenced in November to death by hanging, Ali felt his loyalty to the Maliki government deepen. Like many Shiites, he had rejoiced when U.S.-led forces invaded Iraq -- "I behaved like a crazy man," he recalled. And he knows that without the fall of Hussein, he would have never seen justice for his brothers.

Seated in his shop, in the affluent, mostly Shiite neighborhood of Karrada, Ali and his brother Usama expressed concern that U.S. officials were pushing the government to allow thousands of purged Baathists who did not commit atrocities to resume their old jobs.

"This is a big mistake," said Usama Ali, 30, a stocky, bald man with a scratchy voice. "Saddam's people should not be allowed to participate in the political process."

The U.S. pressures and growing mistrust have emboldened Shiite leaders. They are demanding more autonomy and control over Iraq's mostly Shiite security forces, as well as urging U.S. forces to fight Sunni insurgents instead of Shiite militias, which are forging Shiite enclaves across Baghdad.

That worries Sunni leaders. "The U.S. needs to send a clear message: We will act toward Iraqis in a fair and equal way," said Ayad al-Sammarae, a prominent Sunni politician. "We can't punish one criminal and forgive another."

In October, in the government's strongest assertion of sovereignty yet, Maliki ordered U.S. forces to lift a blockade of Sadr City, the huge Shiite slum in Baghdad. For everyday Shiites, it was another turning point in their relationship with their liberators. "This is the first time he has stood up to the occupiers," Abdul Amir Ali said with pride. "It was like a victory for us when the Americans obeyed Maliki."

Still, Lefta feels "a second betrayal" coming. "The Shiite people dream of democracy, real democracy," he said, as men filed toward the Rahman Mosque's prayer hall. "But what is taking place is exactly the opposite. The Americans want to guarantee the minority at the expense of the majority."

Along the tall wall encircling the mosque compound, posters of Shiite politicians from the most recent U.S.-backed election predominate, save for one lone patch. There, squeezed between the Shiites, are images of two Sunni politicians, their faces obscured, their posters torn.

Iraq Orders Closure Of TV Station Office (AP)

By Christopher Torchia

AP, January 2, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0110839

The Iraqi government Monday ordered the closure of the Baghdad office of a Dubai-based television station whose newscaster wore black mourning clothes while reporting on the hanging of Hussein.

A spokesman for the Interior Ministry said the Al-Sharqiya station, owned by a former chief of radio and television for Saddam, had incited violence and hatred in its coverage and had ignored warnings to stop.

Brigadier Abdul-Karim Khalaf, the spokesman, said the order was issued after an allegedly false report by the news channel about the abduction of three Sunni Arab female students from a university.
